This purse is worked in green twisted silk. We call especial attention to the stitch used, which is both pretty and easily made. This manner of crochet consists of sl. (slip stitches), which are not worked from right to left as ordinarily, but in the round from left to right. The under side of the work, moreover, makes the right side of the purse. Begin the purse by casting on 4 stitches as a foundation; join these in a round, take the needle out, turn the work, and crochet from the under side a round sl., working from left to right, and putting the needle in the front vein of the stitches: in this manner crochet in this round 2 sl. in each foundation stitch, so that the round counts 8 stitches. Widen in the second round by working 2 stitches in each made stitch of the last round, so that this round counts 12 stitches. The following rounds are worked in the same manner: widen in each by adding a stitch in the same place—4 stitches in a round—till each gore-like section counts 27 stitches. Having completed two sides in this manner, sew them together on the under edges; and on the upper fasten to a clasp of requisite size, by means of single steel beads. The fringe on the under part is composed of loops of steel beads, interwoven together. The clasp from a worn-out purse may be used, and the purse worked to suit it.

Wall Cushion.

See illustration on first page.

MATERIALS: Green zephyr wool, green and black flosselle, green or black oil-cloth, gray linen, curled hair.

This cushion is designed to hang on the wall over sofas or low-backed easy-chairs. The original is hexagonal, and is provided with a crochet cover of green zephyr wool. The edges are finished by a tied fringe and small tassels as shown in the illustration. Woolen cord serves for hanging up the cushion.

Begin the crochet cover in the centre by a foundation of 6 stitches; join these in a round, and crochet 8 rounds sc. (single crochet), working in the 1st round 2 stitches in each foundation stitch, and in the following rounds 2 stitches in every made stitch of the preceding round, by which means the corners are formed. In the 9th and 10th rounds work the figure-row which next follows, and which may be seen in the illustration.

9th round.—* In the next stitch of the last round a figure as follows: 3 times alternating, the thread thrown around the needle and a loop taken in the stitch, always putting the needle through both upper veins; then work off together the loops and threads which are thus collected on the needle; after this crochet together the 2 stitches still remaining on the needle; 1 sc. in the upper vein of the following stitch of the last round. Repeat from *. On the corners, however, where 2 stitches are always worked in one of the preceding round, crochet a figure in the first of these 2 stitches, then 1 sc. in the upper vein of the 2d stitch, and a figure in both upper veins of this 2d stitch.

10th round.—Like the 9th, but the figures must alternate with the figures of the 9th round.

Now follow 4 rounds sc., after which twice alternately 2 figure rounds and 4 rounds sc. All these rounds are widened in the manner already shown. This finishes the crochet work. This cover in the original is 11 inches in diameter, measuring from one corner to the opposite; it may of course be made larger if desired. The cover is next ornamented with button-hole stitch in green, and small figures in black flosselle, after which it is fastened on a cushion of suitable size, made of gray linen, finished by oil-cloth on the back, and filled with curled hair. The outer edge is ornamented, as shown in the illustration, with a tied fringe, and tassels of green wool and flosselle.

EASTER WEEK.

By THE REV. CHARLES KINGSLEY.

SEE the land, her Easter keeping,
Rises as her Maker rose.
Seeds, so long in darkness sleeping,
Burst at last from winter snows.
Earth with heaven above rejoices;
Fields and gardens hail the spring;
Shoughs and woodlands ring with voices,
While the wild birds build and sing.

You, to whom your Maker granted
Powers to those sweet birds unknown,
Use the craft by God implanted;
Use the reason not your own.
Here, while heaven and earth rejoice,
Each his Easter tribute bring—
Work of fingers, chant of voices,
Like the birds who build and sing.

THE TEETH.

THE mouth, however distorted its form or preposterous its size, if it only shows a range of sound and clean teeth, can scarcely be deemed ugly. There is a wholesomeness of look in a row of pure white ivories set regularly in a rim of ruddy coral which reconciles the observer to an otherwise unprepossessing face.

A wholesome condition of the teeth is not only essential to good looks; but to daily comfort and permanent health. Chewing of the food, so necessary to a good digestion, can not be properly performed with weak and diseased masticators, which are in fact the frequent cause of dyspepsia and other affections of the stomach. Local diseases of the most tormenting kind, such as tic douloureux and the various painful face, head, and ear aches, and disorders of the eye, as well as the fatal cancer and tedious ulcers of the tongue and lips, are often due to no other cause than a decayed and ragged tooth.

Though the natural constitution of the body and the various accidental diseases to which it is liable may have something to do with the bad condition of the teeth, their ill looks and decay are generally owing to a neglect of cleanliness. The mischief is most frequently done at an early age. In childhood an indifference to personal appearance, with that disinclination to any effort which does not bring immediate pleasure, leads to a disregard of the teeth. This occurs just at the time when they require the most care. At about eleven years of age most of the permanent teeth have taken the place of those of infancy, which are called the deciduous, since they fall away or are absorbed to make room for others. At this period the child should be compelled to rub his teeth with a soft brush and rinse his mouth after each meal. These simple means are all that are necessary to purify and preserve them, provided the child makes no other use of his teeth than that for which nature intended them. The jaws were, of course, never designed for nut-crackers, and the attempt so to pervert their purpose must necessarily prove fatal to the teeth. Though no perceptible fracture may be the immediate result, the tooth undoubtedly receives from the shock of each crushed hickory a seriously damaging effect, either to the nerve, the socket, or the enameled surface which covers it. With due care of the teeth, begun in childhood and prolonged through life, any person may reasonably calculate upon a set, if not of handsome, of useful grinders, to the end of his threescore years and ten.

The decay of the teeth is generally owing to the action of the acids generated by the fermentation of the particles of food deposited between them and at their roots during eating. To prevent this the obvious way is to remove these deposits after each meal. The French practice of handing round the tooth-picks and mouth-rinsers at the close of every repast, is a good one for the teeth, though offensive to the fastidiousness of our American manners. All that we have to say is, that the sooner the particles of food are picked out and washed away the better.

People should be on their guard against the too busy fingers of the dentist, who ought not to be allowed to file and scrape the teeth merely for the purpose of giving them an artificial regularity and whiteness not bestowed by nature. When there is actual decay, then, and not till then, should he be permitted to make a free use of his instruments. The tartar which is apt to gather at the root of the teeth can be kept away by diligent cleaning, but if once allowed to accumulate and harden it will become necessary to remove it with a metallic scraper. As a general thing, a brush and water, if used sufficiently often, will be all that are required for cleaning the teeth. The only article that can be added with safety is a little good soap, like the English Windsor.

We are sorry to find that it is a common belief among dentists, that that vilest of nauseous habits, tobacco-chewing, is favorable to the preservation of the teeth. This has long been the apology of our Southern and Western dames for their foul but favorite practice of dipping or besmearing their gums and teeth with snuff. Whatever good tobacco may do directly to the teeth is more than counterbalanced by the indirect injury they receive from the bodily disorders produced by this injurious weed.

There can be no question that smoking is fatal, if not to the soundness of the teeth, to their good looks, as it stains them with an ashy fuliginous color.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Miss Juno Hundredweight.

MY DEAR MISS JUNO,—I was a younger man than I am now, and it was a date quite before your recollection, when Grace Church was built at the head of Broadway. It is, as you must often have observed, of the Frippery Gothic style of architecture, and the wits of that time used to say, "Of course it is." The wit was perhaps not so evident to the excellent congregation that worshiped at the church, and when one of the graver ladies who were accustomed to go thither every Sunday asked what the expression meant, she was told that it meant merely that it was a fashionable church, and that possibly it was fashion as well as pure religion and undefiled that drew so many persons to that fane.

Indeed, my dear, the building of Grace Church was in the days of Martelle—not a bishop of that name but a barber—and the Tilburys and Stanhopes of that time, upon the occasion of the consecration of the church, or their own confirmation, had their hair elaborately coiffed by that master in the art, and as he could not do them all on Sunday morning he was obliged to dress some on Saturday evening; and those saints, with a spirit akin to that of Saint Catherine of Alexandria, bravely sat up all night that they might present themselves at the altar with their hair not disarranged. That was perfectly sweet and religious, was it not? For my part, dear Miss Juno, after I had been to the church several times, and studied it carefully inside and out, I did not wonder that that particular ecclesiastical style was called Frippery.

Yesterday, you remember, I had the pleasure of meeting you as I was promenading in the company of a friend of mine, a man about town, as he is called: which means, apparently, a man of leisure who is fond of society, and frequents clubs, and is familiar with gossip. My friend's name is Pry—of the famous Pry—a grandson of Paul, and named Peter Paul. Mr. Peter Paul Pry said to me, after we had saluted each other and he had politely raised his hat, "Who is that young woman?"

I replied "That is Miss Juno Hundredweight." Then he said, "I have seen her often at church."

I expressed my surprise, perhaps rather too strongly and suddenly, for I said, "Do you go to church?"

Mr. Pry looked at me with some surprise, so that I felt quite rebuked for the doubt implied in my question, and then he replied, "Of course I go to church. I can there see every variety of the fashion at a glance. Why, my dear Mr. Bachelor, a morning in church is worth a week's promenading upon the Avenue. I assure you I can name the very week when the fashionable color changed from Bismarck brown to Metternich green. There's nothing like it, and I advise you to go to church at least once a month. I'll tell you where to look. I know where to find the first dawn of a new mode, as a man in the country knows where to look for the first yellow violets."

Now, my dear Miss Juno, he said nothing further of you, but I knew instantly that you are one of those who enable Mr. Peter Paul Pry to study the fluctuations of fashion, and that, therefore, you do not go to church for naught. For myself there was a time when I thought that the phrase, "a fashionable church," was as absurd as "a religious ballet." Pray, what has fashion to do with church? Is there a fashion in religion? Mr. Peter Paul Pry says yes. He insists that there is as much fashion in religion as in street dresses or dinner toilettes.

"Why," he said to me as we discussed this very subject yesterday, after we had enjoyed the honor of meeting you, "do you suppose that our friend Mrs. Tilbury left the denomination in which she was bred because of religious conviction? Pooh! she goes where it is the thing to go! Fashion! why, if you and I had been born Turks in Constantinople we should have been Mohammedans. We are born in America, and therefore we are Protestants. And I, for my part, go to the church that I frequent because it is the fashionable church. Tra, la, la! Piff, paff, pouff! Tara, papa, poum! Je suis moi, le General Boum, Boum."

These sallies of Mr. Pry do not seem to me always in the best taste, and I am sure that they will not seem so to you; but I really think there is often a good deal of sense in them. He is, however, evidently mistaken when he speaks of a fashionable religion. Religion is not subject to fashion, and can not be any more than love or any other of the elemental emotions. There may be plenty of imitations, and affectations, and parodies, and burlesques of them; but the emotion itself is always as fresh and genuine as it is universal. Fashionable religion is merely a phrase to describe a form of faith at whose offices fashionable people prefer to be present. A fashionable church is an edifice consecrated to one of the noblest purposes, and prostituted to the meanest by Miss Juno Hundredweight and Company.

Yes, my dear Miss Juno, just that; very pitiful are you and your friends with your flaunting airs, and—excuse me—damnable graces in the House of God. There you sit green with envy if Mrs. Tilbury or Mrs. Stanhope has a more exquisite bonnet or a newer style of skirt-trimming. You can describe to me the bonnet of every woman whom you think fashionable enough to study. You calculate the cost of every collar, of every garment, of every fall of lace. Your own clothes and those of your neighbors—these are your Sunday contemplation. Oh, of course, you kneel at the proper times, and rise and respond, and hold your head toward the pulpit, and do any thing but stare about the church. And, of course, if some young man joins you as you come out and says that he wishes the Reverend Doctor had drawn it a little stronger, or that for his part he prefers his milk without water, you reprove him with your eyes, and say to him, gravely, that you do not wish to hear him make light of such subjects. And at the very same moment your train is—or was when it was just now the fashion—dragging behind you out of church, and your eyes are devouring a love of a bonnet which had escaped them within, and you are wondering why Mrs. Pound will wear an old-fashioned collar. Making light of such subjects, is it! What subjects? What are you there for? Do you know what the Doctor said? He said that it was easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for you to enter the kingdom.

My dear Miss Juno, you do not believe it. If you heard the words they were merely the old commonplace of the Bible. It was proper for the Doctor to say it, and to add that riches have wings. But if he had said, Juno Hundred-weight, you can not enter the kingdom of heaven with that bonnet; and Mrs. Tilbury, you can not enter it in that velvet jacket; and Mrs. Stanhope, you can not go in with that lace handkerchief, he would have spoken the simple truth, and all you bedizened women would have howled at what you would have called his blasphemy and horrible impiety and wicked personality.

And yet, what does the text mean? Do you suppose it means that Mr. Astor, and Mr. Stewart, and Mr. Vanderbilt can not go to heaven? Do you suppose it means that Stephen Girard is somewhere else? No, my dear Miss Juno, it means that when your mind and heart and soul are full of dress and fashion and balls and Mrs. Tilbury and Mrs. Grundy they have no room for the emotions and thoughts and inexpressible serene spiritual delights that are truly heavenly and heaven. And every Sunday you go to church, apparently supposing that the change of place from your own home to the church building, and the hearing certain things said and seeing certain other things done, and doing and saying certain things yourself, is religious worship. You poor little woman! do you remember that sentence, I am a Spirit, and they that worship me must worship in spirit and in truth? Not in Metternich green nor in Bismarck brown; not in a gold brooch nor a faint breath of a bonnet; not in gilt bands and artificial flowers and exquisite lace—but in spirit and in truth.

No. I protest that there is no more melancholy sight than the throng that enters a fashionable church on Sundays. And you need not reply that I have a prejudice against fashionable people, and that probably I do not suppose any body can be really virtuous except in a gingham gown and a wadded hood. Far from it, I assure you; I do not think virtue seriously depends upon clothes, although I grant that I do not think most people half starved and wrapped in rags are likely to be very virtuous. But this I do think: that the Tilbury set to which you belong is a serious impediment to the development of virtue in the city. There are very very many people in and out of town, like my young country friend Lucy Jessamine, who look to you, with others, as their models. And your conduct degrades and disgraces all noble things. Literally, your pride is in your shame. Tell me, Miss Juno, does a young woman learn modesty, simplicity, generosity, self-sacrifice, a true courtesy, from watching you and studying your career? Does a young man feel his respect for women heightened, and his boldness repressed, and his politeness refined by frequenting your society?

I stand sometimes by the church door, and I see you coming. Your dress is wonderful to behold, and I observe that you are fully conscious of it. All the women look, and turn to look again. If it is a short skirt, it is too short; if it is long it is too long, and sweeps all the filth of the street. You are a walking figure of the modiste's window. As you approach I think only of fast women, and as you pass into church all the men who are near wink when you have passed, smile, and say, "Isn't she a stunner?" Then I think of a young, lovely, modest woman—such as every man imagines when he dreams of another life than mine—the pride of a father, the delight of a mother: gentle and sweet, and neat and simple: not anxious for the admiration of a woman like Mrs. Tilbury, nor the nod of another like Mrs. Stanhope; whose mild and gracious manner is as different from that of the fast woman as a fawn is different from a hippopotamus; a woman whom every man instinctively honors, and who makes all women nobler in his eyes; and, oh my fair young lady, her name is not Juno Hundredweight. It is not you, Miss Juno, of whom Mr. Thackeray wrote those simple lines:

"The minster bell tolls out
Above the city's rout,
And noise and humming;
They've hushed the minster bell;
The organ 'gins to swell;
She's coming, she's coming!

"My lady comes at last,
Timid and stepping fast,
And hastening hither,
With modest eyes downcast;
She comes—she's here, she's past—
May Heaven go with her!"

Dear Miss Juno, think of these things a little. Try and conceive what it is to have "modest eyes downcast," not outwardly only, but within. Yours, as you deserve,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CARPETS.

A PROPOS of the first of May moving we give our readers some information in regard to the styles of house-furnishing now most in vogue. Carpets are now sold at more reasonable prices than at any time since the war. Small figures are preferred for the two-ply carpets used for chambers. Light grounds of unfading colors and even white, it is said, will not show soil and uselike darker green and crimson surfaces. Scotch ingrains may be bought as low as $1 a yard, but the best quality is $1 45. Many persons prefer the better qualities of ingrain to the more expensive three-plys, as the third ply is apt to fray. Tapestry Brussels of gay medallions is sold at $1 50. The body Brussels is very much better at $2 and $2 25 a yard. This is woven in the intricate Turkish and Persian patterns—geometrical figures that bewilder one in the attempt to trace them. Velvet carpets at $3 a yard are in rich warm colors and in double widths, the whole medallion perfect in one width for $6 a yard. Axminster and the French Moquette are the handsomest of all and very similar. The French, however, cleanse their wools more perfectly, and better understand blending of color. The Moquette has a deep thick pile, with designs like tapestry, China blue grounds, lavender, pink, and scarlet grounds, with white oval and octagonal figures covered with branches of blossoms and rustic devices; $6 50 a yard is the price.

Mottled grounds, in which one color prevails, are made with borders for halls and staircases.

A marvel in the way of tapestry carpets was purchased at the French Exposition by Mr. A. T. Stewart, for his new house in Fifth Avenue, at a cost of 27,000 francs. It is a large square, for a reception-room, and is of fine reps, like Empress cloth, but thicker and firmer. The border is of the purplish red amaranth color, with a vine of oak-leaves and acorns, with a coat of arms at one side. The centre represents a castle by the sea in Massilia. Flags are floating from the towers, and the statuary in the niches is plainly seen. There are pleasure-boats on the water, and a large vessel is coming into port. The sailors in the rigging are easily distinguished. In the back-grounds are mountains with forts on every peak. The blue sky of Greece blends with the water at the horizon, and finishes a lovely picture that it seems profane to tread upon.

FURNITURE.

There is a revival of the fashions of the last century in furniture as well as in matters of the toilette. Deep, spacious sofas with straight backs, large square framed chairs, and ottomans with arms replace the curved divans and round arm-chairs so long in use. The same uniformity of color that now pervades a lady's costume is also seen in a tastefully-furnished room. Walls, curtains, carpets, and furniture harmonize in shade.

The woods most in favor are walnut, rose-wood, and the curled maple. Mahogany is scarcely seen at all. Silver-wood is maple stained to represent a light silver-gray. Curled maple that very much resembles oak and chestnut are made into chamber suits with walnut ornaments. The American walnut is frequently decorated with panels of French walnut, which has a singular grain. Medallions of bronze and of painted porcelain are favorite ornaments. A great deal of gilding is used in Greek borders and other delicate tracery. Black walnut throws the gilt into better relief than rose-wood or maple. A purplish red wood called amaranth, the polished ebony and satin-wood, the tulip and holly, are selected for the beautiful mosaic inlaying that is now a feature in handsome pieces of furniture.

CHAMBER SUITS.

A mistaken impression exists that the leading houses do not manufacture any but high-priced furniture, and people who are compelled to economize attempt to do so by going to cheap establishments. At the most reliable houses there may be found at reasonable prices all the essential articles made in as good style and workmanship as are the most expensive designs. Of course they are less elaborate. There are chamber suits of solid black walnut sold at $150 of the same size and pattern as those worth $1000. At another house there can be bought for $290 a suit of American walnut with panels and medallions of French walnut, with handsome reps on the sofa and chairs, French plate mirrors, and pure Vermont marble, made in as good style as a suit worth $1800. Similar styles in rose-wood are $350.

The handsomest suit shown us is of silver-wood, or stained maple, ornamented with a line of ebony, on which is traced a Grecian border in gilt. The bed has a canopy lined with fluted blue satin, and a valance of the same in rich folds bordered with fringe. At the sides are tufted cushions. A bronze medallion in the centre of the high head-board represents a maiden bending over a lily stalk to drink moisture from the flower cup. In this set there is a table of inlaid woods, an escritoire, a long toilette-glass for a gentleman, ladies' dressing bureau, commode, and a chiffonier with shallow drawers for laces and handkerchiefs. The half dozen drawers of the chiffonier are fastened with a single lock. The sofas, lounges, and easy-chairs are covered with blue satin.

A plainer suit is of black walnut, inlaid with French and Turkish woods, and decorated with a vine of leaves of dead gold. The head-board of the bed is very high, the sides plain, and cushioned with crimson terry reps; the foot low, with rounded corners.

ENAMELED FURNITURE.

Among the inexpensive styles of furniture that come within the means of people in moderate circumstances, the enameled chamber suits are tasteful and substantial. Suits consisting of bed, bureau, wash-stand, table, and chairs, may be bought as low as $28, and as high as $225. Those at the lowest price are grained to represent oak, maple, and chestnut; the mirrors are small, and they are without marble tops. At a higher price some walnut is used in the decorations, and the most expensive are enameled as smooth and glossy as porcelain. There are white grounds, or light fawn color, French gray, China blue, and sometimes the deep Prussian blue. The decorations are bands of gilt, with medallions of flowers or a monogram. French plate mirrors are used with these, and large slabs of the colored Italian marble, or, if preferred, the pure white marble from Brandon, Vermont, called by dealers statuary marble.

It is objected to these painted suits that their light color is easily soiled and defaced, but it may be as readily cleansed with soap and water without injuring the polish. We have seen a suit repaired after being in use nineteen years, and made to look perfectly fresh and new. For country houses with painted walls this style of furniture is well adapted, as it may be made of precisely the same shade as the walls, with drapery and carpets, presenting a perfect harmony of color. A country house now being fitted up by a New York merchant has its white, blue, green, and buff rooms. The monogram of the lady is gilded on each piece of furniture. A pretty suit, intended as a birthday gift for a young lady, is of rose pink, with her monogram in gilt. The curtains are of pink silk, and the same color predominates in the carpet. Chairs with rounded backs, and seats made of fine cane, are bordered with facings of velvet or plush for chamber use. The facing is fastened on with gimp and large nail-heads of brass or of steel. Turkish lounges are of luxuriant, graceful patterns. A new and ingenious easy-chair may be opened out into a long couch. Work-tables have covers of inlaid woods or of colored marbles. Commodes and bureaux are topped with Italian marble of delicate colors. Ladies' escritoirs of French walnut inlaid with amaranth have round doors that revolve like magic when the desk-lid is opened, disclosing pigeon-holes and drawers lined with satin-wood. Secret drawers at the bottom of the desk are revealed when a hidden spring is touched.

DINING-ROOMS AND LIBRARIES.

Walnut supersedes oak for dining-rooms. High buffets of solid walnut are ornamented with bronze medallions of game, of fish, or of fruit. A large mirror is sometimes preferred at the back, as it displays silver to good advantage. A massive side-board of three different grains of walnut has a broad slab of marble from the Pyrenees. The sofas and arm-chairs are inlaid with Pyrenean marble on the back, and fitted up with striped tapestry.

Wooden mantles are being introduced for dining-rooms and libraries. They have a warmer appearance than marble, and seem more home-like. Drapery of tapestry like the curtains is arranged to fall from the mantle-shelf. A mantle of walnut made to match. The buffet just described has an antique bronze bas-relief over the fire-place. A clock of carved wood, as artistically executed as the Swiss carving is on the mantle-shelf. An immense mirror fills up the large frame.

For plainer rooms cane-seat and morocco chairs are made in the new styles. The pedestal of the extension-table is carved to match the chairs.

Brown and green are favorite colors for libraries, with decorations on the walnut wood of steel and bronze, but not gilt. Woolen reps, at $3 a yard, is used for upholstering of plain libraries, and the handsome terry reps, at $9 a yard, for those more elaborate. Mantles are made en suite with the book-cases. Low cabinet book-cases are preferred to those of inconvenient height with drawers beneath.

DRAWING-ROOMS.

Heavy woolen reps is made up for parlor furniture in the same graceful designs that are used for more expensive materials. Two sofas, large and spacious. An arm-chair for gentlemen, a crinoline-chair for ladies, and four smaller reception-chairs form a set that almost furnishes a small parlor. With walnut frames and upholstered with crimson or blue reps the eight pieces are sold for $175 or $200.

For handsome rooms the fine terry reps and satins of brilliant sheen are preferred to satin damask. Marquis easy-chairs, ample and comfortable, are distributed about the room. Etagères are out of style. Low cabinets of inlaid woods replace them. In corners of rooms are three-sided cabinets, or pedestals for busts, instead of whatnots. Mantle-glasses reach to the ceiling, and are framed like the long, narrow pier glasses to match the furniture. Solid sheets of Belgian plate-glass fill the fire-place when grates are not used. Pedestals for ornaments and statuary are in the Egyptian coffin-shapes. Tables of inlaid wood in mosaics, and borders of bronze bas-reliefs, take the place of the marble tops. Instead of branching hat-trees there are large mirrors heavily framed with walnut, with silver and umbrella racks are of colored marble. Hall chairs and short sofas are of cane with walnut frames, and occasionally of solid wood elaborately carved.

Where there are several drawing-rooms in a house reception-rooms and boudoirs are fitted up in the gay Pompadour styles, and are exact copies of pictures of French salons in the days of Louis Quinze. Satin thickly tufted is used for upholstery in rich colors, cerise, Pompadour-pink, China-blue, pea-green, and light-fawn color. Velvet borders of contrasting colors are used—for instance white and scarlet, or blue and gray. The solid wooden frames are heavily gilded, and decorated with medallions of Sèvres porcelain. This very properly belongs to the Pompadour sets, as that Marchioness is said to have founded at Sèvres the manufactory of this beautiful china.

The Aubusson and Neuilly tapestries are, however, in better keeping with the Pompadour styles than solid colored satins. The ground-work is of light tints, pearl, gray, and green, with medallion centres of brilliant coloring of French devices, a shepherd's crook and hat, amidst wreaths of flowers, rustic pipes, birds and fruit. One pattern is an Italian villa with figures on the balcony, and a gondola on the blue waters. This tapestry is made like the famous Gobelin tapestry, woven only for the nobility. It is a thick, fine reps, with the coloring partly woven in the warp, and the design perfected by needle-work. Coverings for reception-chairs come in square pieces, a different design for the seat and back, with pieces for the arms. One of the finest, valued at $300, is a farm-yard landscape with Reynard robbing the hen-roost. Lambrequins and ottoman covers come in separate pieces. Carpets of this tapestry are occasionally brought here at great expense. The Axminster and Moquette carpets are in precisely the same colors and designs at less expense.

Gilded woods, with inlayings of porcelain, are used for the frame-work of tapestry. Sèvres jardinières mounted with gilt, and porcelain table-tops on fine gilt bronze are appropriate in these boudoirs. There are pedestals of blue velvet with porcelain medallions, and fringed drapery, and costly tables of amaranth and satin-wood, an agricultural device in the centre made of woods in their natural color, as accurately represented as if painted in oils. A pair of arm-chairs of the real Gobelin tapestry are now exhibited by a leading house in New York. The frames are white wood elegantly carved and gilded. The tapestry is a light fawn ground, with figures on the seat and back wrought in high colors to represent astronomy and geography. They are valued at $1800.

Lack of space compels us to postpone all details respecting curtains, china, etc., until next week.

Thanks are due Messrs. W. & J. SLOANE; HASTINGS & NEWELL; A. T. STEWART & CO.; WARREN WARD & CO.; POTTIER & STYMUS; and IRA E. WALRAVEN.

PERSONAL.

MISS DIX is quite a belle in Parisian society. She recently occupied a place at Madame DE BORNEMANN's table in the Princess METTERNICH's charity fair, and, it is said, is shortly to be married.

—Undoubtedly the ablest of the President's counsel in the impeachment case is Mr. WILLIAM M. EVARTS. His look, air, and manner are in the highest degree intellectual and legal. His dress is neat and faultless. His voice is round and sweet, with full tenor tones, which delight the ear. He talks as if he had known nothing but law since he left the cradle, and there is nothing but law in him. He is incapable of attractive flights of oratory, but is capable of presenting the strongest points of his side of any case in the fewest words possible. He was never known to display temper, or permit himself to be thrown off his balance by an opponent. Socially, he is one of the most genial and agreeable of men, and, at dinner, delightful.

—The Rev. Dr. CHAPIN is said to receive a salary of $12,000 per annum. Besides this, so great is the personal regard felt for him by the members of his congregation, that they recently made him a present of the house he lives in, valued at $38,000. They are quite aware of having a good Chapin in their pulpit and don't mean to lose him for lack of good treatment.

—Young PHINEAS YOUNG, a son of old B. Y., recently died at Salt Lake. He is said to have been clever, and a painter of considerable promise. He was only twenty.

—Prince LEOPOLD, not being of the muscular sort, is being brought up by his queenly mother to play the rôle of "special friend and patron of social, artistic, and literary progress."

—Count BISMARCK, in addition to his duties as Prime Minister of Prussia, has assumed the vocation of a publisher, his first work being of a comic character. It was simply a portfolio, bound like a book, in which were deposited five thousand thalers. On meeting his Secretary next day the count asked him if he had perused the volume. "Yes, your highness; and I am so captivated by its contents that I am waiting the appearance of the second volume with feelings of the greatest interest." The Count winked a little wink, but said nothing. A few days afterward the Secretary received a second portfolio, bound and filled like the first, and on the title of which was the sentence: "This work is complete in two volumes."

—The Bazar of the 25th ult. alluded to the preaching of young Lord RADSTOCK, one of the "Plymouth Brethren," in the salon of Lady HARRIET COWPER, in Paris. Of Lady HARRIET we are told that she is "an elderly but very distinguished-looking woman, with beaux restes of beauty, notwithstanding considerable embonpoint, who does the honors of her salon with unaffected grace. She is a pleasant, amiable person, and very charitable. For more about her antecedents, the curious may be referred to Dr. MADDEN's life of her step-mother, the Countess of BLESSINGTON, an extremely entertaining work published by HARPER & BROTHERS.

—Another lady-preacher—Miss JOSEPHINE LAPHAM, of Woodstock, Ohio, has been licensed to preach by the Winchester Association of that State. She is a graduate of Antioch College, and was a classmate of the Rev. OLYMPIA BROWN.

—Mr. DICKENS, whose readings in this country will have closed prior to the date of this paper, has made a decided pecuniary success, though not of the huge kind that many have supposed. He never expects to come to this country again—never.

—Not long since the Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, on his way to the Capitol, met a poor woman in great distress. She told him that she had nothing to buy food for her children. "What a lucky woman you are," said Mr. STEVENS; "I have just found what you have lost!" putting his hand into his pocket and giving her a five-dollar bill.

—President ANDREW D. WHITE, of the Cornell University, was rather rapid when a youngster. He was sent to Hobart College, Geneva, of which his father was a great patron; but he didn't like Hobart, so packed up his shirts and stockings and ran away to New Haven, whence he graduated in the regular way, and with distinction. He is now opposed to any sudden exodus from college.

—If ROSSINI had not been born in leap-year he would have had seventy-six birth-days. As it is he has had but nineteen.

—The Newspaper Press Fund people are to have a Duke (CAMBRIDGE) to preside at their annual dinner on the 6th of June, in London.

—Bishop QUINTARD, of Tennessee, has been lecturing on the subject of popular education, at Cambridge. He said that the question of education was now, of all questions, one of the most vital importance to the people and Church of England. Knowledge was power, but it must be sanctified knowledge if it was to give peace to the individual, to the nation, and to the Church. He agreed with educating the masses, but let the education be a Christian one. Secular education alone would be treason to God and ruin to the race. He condemned the secular education of the United States, which he said might and did do a good thing in training citizens for the business of life; but without a religious education a man could not be trained for the duties of life.

—Dr. CUMMING's declaration that "Ritualism is the highway to Rome" is receiving confirmation. Two more clergymen of the Church of England have joined the Church of Rome, one of whom was a Scotch incumbent, and chaplain to the Bishop of Brechin.

—Mrs. BROWNE, the mother of "ARTEMUS WARD," is on a visit to the proprietor of the Biddeford (Maine) Democrat. Within a few years she has lost a husband and all of her children, and has now but very few relatives living, being nearly alone in the world, though by no means friendless. She never tires of talking of her "son," and those who were intimate with him readily see, on acquaintance with his mother, that the great source of his wit and humor was a maternal one, and that the wit of poor "ARTEMUS" was mother-wit in a double sense.

—WHITTIER, the poet, has made an observation that will strike every magazinist and newspaper writer as being quite true, viz.: "It is a little remarkable that some of the best contributions to our periodical literature are made by writers who never had the good or ill fortune to publish a book, and whose names are not included in the guild of authorship."

—Those two strong-bodied ladies, Miss HARRIETT HOSMER, the artist, and Miss CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, are spoken of by a letter-writer as being often seen in public in Rome—the former driving a handsome span rapidly along the streets, or at other times on horseback, making her way (in which latter capacity she excels) to the meet of the fox-hounds on the Campagna. The pack this year is good, the sport fair, and the amusement very fashionable. Miss HOSMER is an expert rider, and both she and Miss CUSHMAN are often seen going at a furious pace over walls, fences, and ditches close upon the heels of the hounds. Each of these ladies has a strong and tireless energy, and a muscular physique which many a man may well envy. They are gifted with wonderful endurance, which the latter has the occasion often to display upon the stage, and with which many of your readers are familiar. Both are thoroughly American, yet of strong and impressive individuality, that brings them out in striking contrast to the rest of society in Rome.

—Mr. WINWOOD READE, an African traveler of some note, who spent part of last year in this city and Boston, has determined to resume his travels in Africa. He will commence by exploring the Assinie River, of which scarcely any thing is known. Mr. READE will travel under the auspices of the Royal Geographical Society, and with the liberal co-operation of Mr. SWANZY, a Fellow of the Society.

—General WILLIAM SCHOULER, one of the cleverest of New England journalists, has nearly completed his History of Massachusetts during the War. He was Adjutant-General of the State during that period.

—Mrs. BLOOMER, who was the first in this country to don the peculiar drapery that has since gone by her name, is now endeavoring to improve the manners and purify the minds of the polygamists who style themselves "Latter Day Saints," by lecturing to them. Which they need.

—Mr. JOHN B. GOUGH has become celebrated as a rooster and hen man. At a late exhibition of crows and cacklers at Worcester, Massachusetts, the man showed 110 lots of rare fowls.

—Madame GRIST, or more correctly Mrs. MARIO, has three daughters who promise to equal their mother in voice and in person. They sing in salons, and will probably soon come before the foot-lights.

—A curious character has just deceased in Wales. His name was MORGAN OWEN; and, although he was eighty years old, he had never been more than four miles from home, had never written a letter in his life, neither had he ever received one. Yet he was a poet of considerable local celebrity.

—There are to be more paragraphs about Mrs. LINCOLN. Her former modiste, Mrs. ELIZABETH KECKLERS (colored), is about to publish a book called "Behind the Scenes," in which she gives a history of Mrs. L.'s attempt to dispose of her wardrobe, which places the matter in a new light. At one time she was employed by Mrs. JEFFERSON DAVIS. But why write a book about any one's clothes?

—The Bishop of WINCHESTER is very ill. In case of his death it is supposed that the Bishop of OXFORD will be his successor, as the QUEEN is desirous that Bishop WILBERFORCE should have the prelate of the Order of the Garter, which pertains to the See of Winchester. The See is worth about $40,000 per annum.

—A "female LEOTARD" is the latest addition to the sights of London. "Symmetrical in figure and muscular in development," writes a daily paper, rapturously describing the exhibition, "this accomplished mistress of the acrobatic art swings from bar to bar across the arena.... It may be necessary to assure a public invited to witness this new development of female industry, that it is commendably free from any thing suggestive of the disagreeable or the indecorous." The new development of female industry has been already patronized by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It is a pity that the trapeze requires exceptional qualifications in a lady: it must be more profitable and generally less humiliating than acting as governess.

—The dress which Mrs. ADAMS wore at the QUEEN's last Court, and which is said to have excited general admiration, is thus described by an impartial historian: "Dress of mauve poult de soif, trimmed with plisses à la LOUIS XV. in mauve and white; with tunique of white dentelle de laine, looped with mauve lilies; train from the shoulders of white satin, trimmed with tulle and bouquets of mauve lilies. Head-dress of lilies, feathers, and long tulle veil: ornaments, diamonds and pearls."

LADY DENZIL.

IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

THUS the world went softly on, till the roses of June had come instead of the spring crocuses. Every thing went on softly at the Green. True, there was a tragedy now and then, even among us, like that sad affair of Everard Stoke; and sometimes a very troublesome complication, going near to break some hearts, like that of Nelly Fortis—but for the most part we were quiet enough. And that was a very quiet time. Little Mary had grown the pet of the Green before June. The little Damerels, who were nice children enough, were not to be compared with her; and then there were so many of them, whereas Mary was all alone like a little star. We all petted her—but she was one of the children whom it is impossible to spoil. She was never pert or disagreeable, like little Agatha Damerel. She had her little childish fits of temper by times, but was always sorry and always sweet, with her soft appealing eyes—a little woman, but never knowing or forward, like so many children nowadays. She was still but a baby, poor darling, not more than seven years old, when that dreadful scene broke in upon our quietness which I have now to tell.

It was June, and there was a large party on the lawn before the Lodge. As long as the season lasted, while there were quantities of people in town, Lady Denzil often had these parties. We were all there of course; every body on the Green whom she visited (and I used to be very sorry for Mrs. Wood and her daughters when one of them was going to take place). We were in the habit of meeting continually in the same way, to see the young people play croquet and amuse themselves; and there was perhaps a little monotony in it. But Lady Denzil always took care to have some variety. There would be a fine lady or two from town, bringing with her a whiff of all the grandeurs and gayeties we had no particular share in, and setting an example to the girls in their dress and accessories. I never was extravagant in my dress, nor encouraged such a thing—indeed no lady ever does—but a real fashionable perfect toilette is generally so complete, and charming, and harmonious, that it is good for one to see it now and then, especially for girls, though of course ignorant persons and men don't understand why. And then there were a few gentlemen—with all the gossip of the clubs, and town talk, which made a very pleasant change to us. It was an unusually brilliant party that day. There was the young Countess of Berkhamstead, who was a great beauty and had married so strangely; people said the Earl was not very right in his head, and told the oddest stories about him. Poor thing, I fear she could not help herself—but she was the loveliest creature imaginable, and very nice then, though she went wrong afterward. She sat by Lady Denzil's side on the sofa, which was placed just before the great bank of roses. It was pretty to see them together: the lovely young lady, with her fits of gaiety and pretty languid stillnesses, letting us all admire her as if she felt what a pleasure it was to us; and the lovely old lady, so serene, so fair, so kind. I don't know, for my part, which was the more beautiful. There were other fine ladies besides Lady Berkhamstead, and as I have just said, it was a very brilliant party. There never was a more glorious day: the sky was a delight to look at, and the rich, full foliage of the trees clustered out against the blue, as if they leaned caressing upon the soft air around them. The breath of the roses went every where, and behind Lady Denzil's sofa they threw themselves up into space—great globes of burning crimson, and delicate blush, and creamy white. They were very rich in roses at the Lodge—I remember one wall quite covered with the Gloire de Dijon—but that is a digression. It was a broad lawn, and left room for several sets of croquet-players, besides all the other people. The house was on a higher level at one side, the grounds and woods behind, and in front over the ha-ha we had a pretty glimpse of the Green, where cricket was being played, and the distant houses on the other side. It was like fairy-land, with just a peep of the outer world, by which we kept hold upon the fact that we were human, and must trudge away presently to our little houses. On the grass before Lady Denzil little Mary was sitting, a little white figure, with a brilliant picture-book which somebody had brought her. She was seated sideways, half facing to Lady Denzil, half to the house, and giving every body from time to time a look from her tender eyes. Her white frock, which blazed in the sunshine, was the highest light in the picture, as a painter would have said, and gave it a kind of centre. I was not playing croquet, and there came a moment when I was doing nothing particular, and therefore had time to remark upon the scene around me. As I raised my eyes, my attention was all at once attracted by a strange figure, quite alien to the group below, which stood on the approach to the house. The house, as I have said, was on a higher level, and consequently the road which approached it was higher too on the summit of the bank which sloped down toward the lawn. A woman stood above gazing at us. At first it seemed to me that she was one of the servants: she had a cotton gown on, and a straw bonnet, and a little black silk cloak. I could not say that she was shabby or wretched-looking, but her appearance was a strange contrast to the pretty crowd on the lawn. She seemed to have been arrested on her way to the door by the sound of voices, and stood there looking down upon us—a strange, tall, threatening figure, which awoke, I could not tell how, a certain terror in my mind. By degrees it seemed to me that her gaze fixed upon little Mary—and I felt more frightened still; though what could any one have done to the child with so many anxious protectors looking on? However, people were intent upon their games, or their talks, or their companions, and nobody saw her but myself. At last I got so alarmed that I left my seat to tell Sir Thomas of her. I had just made one step toward him, when all at once, with a strange cry, the woman darted down the bank. It was at little Mary she flew: she rushed down upon her like a tempest, and seized the child, crushing up her pretty white frock, and her dear little figure violently in her arms. I cried out too in my fright—for I thought she was mad—and various people sprang from their chairs, one of the last to be roused being Lady Denzil, who was talking very earnestly to Lady Berkhamstead. The woman gave a great, loud, passionate outcry as she seized upon little Mary. And the child cried out too, one single word which in a moment transfixed me where I stood, and caught Lady Denzil's ear like the sound of a trumpet. It was a cry almost like a moan, full of terror and dismay and repugnance; and yet it was one of the sweetest words that ever falls on human ears. The sound stopped every thing, even the croquet, and called Sir Thomas forward from the other end of the lawn. The one word that Mary uttered, that filled us all with such horror and consternation, was "Mamma!"

"SHE TURNED UPON LADY DENZIL, CRUSHING LITTLE MARY STILL CLOSER IN ONE ARM."

"Yes, my darling," cried the woman, holding her close, crumpling, even crushing her up in her arms. "They took you from me when I wasn't myself! Did I know where they were going to bring you? Here! Oh yes, I see it all now. Don't touch my child—don't interfere with my child!—she shan't stay here another day. Her father would curse her if he knew she was here."

"Oh, please set me down," said little Mary.

"Oh, mamma, please don't hurt me. Oh, my lady!" cried the poor child, appealing to her protectress. Lady Denzil got up tottering as she heard this cry. She came forward with every particle of color gone from her face. She was so agitated her lips could scarcely form the words. But she had the courage to lay her hand upon the woman's arm.

"Set her down," she said. "If you have any claim—set her down—it shall be seen into. Sir Thomas—"

The stranger turned upon her. She was a woman about five-and-thirty, strong and bold and vigorous. I don't deny she was a handsome woman. She had big blazing black eyes, and a complexion perhaps a little heightened by her walk in the heat. She turned upon Lady Denzil, shaking off her hand, crushing little Mary still closer in one arm, and raising the other with a wild theatrical gesture.

"You!" she cried; "if I were to tell her father she was with you he would curse her. How dare you look me in the face—a woman that's come after her child! You that gave up your own flesh and blood. Ay! You may stare at her, all you fine folks. There's the woman that sold her son to marry her master. She's got her grandeur, and all she bid for; and she left her boy to be brought up in the streets, and go for a common soldier. And she's never set eyes on him, never since he was two years old; and now she's come and stole my little Mary from me!"

Before this speech was half spoken every soul in the place had crowded round to hear. No one thought how rude it was. Utter consternation was in every body's look. As for Lady Denzil she stood like a statue, as white as marble, in the same spot, hearing it all. She did not move. She was like an image set down there, capable of no individual action. She stood and gazed, and heard it all, and saw us all listening. I can not tell what dreadful pangs were rending her heart; but she stood like a dead woman in the sunshine, neither contradicting her accuser nor making even one gesture in her own defense.

Then Sir Thomas, on whom there had surely been some spell, came forward, dividing the crowd, and took the stranger by the arm. "Set down the child," he said, in a shaking voice. "Set her down. How dare you speak of a mother's rights? Did you ever do any thing for her? Set down the child, woman. You have no business here."

"I never forsook my own flesh and blood," cried the enraged creature, letting poor little Mary almost fall down out of her arms, but keeping fast hold of her. "I've a better right here than any of these strangers. I'm her son's wife. She's little Mary's grandmother, though she'll deny it. She's that kind of woman that would deny it to her last breath. I know she would. She's the child's grandmother. She's my mother-in-law. She's never seen her son since he was two years old. If he hears the very name of mother he curses and swears. Let me alone, I have come for my child! And I've come to give that woman her due!"

"Go!" cried Sir Thomas. His voice was awful. He would not touch her, for he was a gentleman; but the sound of his voice made my very knees bend and tremble. "Go!" he said; "not a word more." He was so overcome at last that he put his hand on her shoulder and pushed her away, and wildly beckoned to the servants, who were standing listening too. The woman grasped little Mary by her dress. She crushed up the child's pretty white cape in her hot hand and dragged her along with her. But she obeyed. She dared not resist his voice; himself, with his old pale hands piteously clasped together and his head bent. He was overwhelmed by shame and trouble, and the shock of this frightful scene. He did not seem able for the first moment to face any one, to lift his eyes to the disturbed and fluttering crowd who were so strangely in the way. And we all stood about thunderstruck, staring in each other's faces, not knowing what to do or to say. Lady Berkhamstead, with the instinct of a great lady, was the first to recover herself. She turned to me, I scarcely know why, nor could she have told why. "I know my carriage is waiting," she said, "and I could not think of disturbing dear Lady Denzil to say good-by. Will you tell her how sorry I am to go away without seeing her?" They all came crowding round me with almost the same words, as soon as she had set the example. And presently Sir Thomas roused up, as it were, from his stupor. And for the next few minutes there was nothing but shaking of hands, and the rolling up of carriages, and an attempt on the part of every body to smile and look as if nothing had happened. "So long as it does not make dear Lady Denzil ill," one of the ladies said. "It is so disagreeable to be so close upon the road. It might have happened to any of us," said another. "Of course the creature is mad; she should be shut up somewhere." They said such words with the natural impulse of saying any thing to break the terrible impression of the scene; but they were all almost as much shocked and shaken as the principals in it. I never saw such a collection of pale faces as those that went from the Lodge that afternoon. I was left last of all. Somehow the woman who had made so dreadful a disturbance had disappeared without any body knowing where. Sir Thomas and I were left alone on the lawn, which ten minutes ago—I don't think it was longer—had been so gay and so crowded. So far as I was myself concerned, that was the most trying moment of all. Every body had spoken to me as if I belonged to the house, but in reality I did not belong to the house; and I felt like a spy as I stood with Sir Thomas all alone. And what was worse, he felt it too, and looked at me with the forced, painful smile he had put on for the others, as if he felt I was just like them, and it was also needful for me.

"I beg your pardon for staying," I said; "don't you think I could be of any use? Lady Denzil perhaps—"

Sir Thomas took my hand and shook it in an imperative way. "No, no," he said, with his set smile. He even turned me toward the gate and touched my shoulder with his agitated hand—half (no doubt) because he knew I meant kindly—but half to send me away.

"She might like me to do something," I said, piteously. But all that Sir Thomas did was to wring my hand and pat my shoulder, and say, "No, no." I was obliged to follow the rest with an aching heart. As I went out one of the servants came after me. It was a man who had been long in the family, and knew a great deal about the Denzils. He came to tell me he was very much frightened about the woman, who had disappeared nobody could tell how. "I'm afraid she's hiding about somewhere," he said, "to come again." And then he glanced round to see that nobody was by, and looked into my face.

"All that about my lady is true," he said—"true as gospel. I've known it this forty years."

"They've been very kind to you, Wellman," I said, indignantly—"for shame! to think you should turn upon your good mistress now."

"Turn upon her!" said Wellman; "not if I was to be torn in bits; but being such a friend of the family, I thought it might be a satisfaction to you, ma'am, to know as it was true."

If any thing could have made my heart more heavy, I think it would have been that. He thought it would be a satisfaction to me to know. And after the first moment of pity was past, were there not some people to whom it would be a satisfaction to know? who would tell it all over and gloat upon it, and say to each other that pride went before a fall? My heart was almost bursting as I crossed the Green in the blazing afternoon sunshine, and saw the cricketers still playing as if nothing had happened. Ah me! was this what brought such sad indulgent experience to Lady Denzil's eyes—was this what made her know by instinct when any thing was wrong in a house? I could not think at first what a terrible accusation it was that had been brought against her. I thought only of her look, of her desperate snatch at the child, of her rush up the steep bank with little Mary in her arms. She could scarcely have lifted the child under ordinary circumstances—what wild despair, what longing must have stimulated her to such an effort! I put down my veil to cover my tears. Dear Lady Denzil! how sweet she was, how tender, how considerate of every body. Blame never crossed her lips. I can not describe the poignant aching sense of her suffering that grew upon me till I reached my own house. When I was there, out of sight of every body, I sat down and cried bitterly. And then gradually, by degrees, it broke upon me what it was that had happened—what the misery was, and the shame.

She must have done it forty years ago, as Wellman said, when she was quite young, and no doubt ignorant of the awful thing she was doing. She had done it, and she had held by it ever since—had given her child up at two years old, and had never seen him again. Good Lord! could any woman do that and live? Her child, two years old. My mind seemed to grow bewildered going over and over that fact—evidently it was a fact. Her child—her own son.

And for forty years! To keep it all up and stand by it, and never to flinch or falter. If it is difficult to keep to a good purpose for so long, what can it be to keep by an evil one? How could she do it? Then a hundred little words she had said came rushing into my mind. And that look—the look she cast after the deserter on the road? I understood it all now. Her heart had been longing for him all the time. She had loved her child more than other mothers love, every day of all that time.

Poor Lady Denzil! dear Lady Denzil! this was the end of all my reasonings on the matter. I went over it again and again, but I never came to any ending but this:—The thing was dreadful; but she was not dreadful. There was no change in her. I did not realize any guilt on her part. My heart only bled for the long anguish she had suffered, and for the shock she was suffering from now.

But before evening on this very same day my house was filled with people discussing the whole story. No one had heard any more than I had heard; but by this time a thousand versions of the story were afloat. Some people said she had gone astray when she was young, and had been cast off by her family, and that Sir Thomas had rescued her; and there were whispers that such stories were not so rare, if we knew all: a vile echo that always rushes into a real tragedy. And some said she was of no family, but had been the former Lady Denzil's maid; some thought it was Sir Thomas's own son that had been thus cast away; some said he had been left on the streets and no provision made for him. My neighbors went into a hundred details. Old Mr. Clifford thought it was a bad story indeed; and the Rector shook his head, and said, that for a person in Lady Denzil's position, such a scandal was dreadful; it was such an example to the lower classes. Mrs. Damerel was still more depressed. She said she would not be surprised at any thing Molly Jackson could do after this. As for Mrs. Wood, who came late in the evening, all agape, to inquire into the news, with something like a malicious satisfaction in her face, I lost all patience when she appeared. I had compelled myself to bear what the others said, but I would not put up with her.

"Lady Denzil is my dear friend," I broke out, not without tears; "a great trouble has come upon her. A madwoman has been brought against her with an incredible story; and when a story is incredible people always believe it. If you want to hear any more, go to other people who were present. I can't tell you any thing; and if I must say so, I won't."

"Good gracious, Mrs. Mulgrave, don't go out of your senses!" said my visitor. "If Lady Denzil has done something dreadful, that does not affect you?"

"But it does affect me," I said, "infinitely; it clouds over heaven and earth; it changes—Never mind; I can not tell you any thing about it. If you are anxious to hear, you must go to some one else than me."

"Well, I am very glad I was not there," said Mrs. Wood, "with my innocent girls. I am very glad now I never made any attempt to make friends with her, though you know how often you urged me to do it. I am quite happy to think I did not yield to you now."

I had no spirit to contradict this monstrous piece of pretense. I was glad to get rid of her any how; for though I might feel myself for an instant supported by my indignation, the blow had gone to my heart, and I had no strength to struggle against it. The thought of all that Lady Denzil might be suffering confused me with a dull sense of pain. And yet things were not then at their worst with my lady. Next morning it was found that little Mary had been stolen away.

CHAPTER IV.

THAT was a dreadful morning on the Green. After the lovely weather we had been having, all the winds and all the fiends seemed to have been unchained. It blew a hurricane during the night, and next day the Green was covered with great branches of trees which had been torn off and scattered about like wreck on a sea-shore. After this came rain. It poured as if the windows of heaven were open, when Sir Thomas himself stepped in upon me like a ghost as I sat at my solitary breakfast. Those twenty-four hours had passed over him like so many years. He was haggard and ashy pale and feeble. His very mind seemed to be confused. "We have lost the child," he said to me, with a voice from which all modulation and softness had gone. "Will you come and see my wife?"

"Lost! Little Mary?" I cried.

And then all his courage gave way. He sat down speechless, with his lips quivering, and bitter tears in his worn old eyes. Then he got up restless and shaking. "Come to my wife," he said. "There was not another word exchanged between us. I put on my cloak with the hood over my head, and went with him on the moment. As we crossed the Green a sort of procession arrived—two or three great vans packed with people, with music and flags, which proceeded to discharge their contents at the 'Barley-Mow' under the soaking rain. They had come for a day's pleasure, poor creatures, and this was the sort of day they got. The sight of them is so associated in my mind with that miserable moment that I don't think I could forget it were I to live a hundred years. It seemed to join on somehow to the tragical breaking-up of the party on the day before. This was nothing but the external elements; but it chimed in with its little sermon on the vanity of all things. My lady was in her own room when I entered the Lodge. The shock had struck her down, as I found, but she was not calm enough or weak enough to go to bed. She lay on a sofa in her dressing-gown; she was utterly pale, not a touch of her sweet color left, and her hands shook as she held them out to me. She held them out, and looked up in my face with appealing eyes, which put me in mind of little Mary's. And then, when I stooped down over her in the impulse of the moment to kiss her, she pressed my hands so in hers, that frail and thin as her fingers were, I almost cried out with pain. Mrs. Florentine, her old maid, stood close by the head of her mistress's sofa. She stood looking on very grave and steady, without any surprise, as if she knew it all.

For a few minutes Lady Denzil could not speak. And when she did, her words came out with a burst, all at once. "Did he tell you?" she said. "I thought you would help me. You have nobody to keep you back; neither husband nor—I said I was sure of you."

"Dear Lady Denzil," I said, "if I can do any thing, to the utmost of my strength—"

She held my hand fast, and looked at me as if she would look me through and through. "That was what I said—that was what I said!" she cried. "You can do what your heart says; you can bring her back to me; my child, my little child! I never had but a little child—never that I knew!"

"I will do whatever you tell me," I said, trying to soothe her; "but oh! don't wear yourself out. You will be ill if you give way."

I said this, I suppose, because every body says it when any one is in trouble. I don't know any better reason. "That's what I'm always telling my lady, ma'am," said Mrs. Florentine; "but she pays no heed to me."

Lady Denzil gave us both a faint little smile. She knew too much not to know how entirely a matter of conventional routine it was that we should say this to her. She made a pause, and then she took my hand once more.

"I ought to tell you," she said, "it is all true—every word. Florentine knows every thing, from the first to the last. I was a poor soldier's widow, and I was destitute. I was too young to know what I was doing, and I was pretty, they said, and there were men that would have taken advantage of my simplicity. But Sir Thomas was never like that. I married him to buy a livelihood for my child; and then he was very good to me. When he married me I was a forlorn young creature, with nothing to give my helpless baby. I gave up my child, Florentine knows; and yet every day, every year of his life, I've followed him in my heart. If he had been living in my sight I could not have known more of him. What I say is every word true, Florentine will tell you. I want you," grasping my hand tightly, "to tell every thing to him."

"To him!" said I, with a gasp of astonishment, not knowing what she meant.

"Yes," said Lady Denzil, holding my hand fast, "to my boy—I want you to see my boy. Tell him there has never been a day I have not followed him in my heart. All his willfulness I have felt was my fault. I have prayed God on my knees to lay the blame on me. That day when I saw the deserter—I want you to tell him every thing. I want you to ask him to give me back the child."

I gave a cry of astonishment; an exclamation which I could not resist. "Can you expect it?" I said.

"Ah yes, I expect it," said Lady Denzil; "not that I have any right—I expect it from his heart. Florentine will tell you every thing. It is she who has watched over him. We never talked of any thing else, she and I; never a day all these forty years but I have figured to myself what my darling was doing; I say my darling," she cried as with a sharp pang, with a sudden gush of tears; "and he is a man and a soldier, and in prison. Think of that, and think of all I have had to bear!"

I could not make any answer. I could only press her hand with a dumb sympathy. As for Mrs. Florentine, she stood with her eyes cast down, and smoothed the chintz cover with her hand, taking no part in look or word. The story was no surprise to her. She knew every thing about it; she was a chief actor in it; she had no need to show any sympathy. The union between her mistress and herself was deeper than that.

"When he married this woman I was ready to believe it would be for his good," said my lady, when she had recovered herself. "I thought it was somehow giving him back what I had taken from him. I sent her presents secretly. He has been very, very willful; and Sir Thomas was so good to him! He took his mother from him; but he gave him money, education, every thing a young man wants. There are many young men," said Lady Denzil, pathetically, "who think but little of their mothers"—and then she made a pause. "There was young Clifford, for example," she added, "and the Rector's brother who ran away—their mothers broke their hearts, but the boys did not care much. I have suffered in every thing he suffered by; but yet if he had been here, perhaps he would not have cared for me."

"That is not possible," I said, not seeing what she meant.

"Oh, it is possible, very possible," she said. "I have seen it times without number. I have tried to take a little comfort from it. If it had been a girl, I would never, never have given her up; but a boy. That was what I thought. I don't defend myself. Let him be the judge—I want him to be the judge. That woman is a wicked woman; she has disgraced him and left him; she will bring my child up to ruin. Ask him to give me back my poor little child."

"I will do what I can," I said, faltering. I was pledged; yet how was I to do it? My courage failed me, as I sat by her dismayed and received my commission. When she heard the tremulous sound of my voice she turned round to me and held my hand close in hers once more.

"You can do every thing," she said. Her voice had suddenly grown hoarse. She was at such a supreme height of emotion that the sight of her frightened me. I kissed her; I soothed her; I promised to do whatever she would. And then she became impatient that I should set out. She was not aware of the rain or the storm. She was too much absorbed in herself even to hear the furious wail of the wind and the blast of rain against the windows. I believe she would have done as much for me. Before Florentine followed me with my cloak I had made up my mind not to lose any more time. It was from her I got all the details: the poor fellow's name, and where he was, and all about him. He had been very wild, Florentine said. Sir Thomas had done every thing for him; but he had not been grateful, and he had been very wild. His wife was an abandoned woman, wicked and shameless; and he too had taken to evil courses. He had strained Sir Thomas's patience to the utmost time after time. And then he had enlisted. His regiment was in the Tower, and he was under confinement there for insubordination. Such was the brief story. "Many a time I've thought, ma'am," said Mrs. Florentine, "if my lady did but know him as she was abreaking of her heart for! If he'd been at home he'd have killed her. But all she knows is that he's her child—to love, and nothing more."

"The Tower is a long way from our railway," I said; "but it does not much matter in a cab."

"Law, ma'am, you're never agoing to-day?" said Florentine. But I had no intention of arguing the question with her. I went into the library to Sir Thomas to bid him good-by. And he too was amazed when I told him. He took my hand as his wife had done, and shook it, and looked pitifully into my face. "It is I who ought to go," he said. But he knew as well as I did that it was impossible for him to go. He ordered the carriage to come round for me, and brought me wine—some wonderful old wine he had in his cellar, which I knew no difference in from the commonest sherry. But it pleased him, I suppose, to think he had given me his best. And before I went away he gave me much more information about the unfortunate man I was going to see. "He is not bad at heart," said Sir Thomas; "I don't think he is bad at heart; but his wife is a wicked woman." And when I was going away he stooped his gray aged countenance over me, and kissed me solemnly on the forehead. When I found myself driving along the wet roads, with the rain sweeping so in the horses' faces that it was all the half-blinded coachman could do to keep them going against the wind, I was so bewildered by my own position that I felt stupid for the moment. I was going to the Tower to see Sergeant Gray, in confinement for disrespect to his superior officer—going to persuade him to exert himself to take his child from his wife's custody, and give her to his mother, whom he did not know. I had not even heard how it was that little Mary had been stolen away. I had taken that for granted, in face of the immediate call upon me. I had indeed been swept up, as it were, by the strong wind of emotion, and carried away, and thrust forward into a position I could not understand. Then I recognized the truth of Lady Denzil's words. I had nobody to restrain me: no husband at home to find fault with any thing I might do; nobody to wonder, or fret, or be annoyed by the burden I had taken upon me. The recollection made my heart swell a little—not with pleasure. And yet it was very true. Poor Mr. Mulgrave, had he been living, was a man who would have been sure to find fault. It is dreary to think of one's self as of so little importance to any one; but perhaps one ought to think more than one does, that if the position is a dreary one, it has its benefits too. One is free to do what one pleases—I could answer to myself; I had no one else to answer to. At such a moment there was an advantage in that.

At the station I met the Rector, who was going to town by the same train. "Bless my soul, Mrs. Mulgrave," he said, "what a dreadful day you have chosen for traveling! I thought there was no one afloat on the world but me."

"There was no choice, Mr. Damerel," I said. "I am going about business which can not be put off."

He was very kind: he got my ticket for me, and put me into a carriage, and did not insist that I should talk to him on the way up. He talked enough himself, it is true, but he was satisfied when I said yes and no. Just before we got to town, however, he returned to my errand. "If your business is any thing I can do for you," he said; "if there is any thing that a man could look after better than a lady, you know how glad I should be to be of any use."

"Thank you," I said. My feelings were not mirthful, but yet I could have burst out laughing. I wonder if there is really any business that a man can do better than a lady, when it happens to be her business and not his? I have never got much help in that way from the men that have belonged to me. And to think of putting my delicate, desperate business in Mr. Damerel's soft, clerical hands, that had no bone in them! He got me a cab, which was something—though to be sure a porter would have done it quite as well—and opened his eyes to their utmost width when he heard me tell the coachman to go to the Tower.

What a drive it was! Our thirty miles of railway was nothing to it; through all those damp, dreary, glistening, London streets—streets narrow and drearily vicious—streets still more drearily respectable; desert lines of warehouses and offices—crowded thoroughfares with dreary vehicles in a lock, and dreary people crowding about surmounted with umbrellas—miles upon miles, streets upon streets, from Paddington to the Tower. I think it was the first drive of the kind I ever took, and if you can suppose me wrapped up in my water-proof cloak, a little excited about the unknown man I was going to see; trying to form my sentences, what I was to say; pondering how I should bring in my arguments best; wondering where I should have to go to find the mother and the child. Poor little Mary! after the little gleam of love and of luxury that had opened upon her, to be snatched off into the dreary world of poverty, with a violent mother whom it was evident she feared! And poor mother too! She might be violent and yet might love her child; she might be wicked and yet might love her child. To go and snatch the little creature back, at all hazards, was an act which to the popular mind would always look like a much higher strain of virtue than dear Lady Denzil's abandonment. I could not defend Lady Denzil, even to myself; and what could I say for her to her son, who knew her not?

At least an hour was lost before I got admittance to Sergeant Gray. As it happened, by a fortunate chance, Robert Seymour was colonel of the regiment, and came to my assistance. But for that I might have failed altogether. Robert was greatly amazed by the request I made him, but of course he did what I wanted. He told me Sergeant Gray was not in prison, but simply confined to his quarters, and that he was a very strange sort of man. "I should like to know what you can want with him," he said. "Yes, of course, I am dreadfully curious—men are—you know it is our weakness. You may as well tell me what you want with Gray."

"It is nothing to laugh about," said I; "it is more tragic than comical. I have a message to him from his mother. And there is not a moment to lose."

"I understand," said Robert, "I am to take myself off. Here is the door; but you must tell me any thing you know about him when you have seen him. He is the strangest fellow in the regiment. I never can make him out."

And in two minutes more I was face to face with Sergeant Gray.

He must have been like his father. There was not a feature in his face which recalled Lady Denzil's. He was an immensely tall, powerful man, with strong chestnut-brown hair, and vigor and life in every line of his great frame. I expected to find a prisoner partially sentimental; and I found a big man in undress, marching freely about his room, with a long pipe by the fire, and his beer and glasses on the table. I had expected a refined man, bearing traces of gentleman written on him, and the fine tastes that became Lady Denzil's son. There was something about him, when one came to look at him a second time—but what was it? Traces of dissipation, a look of bravado, an instant standing to his arms in self-defense, whatever I might have come to accuse him of; and the insufferable cock-comb air which comes naturally to the meanest member of the household troops. Such was the rapid impression I formed as I went in. He took off his cap with an air of amazement yet assurance, but put it on again immediately. I stood trembling before this big, irreverent, unknown man. If the door had been open I think I should have run away. But as it was I had no resource.

"Mr. Gray," I said, all at once, half from cowardice, half to get it over, "I have come to you from your mother."

The man actually staggered as he stood before me—he fell back and gazed at me as if I had been a ghost. "From my mother?" he said, and his lips seemed to refuse articulation. His surprise vanquished him; which was more than with my individual forces I could have hoped to do.

"From your mother," I repeated. "I have come direct from her, where she is lying ill and much shaken. She has told me all her story—and I love her dearly—that is why she sent me to you."

All the time I was speaking he still stood and stared at me; but when I stopped he appeared gradually to come to himself. He brought forward, from where it stood against the wall, very deliberately, another chair, and sitting down, looked at me intently. "If she has told you all her story," he said, "you will know how little inducement I have to listen to any thing she may say."

"Yes," said I, feeling not a fictitious but a real passion swelling up into my throat, "she has told me every thing—more than you can know. She has told me how for forty years—is it forty years?—she has watched over you in secret, spent her days in thinking of you, and her nights in praying for you. Ah, don't smile! if you had seen her pale and broken in all her pride, lying trembling and telling me this, it would have touched your heart."

And I could see that it did touch his heart, being so new and unusual to him. He was not a cynical over-educated man accustomed to such appeals, and to believe them nonsense. And it touched him, being so unexpected. Then he made a little effort to recover himself and the natural bravado of his character and profession. "In all her pride!" he said, bitterly. "Yes, that's very well said; she liked her pride better than me."

"She liked your life better than you," said I—and Heaven forgive me if I spoke like a sophist—"and your comfort. To secure bread to you and education, she made that vow. When she had once made it, she had to keep it. But I tell you what she told me not three hours ago. 'There has never been a day I have not followed him in my heart.' That is what she said. She and her old maid who used to see you and watch over you talked of nothing else. Fancy! you a young man growing up, taking your own way, going against the wishes of your best friends; and your mother, who dared not go to you, watching you from far off, weeping over you, praying on her knees, thinking of nothing else, talking of nothing else when she was alone and dared do it. At other times she had to go into the world to please her husband, to act as if you had no existence. And all the time she was thinking of nothing but you in her heart."

He had got up before I came so far. He was unquestionably moved; his step got quicker and quicker. He made impatient gestures with his hands as if to put my voice away. But all the same he listened to me greedily. When I had done—and I got so excited that I was compelled to be done, for tears came into my throat and choked me—he turned to me with his face strongly swept by winds of feeling. "Who told you?" he cried, abruptly. "Why do you come to disturb me? I was thinking nothing about my circumstances. I was thinking how I could best be jolly in such a position. What do I know about any body who may choose to call herself my mother? Probably I never had a mother. I can do nothing for her, and she can do nothing for me."

"You can do something for her," I cried. "She sent me to you to beg it of you. Sir Thomas saw how your wife was living. He saw she should not have a little girl to ruin. He brought away the child. I was there when he came home. Your mother knew in a moment who it was, though he never said a word. She rushed to her, and fell on her knees, and cried as if her heart would break. She thought God had sent the child. Little Mary is so like her, so like her! You can not think how beautiful it was to see them together. Look! if you don't know what your mother is, look at that face."

He had stood as if stupefied, staring at me. When I mentioned his wife he had made an angry gesture; but his heart melted altogether when I came to little Mary. I had brought Lady Denzil's photograph with me, thinking it might touch his heart, and now I thrust it into his hand before he knew what I meant. He gave one glance at it, and then he fell back into his chair, and gazed and gazed, as if he had lost himself. He was not prepared. He had been willful—perhaps wicked—but his heart had not got hardened like that of a man of the world. It had been outside evils he had done, outside influences that had moved him. When any thing struck deep at his heart he had no armor to resist the blow. He went back upon his chair with a stride, hiding from me, or trying to hide, that he was obliged to do it to keep himself steady. He knitted his brows over the little picture as if it was hard to see it. But he might have spared himself the trouble. I saw how it was. One does not live in the world and learn men's ways for nought. I knew his eyes were filling with tears; I knew that sob was climbing up into his throat; and I did not say a word more. It was a lovely little photograph. The sun is often so kind to old women. It was my lady with all the softness of her white hair, with her gracious looks, her indulgent, benign eyes. And those eyes were little Mary's eyes. They went straight into the poor fellow's heart. After he had struggled as long as he could the sob actually broke out. Then he straightened himself up all at once and looked at me fiercely; but I knew better than to pretend to hear him.

"This is nothing to the purpose," he said; and then he stopped, and nature burst forth. "Why did she cast me upon the world? Why did she give me up? You are a good woman, and you are her friend. Why did she cast me away?"

I shook my head; it was all I could do. I was crying, and I could not articulate. "God knows!" I gasped through my tears. And he got up and went to the window, and turning his back on me, held it up to the light. I watched no longer what he was doing. Nature was working her own way in his heart.

When he came back at last, he came up to me and held out his hand. "Thank you," he said, in a way that, for the first time, reminded me of Lady Denzil. "You have made me think less harshly about my mother. What is it she wants me to do?"

He did not put down the photograph, or give it back to me, but held it closely in his hand, which gave me courage. And then I told him all the story. When I told him how his wife had insulted his mother his face grew purple. I gave him every detail: how little Mary clung to my lady; how frightened she was for the passionate claimant who seized her. When I repeated her little cry, "My lady!" a curious gleam passed over his face. He interrupted me at that point. "Who is my lady?" he said, with a strange consciousness. The only answer I made was to point at the photograph. It made the most curious impression on him. Evidently he had not even known his mother's name. Almost, I think, the title threw a new light for him upon all the circumstances. There are people who will say that this was from a mean feeling; but it was from no mean feeling. He saw by this fact what a gulf she had put between herself and him. He saw a certain reason in the separation which, if she had been a woman of different position, could not have existed. And there is no man living who is not susceptible to the world's opinion of the people he is interested in. He changed almost imperceptibly—unawares. He heard all my story in grave silence. I told him what my lady had said—that he was to be the judge; and henceforward it was with the seriousness of a judge that he sat and listened. He heard me out every word, and then he sat and seemed to turn it over in his mind. So far as I was concerned, that was the hardest moment of all. His face was stern in its composure. He was reflecting, putting this and that together. His mother was standing at the bar before him. And what should I do, did he decide against her? Thus I sat waiting and trembling. When he opened his lips my heart jumped to my mouth. How foolish it was! That was not what he had been thinking of. Instead of his mother at the bar, it was his own life he had been turning over in his mind. It all came forth with a burst when he began to speak: the chances he had lost; the misery that had come upon him; the shame of the woman who bore his name; and his poor little desolate child. Then the man forgot himself, and swore a great oath. "As soon as I am free I will go and get her, and send her to—my lady!" he said, with abrupt, half-hysterical vehemence. And then he rose suddenly and went to the window, and turned his back on me again.

I was overcome. I did not expect it so soon or so fully. I could have thrown myself upon his neck, poor fellow, and wept. Was he the one to bear the penalties of all?—sinned against by his mother in his childhood, and more dreadfully by his wife in his maturity. What had he done that the closest of earthly ties should thus be made a torment to him? When I had come to myself I rose and went after him, trembling. "Mr. Gray," I said, "is there nothing that can be done for you?"

"I don't want any thing to be done for me," he cried, abruptly. The question piqued his pride. "Tell her she shall see yet that I understand the sacrifice she has made," he said. If he spoke ironically or in honesty I can not tell; when his mouth had once been opened the stream came so fast. "I want to go away, that is all," he said, with a certain heat, almost anger; "anywhere—I don't care where—to the Mauritius, if they like, where that fever is. No fear that I should die. I have been brought up like a gentleman—it is quite true. And yet I am here. What was the use? My father was a common soldier. She—But it's no good talking; I am no credit to any body now. If I could get drafted into another regiment, and go—to India or any where—you should see a difference. I swear you should see a difference!" His voice rose high in these last words; then he paused. "But she is old," he said, sinking his voice; "ten years—I couldn't do in less than ten years. She'll never be living then, to see what a man can do."

"She is a woman that would make shift to live, somehow, to see her son come back," I cried. "Give her little Mary, and try."

"She shall have little Mary, by God!" cried the excited man; and then he broke down, and wept. I can not describe this scene any more. I left him, clasping his hands, feeling as if he was my brother; and he had his mother's picture held fast and hidden in his other hand. If that dear touch of natural love had come to him before! But God knows! perhaps he was only ready and open to it then.

But he could not tell me where to seek the child. I had to be content with his promise that when he was free he would restore her to us. I went out from him as much shaken as if I had gone through an illness, and stole out, not to see Robert Seymour, whom I was not equal to meeting just at that moment. But the end of my mission was nearer than I thought. When I got outside there was a group of excited people about the gateway, close to which my cab was waiting me. They were discussing something which had just happened, and which evidently had left a great commotion behind. Among the crowd was a group of soldiers' wives, who shook their heads, and talked it over to each other with lowered voices. "It's well for her she was took bad here, and never got nigh to him," one of them said. "He'd have killed her, I know he would. It's well for her she never got in to tempt that man to her death."

"It was brazen of her to come nigh him at all," said another, "and him so proud. She always was a shameless one. What my heart bleeds for is that poor little child."

"Where is the child?" asked a third. "It would be well for her, poor innocent, if the Lord was to take her too."

I was standing stupefied, listening to them, when I heard a little cry, and the grasp of something at my dress. The cry was so feeble, and the grasp so light, that I might never have noticed it but for those women. I turned round, and the whole world swam round me for a moment. I did what Lady Denzil did—I staggered forward and fell on my knees, though this was not the soft green grass, but a stony London pavement, and clasped little Mary tight, with a vehemence that would have frightened any other child; but she was not frightened. The little creature was drenched with the pitiless rain. She had been tied up in an old shawl, to hide the miserable, pretty white frock, now clogged with mud and soaked with water. Her little hat was glued to her head with the floods to which she had been exposed. I lifted my treasure wildly in my arms, as soon as I had any strength to do it, and rushed with her to my carriage. I felt like a thief triumphant; and yet it was no theft. But my eagerness aroused the suspicions of the soldiers' wives who had been standing by. They explained to me that the child was Sergeant Gray's child; that her mother had been took very bad in a fit, and had been carried off to the hospital; and that I, a stranger, had no right to interfere. I don't know what hurried explanation I made to them; but I know that at last I satisfied their fears, and, with little Mary in my arms, actually drove away.

It was true, though I never could believe it. I got her as easily as if it had been the most natural thing in the world. I could not believe it, even when I held her fast and drew from her her little story. She had been taken away early, very early in the morning, when she ran to the door as soon as she was up to satisfy herself that it rained. No doubt the wretched mother had hung about the grounds all night in the storm and rain to get at the child. She had snatched up little Mary in her arms, and rushed out with her before any one was aware. The child had been dragged along the dreary roads in the rain. If the woman had really loved her, if it had been the passion of a tender mother, and not of a revengeful creature, she never would have subjected the child to this. She was wet to the skin, with pools in her little boots, and the water streaming from her dress. I took her to a friend's house and got dry clothes to put upon her. The unhappy mother had, no doubt, been out all night exposed to the storm. She was mad with rage and misery and fatigue, and probably did not feel her danger at the moment; but just as she reached the Tower to claim, building upon a common opposition to one object, her husband's support, had fallen down senseless, on his very threshold as it were. Nothing, indeed, but madness could have led her to the man whom she had disgraced. When the surrounding bystanders saw that nothing was to be done for her, and that she would not come out of her faint, they had her carried, in alarm, to the hospital. Such was the abrupt conclusion of the tale. Had I known I need not have given myself the trouble of seeing Sergeant Gray—but that, at least, was a thing which I could not find in my heart to regret.

When I took her back Lady Denzil held me in her arms; held me fast, and looked into my face, even before she listened to little Mary's call. She wanted me to tell her of her child—her own child—and I was so weak that I could not speak to her. I fell crying on her tender old bosom, like a fool, and had to be comforted, as if it could be any thing to me—in comparison. I don't know afterward what I said to her, but she understood all I meant. As for Sir Thomas he was too happy to ask any questions. The child had wound herself into his very heart. He sat with little Mary in his arms all that evening. He would scarcely allow her to be taken to bed. He went up with his heavy old step to see her sleeping safe once more under his roof, and made Wellman, with a pistol, sleep in a little room below. But little Mary was safe enough now. Her father was confined in his barrack-room, with my lady's photograph in his hands, and a host of unknown softenings and compunctions in his heart. Her mother was raving wildly in the hospital on the bed from which she was never to rise. I don't know that any one concerned, except myself, thought of this strange cluster of divers fortunes, of tragic misery and suffering, all hanging about the little angel-vision of that child. Sin, shame, misery, every kind of horror and distress, and little Mary the centre of all; how strange it was!—how terrible and smiling and wretched is life!

It is not to be supposed that such a frightful convulsion and earthquake could pass over and leave no sign. Little Mary was very ill after her exposure, and the shadow of death fell on the Lodge. Perhaps that circumstance softened a little the storm of animadversion that rose up in the neighborhood. For six months after Lady Denzil, who had been our centre of society, was never seen out of her own gates. Then they went away, and were absent a whole year. It was the most curious change to every body on the Green. For three months no one talked on any other subject, and the wildest stories were told: stories with just so much truth in them as to make them doubly wild. It was found out somehow that that wretched woman had died, and then there were accounts current that she had died in the grounds at the Lodge—on the road—in the work-house—every where but the real place, which was in the hospital, where every indulgence and every comfort that she was capable of receiving had been given to her, Sir Thomas himself going to town on purpose to see that it was so. And then it was said that it was she who was Lady Denzil's child. It was a terrible moment, and one which left its mark upon every body concerned. Sergeant Gray lost his rank, but got his wish and was drafted into another regiment going to India. I saw him again, I and poor old Mrs. Florentine. But he did not see his mother. They were neither of them able for such a trial. "I will come back in ten years," he said to me. I do not know if he will. I don't know if Lady Denzil will live so long. But I believe if she does for the first time she will see her son.

They returned to the Lodge two years ago, and the neighborhood now, instead of gossiping, is very curious to know whether Lady Denzil ever means to go into society again. Every body calls, and admires little Mary—how she has grown, and what a charming little princess she is; and they all remind my lady, with tender reproach, of those parties they enjoyed so much. "Are we never to have any more, dear Lady Denzil?" Lucy Stoke asked the other day, kneeling at my lady's side, and caressing her soft old ivory-white hand. My lady—to whom her tender old beauty, her understanding of every body's trouble, even the rose-tint in her cheek, have come back again—made no answer, but only kissed pretty Lucy. I don't know if she will give any more parties; but she means to live the ten years.

As for Sir Thomas, he was never so happy in his life before. He follows little Mary about like an old gray tender knight, worshipping the fairy creature. Sometimes I look on and can not believe my eyes. The wretched, guilty mother is dead long ago, and nobody remembers her very existence. The poor soldier has worked himself up to a commission, and may be high in rank before he comes back. If Lady Denzil had been the most tender and devoted of mothers, could things have turned out better? Is this world all a phantasmagoria and chaos of dreams and chances? One's brain reels when Providence thus contradicts all the laws of life. Is it because God sees deeper and "understands," as my lady is so fond of saying? It might well be that He had a different way of judging from ours, seeing well and seeing always what we mean in our hearts.

THE ABSURDITY OF IT.

By C. H. WEBB.

It is all very well, for the poets to tell,
By way of their songs adorning,
Of milkmaids who rouse, to manipulate cows,
At Five o'clock in the morning.
And of moony young mowers who bundle outdoors—
The charms of their straw-beds scorning—
Before break of day, to make love and hay,
At Five o'clock in the morning!

But, between me and you, it is all untrue—
Believe not a word they utter;
To no milkmaid alive does the finger of Five
Bring beaux—or even bring butter.
The poor sleepy cows, if told to arouse,
Would do so, perhaps, in a horn-ing;
But the sweet country girls, would they show their curls
At Five o'clock in the morning?

It may not be wrong for the man in the song—
Or the moon—if anxious to settle,
To kneel in wet grass, and pop, but, alas,
What if he popped down on a nettle?
For how could he see, what was under his knee,
If, in spite of my friendly warning,
He went out of bed and his house and his head,
At Five o'clock in the morning?

It is all very well, such stories to tell,
But if I were a maid, all forlorn-ing,
And a lover should drop, in the clover, to pop,
At Five o'clock in the morning;
If I liked him, you see, I'd say, "Please call at Three;"
If not, I'd turn on him with scolding;
"Don't come here you Flat, with conundrums like that,
At Five o'clock in the morning!"

IMITATION OF PAPIER-MACHE.

A GOOD imitation of this beautiful, but troublesome, work can be produced with far less trouble and expense than by the usual rules observed in doing real papier-mache.

Old fancy tables and chairs which are too shabby for the parlor can be made to look equal to new articles; and among the refuse furniture to be found in the corners of garrets, lumber-rooms, and auction-marts may often be seen fine specimens of antique patterns, odd-looking and quaint, which will answer better for this purpose than any thing which could be made to order.

To prepare a fancy table of this description let the whole be well cleaned, and freed from grease. Then rub the surface well, first with sand-paper, and afterward with pumice, until all the inequalities are smoothed down. Next give the whole a coat of black paint, and when quite dry apply another of black Japan varnish.

While these are drying you can prepare the flowers, leaves, etc. Get some of the finest quality of English furniture chintz, such as has bright-colored flowers, birds, etc., printed upon it. Cut out the designs very carefully, leaving none of the ground-work visible. The bunches of flowers need not be cut entirely in one piece, but in detached sprays, as they can be arranged afterward to better advantage in that way.

When the table is entirely dry, put on the flowers with thin gum-arabic, distributing them according to your own ideas of beauty. If the top is round or oval a wreath around it, with a design of birds, or a bouquet in the centre will look well; if square, corner designs will be more tasteful.

The remainder of the flowers can be arranged around the stem and feet of the table in the most satisfactory style, and when the flowers are all on a little gilding can be applied; a few tendrils, moss-work, leaves, or general fancy touches, may be drawn with the point of a camel's-hair pencil, dipped in gold size.

After the size has remained on for a few minutes, so as to be half dry, lay a sheet of gold leaf over the whole space so occupied, using a gold tip for the purpose. The foil will readily adhere to the parts where the size has been applied, and the superfluous leaf can be removed by rubbing or wiping gently with a soft rag or chamois leather. If care be observed in doing this, the larger pieces can be preserved and used for other places yet to be touched.

If at a loss for patterns in applying this part of the decorations many good ideas can be gathered from the Chinese lacquered articles, waiters, etc., that may be within reach. In some designs small fish-scales, in imitation of pearl, will have a very good effect.

A pretty wreath may be produced by cutting ivy leaves of various sizes, and round pieces to represent berries, out of tinsel or tin-foil; the colored varieties look the best. These may be fastened on to the table while the Japan varnish is still sticky, and if pressed firmly down will adhere very closely.

Arrange them so as to form a wreath, and after the table is entirely dry trace a stem and tendrils with oil paints, using different shades of green, with a little brown for the shading. This will have a beautiful effect.

When the whole design is completed, whether the chintz flowers or the tinsel leaves be used, finish the table with a coat of white varnish—either Damar or Grecian will answer.

Vases of earthenware, stone jars, and also turned wooden vases, plates, etc., can be ornamented in this manner, and although the fine polish and artistic finish of the real papier-mache and pearl work may be wanting, still the general effect will be the same, and will fully repay the time and trouble expended.

EMBROIDERED SQUARE.

Two Embroidered Squares.

THESE embroidered squares may be used for covering toilette cushions, hoods, etc.; they may also be sewed together for covers—in this case the outer edge should be scalloped. These designs are worked in application and satin embroidery on tulle, mull, etc. The threads in the open part are of fine guipure cord or twisted tatting cotton.

Tatted Antimacassar.

THE accompanying illustration shows one quarter of this cover of the full size, the rosette in the centre being completed. Work this first, the five-leaved figure in the centre in connection with the following row of rings.

* work first a ring of this row, making 3 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), four times alternating 2 ds., 1 p., then 3 ds.; then, after leaving $\frac{1}{8}$ inch thread between, a ring like the preceding, taking up the last p. of the former ring instead of working the first p. At $\frac{1}{8}$ inch distance of the thread work the first leaf of the five-leaved figure, which is composed of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds. Having completed this leaf, leave the usual $\frac{1}{8}$ inch of thread and repeat four times from *; but, in forming the leaves of the five-leaved figure, always fasten to the p. of the first leaf instead of forming a new p. (this p. forms the central point of the five-leaved figure); besides this, all the rings of the row must be fastened to each other. See illustration. Lastly, work the scallops on the outer edge of the rosette. In doing this, * fasten the thread to the p. which forms the connection between the adjacent rings of the row just worked, and make a scallop of eleven times alternating 2 ds., 1 p., then 2 ds. From * repeat nine times. Having finished this rosette, work eight rosettes in the same manner, and fasten them together in a circle by means of little three-leaved figures, and then to the central rosette, as shown in the illustration. The insertion-like strip which follows is worked in two parts as follows: First, for the half which turns toward the centre, work together two rows of rings lying opposite, beginning with one of the larger, which is composed of 4 ds., 1 p., three times alternating 2 ds., 1 p. *; leaving $\frac{1}{8}$ inch thread between, work a smaller ring of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; after the same length of thread, a ring like the first, which is joined to this; then again a smaller ring, which is fastened to the p. of the former smaller ring, instead of working the p. in the middle. After $\frac{1}{8}$ inch of thread, work again one of the larger rings, which must be fastened to the former similar ring, then repeat from * until the double row counts nine larger and eight smaller rings. The first half of the insertion is now finished; the second (outer) half is worked like the first, except that in this all the smaller rings are to be worked without picots, and instead of these every two must be joined to the two connected smaller rings of the first half of the insertion, as in the five-leaved figure of the rosette; each of the larger rings counts 4 ds., 1 p., four times alternating 2 ds., 1 p., then 4 ds. Having formed eight such pieces, join them into a circle, and at the same time to the other part of the cover by means of little rosettes, as shown in the figure. These rosettes, as well as the rest of the cover, are easily worked by reference to the illustration. The single figures may either be sewed together with fine thread, or fastened in the working.

Embroidery Pattern (Border).

THIS border can be used for cushions, chairs, afghans, etc. The pattern is worked in cross stitch on canvas of medium fineness, with single zephyr and filoselle. The colors are given in the directions accompanying the illustration.

Netted Fish Boiler.

See illustration, page 425.

THIS is composed of a net which is fastened on two tin rings in the manner shown in the illustration, and is used in boiling fish so that it can be taken out of the boiler without falling to pieces. The tin rings are each one-third of an inch in width by thirty-six inches in length. One of these rings is supplied with one row of holes, the other with two. The net is worked of fine pack-thread. Begin in the centre of the bottom with a foundation of thirty-six stitches, and work on these, over a mesh of about one-third of an inch around, fifteen rows in the round. In the third and fifth rounds add two loops on opposite sides in order to form the oval. Then take the foundation stitches on a thread, and draw them close together, after which sew the net fast to the two rings, as shown by the illustration.

are spacious; and stewing, boiling, and soup-making are carried on, on a comparatively large scale, over charcoal fires embedded in brick-work.

In private houses, such as those which belong to the well-to-do shop-keepers and merchants, the cooking is accomplished without much display. A wooden fire-box, about the size of a cubic foot, lined with a substance which answers the purpose of a fire-brick, contains sufficient fuel to prepare a dinner; for, with proper attention from the cook, several pots containing rice, small pieces of fish, and vegetables can be kept at the due simmering degree of temperature.

Baking is done on a small scale, to prepare cakes and biscuits of different kinds from wheaten and rice flour.

Like their neighbors the Chinese, the Japanese convey food to their mouths by the aid of chop-sticks, or thin pieces of wood, bone, or ivory, about nine or ten inches long. It requires considerable dexterity to manage these implements properly. The two sticks are held in a peculiar way between the fingers of the right hand, and if the rice be the edible undergoing consumption, the small basin containing it is held close to the mouth, and the contents are, as it were, shoveled in in a very ungraceful manner, according to our ideas. Then, if it is desired to partake of any fish, or meat, or vegetables, small pieces are taken out of their respective dishes by the help of the same chop-sticks which had been previously used in the rice, carving knives being entirely dispensed with, as the food is cut up small before being cooked.

The Japanese china-ware used for dishes, plates, cups, and basins is very beautiful. The material itself is excellent, and the coloring

JAPANESE COOKERY.

STEWING and boiling are the native methods of dressing food. In countries where coal is not in general use strict economy in the matter of fuel must be practiced; and therefore we see in Japan no vast kitchen ranges consuming large quantities of the black diamond, but instead, various stoves, in which a small amount of charcoal is burned, just sufficient to produce the necessary degree of heat to cook the food. The kitchens attached to the temples and monasteries with which it is decorated is generally in very good taste and well harmonized. The egg-shell porcelain, which is as thin as the fragile article from which it derives its name, can be used; but it is, of course, too delicate for ordinary purposes. China cups, round which bamboo is beautifully interwoven, like basket-work, or strengthened with lacquer-ware, ornamented with mother-of-pearl, are also seen; but the common china is white, with a blue pattern running over it.

Fig. 2.—Fanchon entirely composed of Parma violets without leaves. A fall of blonde behind is prolonged so as to border the strings of violet ribbon, which are fastened under the chin with a bunch of violets. Bow behind under the chignon.

Fig. 3.—White chip hat, trimmed with a large cluster of blue wild flowers and long spray of grasses.

Fig. 4.—Green crape bonnet, trimmed in front with a wreath of roses and leaves, and ending behind in a narrow scarf of silk, which forms the strings, edged with guipure.

Fig. 5.—Small bonnet of rice straw, set on the top of the head, and entirely covered with a knot of white silk, encircled with a wreath of lily of the valley. Strings edged with blonde.

Fig. 6.—Coiffure of gilded wheat, fastened behind with long ends of ribbon of the same color as the dress.

Fig. 7.—White satin bonnet, with long, drooping white plume, and quilling and strings of blue ribbon, covered with a mantilla veil of fine black figured lace, which falls on the shoulders and extends in front.

Fig. 8.—Fanchon of blue crape, edged with a row of beads, and terminated behind by a bow of black lace, prolonged by two loops of ribbon. Large bow and ends of ribbon under the chignon. Black lace strings, fastened by a ribbon bow.

Fig. 9.—Pink bonnet, with a large chorée of ribbon forming a diadem in front. A scarf, edged with the same trimming, passes over the bonnet and forms strings. Ribbon-bow on the top, with long ends floating behind.

Fig. 1.—Polonaise of black velvet, trimmed with rich passementerie and black silk galloon. The open sleeves are trimmed at the top and bottom with a bead fringe, and show the sleeves of the dress through the opening. The left front of the skirt of the paletot is longer than the right, which is cut bias. Dress of black gros de France, trimmed round the bottom with black passementerie, galloon, and heavy silk cord, and looped up on each side with a large passementerie fastening, showing the under-skirt of blue silk, which is also trimmed with wide galloon. Black silk boots, tipped with patent leather. Fanchon of blue velvet, with a frill of black guipure in front, in which is set a row of blue velvet buttons, with small gilt rings depending therefrom over the forehead. A blue velvet braid, edged with guipure, passes over the bonnet, and is fastened with a rosette under the chin.

Fig. 2.—Dress of green satin, with short tunic and low bodice, trimmed with a puffing of tulle and gold cord. Belt edged with gold cord and white lace, fastened on the left side with long sash ends. Skirt trimmed in front with three tabs of white lace, puffed in the middle and edged with gilt cord; one of these tabs runs from the top of the skirt downward, and is furnished with tassels; the others run from the bottom of the skirt upward. Lace rosettes with a gold button in the centre complete the trimming. Under-waist of pleated tulle, trimmed with gold cord. Short puffed sleeves, also adorned with gold cord. Hair crisped and brushed back from the forehead, over which is placed a rose with gold leaves.

HOUSEHOLD DIPLOMACY.

HUSBANDS must be humored and cosseted, and that with a great deal of delicate tact. In fact, a woman must have a fair amount of intellectual culture to perform this wisely duty at all acceptably. Husbands are fond of being humored; they expect their little caprices and fancies to be gratified; and yet they at once resent it if the fact is roughly placed before them that they need these gratifications. The skillful wife enters into the weaknesses of her husband's nature, adapts herself to his fancies, and, by a pleasant fiction at least, adopts his tastes; but she does all this with such nice discrimination that he is flattered and pleased. In short, he likes it much to have his peculiar traits of character, his capricious fancies, understood and indulged, because they are his, and because his wife takes a half humorous delight in gratifying his whims. And yet, forsooth, half the men in the world think, or pretend to think, that women need little education beyond knowing how to make a shirt and how to cook a dinner. Surely the highest culture is needful to make them tolerant of many inferior impulses, and delicately discriminating in their mode of showing that toleration is called for.

An English journal very truly remarks that men are not nearly so happy if they only get their way, and are not made aware that their odd little fancies are at once indulged and understood as light caprices, which might at any time be shaken off, but which their wives humor because their own sense of humor is gratified by compliance. A woman whose husband can't bear to see her dusting, or can't endure to know she has been in the kitchen looking after the pastry—and there are such men, in spite of all that is said to the contrary—looks twice as gracious when she has just nimbly whisked away her duster under the squab of the sofa, and turns with a dignified look toward the opening door, or when she has blandly feigned gratification at the pastry which they both perfectly well know that she herself has made, as she would if there were not a touch of humorous condescension in her state of mind. When an uncultivated wife blurts out before her husband's face: "Harris, he can't bear to be worried at his dinner-hour, and what's more, I won't have the poor dear worried by any body, that's flat!"—Harris will probably burst out ill-temperedly that he would just as soon be worried at that time as at any other, simply because he is jarred by this naked assertion that he positively needs to be gratified in what he knows to be only a whim. But when an educated woman smiles, "We're at dinner, Susan. No, my dear, you really must not go out—I have a weakness for not being disturbed at meal-times," her husband feels that he is under an indulgent "economy" which is adapted graciously to his fancies, but that his wife perfectly enters into his weaknesses and tastes, and makes it a personal favor that he will not waive them. The discovery—after marriage, of course—that man is not a "reasonable being," might prove too much for one whose capacities were developed only in the direction of cooking a beef-steak—though beef-steaks are very important; but more perfect culture helps a woman to discern some connection, perhaps, between arbitrary fancies and nobler powers of life, and to take pleasure in entering into little things, even while fully recognizing that they are little.

See illustration on page 428.

I AM a working-man, rugged and worn, Plodding to work with the first flush of morn; She is a lady, and passes me by With never so much as a glance of her eye.

Yet having met her, what wonder I dare Lift eyes of love, to my endless despair? You, had you seen her, had certainly sold All hopes of heaven to touch her hair's gold.

Infinite loveliness shines in her face, Gift of the lineage her father can trace; Is it so strange, then, I love her far more Than the girls that I court by the gin-palace door?

Sometimes I've felt the silk sweep of her dress Touch me, and pass like a subtle caress; It sends the hot blood to my heart with a thrill, And a passion that's scarcely curbed in by the will.

Is her blood made of such matter as mine, Or runs in her veins a more delicate wine? I would give every drop of my own for the bliss Just to feel how hers pulsed in one passionate kiss.

Some one will love her of equal degree— Not just a working-man slaving like me; What has he done that his life should be blest With a foretaste of heaven—in sleep on her breast?

Men are all brothers—I know the old tale— Little my brotherhood now can avail; Fate should have made me in different fashion; Given me gold, or deprived me of passion.

IN THE SPRING.

HAPPY footsteps, to and fro Through the fresh green copses springing; Happy laughter, whispers low, Chiming with the streamlet's singing. Twittering birds and voices clear, Budding violets, brightening eyes; Spring of life and spring of year Blending under April skies.

Branches arching overhead, Brave in spring-tide's bright array, Glittering flecks of sunlight shed, Like strewn jewels on the way. Primrose, virginal and pure, Gallant crocus, bright and bold; Red anemone, secure In his mosses' clinging hold.

Blue forget-me-not, that gazes On her own eyes in the river; Great convolvulus, that raises Blossoms where the willows quiver. All these gems of Nature lay Scattered broadcast on your road; Yonths and maidens, while you may, Take the boons by spring bestowed. Never summer's lavish glory, Never autumn's tender sadness, Breathes the spring-time's wooling story, Gives the spring-time's fearless gladness. Blight amid the fruits will creep, Thorns amid the roses sting; Fresh to gather, sweet to keep, Are the buds that bloom in spring.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN these days, when so much is said, both justly and unjustly, in regard to the useless education and frivolous lives of many of our young women, the careful and judicious mother, in every station of life, will think seriously how she can best train her young daughters to a practical knowledge of those things which will most contribute to their future usefulness and happiness. Mental and moral education, knowledge of books, and accomplishments, of household duties, and of the world at large, are to be combined in such proportions as circumstances render suitable and possible. A young girl may have a special taste or capacity which she should be encouraged to develop, but not to the exclusion of all other branches of education. And though, while under the mother's eye, perfectness may not be attained in any department, a wise training of the powers will tend toward a harmonious and happy development of character and abilities in after-life, as circumstances shall require. No mother, therefore, should excuse herself from giving her daughter suitable instruction in those household duties which so much affect the comfort of a family. Whatever position in society she may occupy, the knowledge thus gained, and the imperceptible influence on the character, not merely of the knowledge itself, but of the early impressions of its importance, are genuinely valuable. It is by no means necessary to keep your daughter in the kitchen half the time to accomplish these results; nor is it essential that she should be skilled on her marriage-day in every kind of cookery, and be able to get up a first-class dinner on short notice—this should not be expected any more than that she should go to the blackboard and unerringly demonstrate the 47th Proposition of Euclid three or four years after she has graduated at some excellent Seminary. If the elements of domestic knowledge are thoroughly mastered, and a suitable amount of practice given in important details, the intelligent girl will know how to order her household aright when the proper time comes, and to put her own hand to labor if there be occasion.

In regard to this matter, mothers who are themselves genuinely interested in the proper management of their own households will find but little trouble if they would avail themselves of the natural imitativeness of children. The little ones like to be useful if they see others about them useful; they like to follow the mother about the house under pretense of helping, though often hindering her; they enjoy using their little hands about something that older people do; they like, in general, to work until false notions are instilled into their minds. We know a little girl of six years—and there are many others in quiet homes all over the country who exhibit similar tastes—who already bids fair to be the nicest little housekeeper possible. Ever since she has been old enough to understand her mission—three years, at least!—she has been eager to do what she fancies is useful to others. She takes her tiny duster and flourishes over the chairs and sofas with positive results. After breakfast she demurely gathers up the tea-spoons from the table, and thinks it very nice to wipe them on the soft cloth after they are washed; nothing suits her better than to make some miniature pies, and have them actually put upon the dinner-table; with her little broom she forestalls the servant, and sweeps down the front door-steps before breakfast in the morning. She puts a particular room in order every day, and quite of her own accord has assumed so much the care of her father's wardrobe that her mother will gradually be supplanted in that duty. "Papa, you've put on the wrong cravat," she seriously says some morning; "that's your best one." She reminds him to put on a clean collar and wristbands; says, "Why, Papa! you haven't brushed your coat," and herself seizes his beaver and plies the brush. She seems to consider herself responsible for his neat personal appearance. Almost all little girls delight to have some small household duty committed to their care; and if this disposition should be fostered, instead of being discouraged, as it often is, on the ground that they can not do the thing so well as an older person, they would, with rare exceptions, grow up with sufficient knowledge of, and interest in, those home matters about which, nowadays, there is so much complaint that young ladies know little, and care less.

Among the novelties of Parisian enterprise there is reported a large warehouse where are retailed all manner of goods, from a diamond necklace to a paper of pins. The purchaser, having paid the price, receives not only the goods, but a bond for the whole amount of his purchase-money, payable after thirty years, and guaranteed by certain moneyed corporations. The prices charged are said to be no greater than in any other retail shops. So that it appears—if one does not take the trouble to compute interest—that the more you spend the richer you will be. How odd it would seem to hear a man reproaching his wife for her economy, and urging her to buy expensive articles, saying: "My love, consider what a source of income this camel's-hair shawl will be to us thirty years hence; if you will only spend enough we shall be wealthy in our old age!"

Among minor items we notice that a lady in Chicago has applied for a divorce on the ground that her husband is traveling all the time and insists that she shall accompany him. If her husband is a doctor, a letter carrier, or a railroad conductor, the request really seems reasonable. Also, it is stated that Chicago has recently given a ball "for the benefit of the poor," which came within $4000 of paying expenses. The newspapers published the balance sheet, and called upon the poor to liquidate the bill forthwith. In addition, report says that a man in Toledo, who disappeared fourteen years ago, has just come back to his wife, but will not explain his absence. Probably the lady who recently gave notice in the papers that if her husband did not turn up in three months she meant to marry again, had heard of this case. Furthermore, the latest Parisian method of issuing invitations is announced to be simply this, the lady writes on her own visiting card, "Ball on the 10th," "Dinner on the 20th," as the case may be, and sends it to the person she desires to receive. Moreover, a new fashion has been inaugurated by a gentleman of a neighboring city which may take. Being in attendance on a lady with a fashionable yard-long trail, the other day, he showed his gallantry by dropping cavalierly behind her at every crossing, picking it up and retaining it in his hand until the street was crossed. Finally, to conclude this paragraph in the words of some unknown meteorologist: "If the man who wrote it might have been a woman—I love to see the snow-flake dancing in the air" still lives, what a heap of enjoyment he or she must have suffered this season!"

A recent writer states that a good supply of apples will be found the most economical investment in the whole range of culinary. A raw, mellow apple is digested in an hour and a half, while boiled cabbages require five hours. The most healthful dessert that can be placed on the table is a baked apple. If eaten frequently at breakfast apples have an admirable effect upon the system, and will often prevent the need of medicine. If families could be induced to substitute sound, ripe apples for the rich and unwholesome pastry and cake with which children are too often stuffed there would be a surprising diminution in the sum total of doctors' bills. Spring is not the best time, of course, to lay in a supply of apples—but it is the proper time for cultivators of fruit, and farmers in general, to give needful attention to their orchards, so that there may be an abundant supply of apples next fall.

A Parisian jeweler has recently created quite a sensation in that city by the production of some remarkable gold ornaments, consisting of scarf-pins, charms, and hair ornaments, in which, by means of ingenious mechanism moved by electricity, some curious and startling effects are realized. For example, one scarf-pin represents a monkey in spectacles, making grimaces; another is a rabbit, striking alternately two small drum-sticks upon a bell placed in front of him—a double spherical bell, which sounds an alarm. For a charm there is a minute theatrical stage upon which two figures execute a ballet. One of the most beautiful head-ornaments described is a humming-bird, studded with diamonds, which moves both its wings and tail. They vibrate through about an inch of space, make five vibrations a second, and continue in motion for four hours. Another is a butterfly whose wings move with equal freedom, though not as rapidly. The power by which all these life-like movements are produced is obtained from a minute battery, placed in the waistcoat-pocket, or in some part of the dress; or for the head-ornaments it may even be concealed in the folds of the hair. The electricity developed is conveyed to the jewels by a fine, flexible, metallic cord; and in some instances the movements have been continued several hours a day for six months without exhausting the battery. The action is commenced or discontinued at pleasure, by reversing the position of the little case which contains the battery.

The New York correspondent of a Boston paper thus sarcastically, but with much underlying truth, speaks of certain highly-colored photographs of "reigning belles" which have been exhibited in a city newspaper: "The eyes, teeth, hair, lips, forms, diamonds, station, money, names, carriages, clothes, were all catalogued with the minuteness of an inventory for a sheriff's sale. Did not the indignant husbands, fathers, lovers, sons, and brothers march in an army to the publication office and incontinently club the editors, reporters, and proprietors into blackberry jam? Not much. A procession of veiled women, thousands of letters, hundreds of applications, all summing up—'Please put me in the next batch. Surely I am as rich, beautiful, and belle-like, as that old fat dowager of eighty who was described as a charming sylph of sixteen.'"

A French journal relates a singular story of a young couple, both of whom became invalids during the first year of their marriage. The physician found that the wife had such consumptive tendencies that the climate of the South was essential to her recovery; while a complication of disorders of the heart and blood rendered a colder climate necessary for the husband. Orange groves for one, and icebergs for the other, was the doctor's decree. At great expense the spirit of the prescription was carried out. Two houses were built in Paris, one of which was a miniature Siberia, full of currents of air, in every respect cold and dry, where, by dint of taking violent exercise in every imaginable way, and hardening his system, the husband endeavored to recover his health; while in the adjacent building every thing was warm, luxurious, soothing, and tropical. This latter was the home of the young wife. The pair were perfectly happy, living, as it were, a thousand miles apart—the one amidst his frescoes, representing icebergs and reindeer—the other among flowers and tropical scenes. Unfortunately, this fairy life lasted but three years, when both died within a short time of each other.

A ROMANTIC INCIDENT.

CHAPTER I.

A MAN has very hard work in the International Finance Department of Somerset House. From ten to one I have to sign my name some thirty times, and to make myself familiar with the heads of the Department by sketching their countenances on the blotting-paper. It is imperatively necessary for the balance of power that I carefully peruse the Times every morning. If people call on business I never forget what is due to official life so far as to be able to give them any information on the subject. Luckily reformers and the economical adjusters of the estimates have not yet found any abuses in the I. F. Department, so that I luxuriate in countless rolls of red tape supplied at the public expense, and sip the brown sherry a grateful country furnishes for the leisure hours of its overworked financiers with all the complacency of the Poet Laureate.

One morning in 186—, after having successfully adjusted an impending crisis in the national credit of a European principality, and guarded against an overissue of paper-money by the King of Dahomey (the House never gives us fellows the glory of these operations, it all goes to the ministry), my eyes fell upon the following announcement in the obituary of the Times:

"October 6. The Rev. John Gibbons, Rector of Ashton, Herts, aged 67."

I did no more work that day. When a telegram from the Prime Minister begged me at once to see to a treaty of commerce being concluded with the United States, I flung themissive to a sub.

Soon after I sauntered out and strolled down to the Park. It was one of those delicious days which sometimes occur in October. Not a breath of air stirred beneath the fleecy gray sky. The sycamore leaves hung by the last fibre, yet did not fall.

Soon I made up my mind. Six hundred a year was little enough to keep a wife on; but it was impossible that my talents could long lie hidden at the I. F. Department. Sir Frederick had said as much the other day. No one knew so much about the Credit Mobilier of Austria, and an envoy would soon be wanted to proceed to Francis Joseph's court. Kate was a fine-looking woman. Plenty of good hair, teeth unexceptionable; we had certainly loved each other a good deal last summer. What would the poor girl do now she was alone in the world? I had just time at my lodgings to throw my things into a portmanteau, seize my dispatch-box, and reach King's Cross in time for the 4.30 down train. There was yet a moment to telegraph to my clerk:

"Important Cabinet meeting at Lord H—'s. Have to attend to settle the claims of Prussia. Invest the Pomeranian £160,000. Decline Emperor's offer. Back on the 20th. Letters to be sent to Ashton Hall."

With dusk the train stopped at Ashton Station. Oddly enough I found a trap from my uncle's waiting there; but then somehow or other things always do arrange themselves for men born to command their fellows.

"Well, John," I said, as we sped along the side of the park, "how is the master?"

"Not any thing to boast of, Sir: he had a touch of his old enemy, but he will be glad to see you."

"Ah, I shall just save dinner. Birds plentiful this season?"

"Pretty fair, Sir; no one has shot them yet. The rector has been too ill to walk: you know he died on Saturday?"

"Yes, I had heard; but here we are! Hold up, old horse! Now, John, take the ribbons."

I descended and was shown into the library. My uncle nursed his gouty feet by the side of a huge wood-fire carefully arranged on dogs three centuries old. The great and wise of all times and countries were caged around the walls in row after row of books. His welcome, if somewhat testy, was cordial.

"Well, Alan, what brings you here? Have cab-hire and white kid gloves ruined you?"

"Not exactly, or I should have stopped short at Colney Hatch. The fact is, my dear uncle, negotiations of a very important character have been set on foot with Prussia. I had to run down to Lord H—'s; they can't settle these affairs, you know, without some one from the I. F. Department; I took you en route, hoping with Milton that your experience

"Might attain
To something of prophetic strain on my behalf."

"Hem!" said the old man, mollified; "time was when the Premier constantly sent down a Queen's Messenger to me on the eve of an important debate. I remember Castlereagh waking me at three in the morning, and sitting on my bed while I thought over what was the best course to be taken with regard to the French intervention in Spain."

"Political wisdom at present," I observed, "too often consults the presiding genius of the Morning Star. We will discuss Prussia's embarrassments over the Clos Vougeot. Shall I ring for your valet to take your arm while I help you in to dinner?"

The purée and turbot were so unexceptionable that I was not surprised at my uncle's attack of gout. When the cloth was removed (dinners à la Russe found no favor at Ashton), the butler placed Mr. Norris's toast and water before him.

"No, no, Morton; Alan must be supported," said he, "at the sherry. Get me some Clos Vougeot. Alan, you are quite right," he continued, "no one ever took harm from Burgundy. Erasmus rejuvenated himself by drinking it. Old Drenchem may say what he likes to-morrow. Nunc est bibendum!"

After a pause he went on. "Poor Gibbons is dead, Alan; I shall miss him very much. It is very sad about Kate; she will have to go out as governess. It seems her father invested largely in the Tidal Wave Force Company and has lost his all. They smashed last week, and he had a fit when they told him."

"I had hoped some good fellow ere this would have asked for her hand," I observed, carelessly.

"Yes, she is pretty, certainly; and what is better, clever; but you young men nowadays rave after a blonde chevelure, and she has hair as black as night."

"If I were a marrying man," I remarked, holding my glass up to the light, "I think I should have hazarded a refusal. But then she is penniless, and love in a cottage would not suit me after diplomatic dinners; nor could I earth up celery after having arbitrated the great Zollverein treaty."

My uncle laid down his glass ere he had well tasted the glowing liquid and tapped his snuff-box in great perturbation.

"To be sure, love-matches are all very well, Alan, for your romantic men, college fellows and the like. No practical man could think of such a thing were the lady Helen herself. Ashton Hall is a fine estate, is it not?"

"Yes, you have greatly improved it. Netherby tells me the young timber is now salable. Planting in the manner you did fifty years ago was most judicious."

"It ought to be made up with the Fluxton estate," he went on, not heeding my interruption. "People say Laura Fluxton is plain, as if an heiress were ever beautiful! I should like to see the man who will have Ashton adding Fluxton to it."

I was my uncle's favorite nephew, so I winced internally at the suggestion.

"You see, Sir, a fellow likes to see a pretty girl at the end of his table. Why didn't Dame Fortune give Kate Gibbons the manor as a dowry for her good looks?"

"The heir of Ashton ought to marry Laura Fluxton," said my uncle, decisively, "were she Mucklemouthed Meg herself!"

"Certainly, Sir," I said with a perfectly unconscious look; "and if she refuses him, I will get him an introduction to the Pig-faced Lady. She has no end of money, they say, and after a year of her a man might be further encouraged to go in for the Dunmow flitch."

"Nay, Alan," observed he once more with a smile, "so rash a man you may be sure would never get a rasher."

But when he wished me good-night he once more returned to the point.

"You stop here to-morrow?"

"Unless the country goes to the dogs during my absence."

"Ride over to see Laura to-morrow morning. Oh! by-the-way, tell Netherby and Stanley I shall want them as witnesses to a document when you return. Good-night!"

After breakfast next day I asked Mr. Norris if he had any commands for Fluxton Hall ere I mounted my horse.

"Hah, hah!" he chuckled, "ask Fluxton about that poaching rascal Morris; and hark ye! sacrifice to the Graces and vow a hecatomb to Persuasion; Venus and all her doves go with you!"

He stood watching me down the park: at the lodge I turned and rode swiftly toward the rectory.

Kate and I had exchanged divers love passages in years past. She was now in trouble. Come what would I would marry her. She must not go forth into a cold world to earn her bread as a governess.

The rectory stood apart from the rest of the village shaded by old elms. They were now straining in the wind, and only here and there a yellow leaf clung to the naked boughs.

I put the horse into the well-known stable, crossed the lawn to the drawing-room bow-window, opened it, and entered.

"Pardon me, Miss Gibbons, but I would not ring and disturb you to-day. I am not going to sympathize or condole with you as an ordinary friend might do. I have come down from London to see, as something dearer than a friend, in what I can help."

"Oh, Mr. Woodward! what can I say to you at such a time as this? Yours is true kindness!" and she turned away much affected.

After a pause I resumed—"You will have to see to your father's will and to dilapidations on the house; but first, where are you going while all these duties—these sad duties to a mourner—are being gone through?"

"You have heard from your uncle, of course, about my father's speculations. They have proved most unfortunate—he lost all. The furniture will pay for our debts, but I grieve at not being able to meet the dilapidations which will certainly be heavy on this old house. As for myself, I shall seek employment, and hope in time to liquidate everything." And Miss Gibbons proudly faced her lover.

"Kate, I have three hundred pounds lying idle at my banker's; borrow it—you can pay me interest if you will."

"How can I thank you for your generosity? but—ah no, no, I can not take it, Mr. Woodward!"

"Then take me with it, Kate, if that will reconcile you better to it," and I held her hand firmly, which struggled to be free. "You know how long I have loved—I came here on purpose to say this—Kate, my own Kate, look up!"

She paused a moment and then she said—"It is almost too happy—but your uncle—he would never forgive me. Oh, Mr. Woodward—Alan—it can not be!—do not ask me further,"—and she sat down pale as death on the sofa.

I begged and implored, but to no purpose—she would not even give me hope; nothing was so abhorrent to her feelings as to enter a family where she was not welcome. I blamed her pride, she acknowledged she deserved it; I railed at my uncle; she said—

"Nay, nay, true friend, do not speak thus with him above yet unbearably! You shall hear betimes from me. If I am in difficulty I promise to write to you and trust you as my brother—do not grieve! Forgive me!"—and she turned her earnest eyes on me.

I could only silently kiss her forehead and gaze a moment into her face. Then I retreated to my horse and rode off silent and dispirited. I loved her truly: why should she thus throw so foolish an obstacle in the way—she loved me—had as good as confessed it: why are girls so fanciful?

Occupied by these sombre reflections, I was startled as I turned out of the lane into the main road by a groom galloping by. He pulled up on seeing me, and asked hurriedly if I had seen his mistress.

"What? A lady pass here? No. Nothing amiss, eh?"

"She was riding Proud Peter, Sir: he's a desperate horse in his tantrums, and has started off like mad with her while I was getting a stone out of this un's foot"—and chatting with the butcher, he might have added.

We galloped on together. After a turn or two the road opened upon a common, and there we saw the runaway scattering the sheep in every direction as he furiously bore off his helpless rider. I knew enough of the country to be aware that over the dip he was rapidly approaching were several chalk quarries, and that instant action was necessary. My horse soon distanced the groom, and bore me rapidly across the arc of the fugitive's course, my aim being to cut off the terrified animal and either seize the reins or at all events head him from the quarries. Onward I sped with the riding habit of the slim figure before me fluttering behind her as my mark, and her hair (she had lost her hat) streaming in the brisk autumnal breeze. It was an exciting chase. I was rapidly nearing them, when her horse swerved to the right and made straight at a hedge—a regular bullfinch—my only comfort was there was no quarry on the opposite side. The lady still sat him bravely—a moment more and they neared it. I had just time to shout "Lift him to it!" when there was a spring, a loud crash, and the animal burst through, leaving his rider insensible on the earth with an ugly cut on her head.

CHAPTER II.

"WELL," said my uncle, with his hand on the bell when I entered the library that afternoon, "am I to ring for Netherby and Stanley?"

"If you think they can be of any service to you."

"Well but, Alan—have you left her an accepted suitor? Is it all right?"

"No, Sir: it is a very nasty cut indeed."

"Cut!" roared my uncle, "cut! do you mean to say she wouldn't have you? Tell me all about it. What hard hearts girls have nowadays!"

"I assure you, Wood says she will carry the mark of to-day's work to her grave."

"You don't mean to say you told that chatter-box Wood about your proposal? Why Wood will tell it to all his patients!"

"Proposal? I really don't understand you."

"Come, come, Alan, finesse apart, of course it is all right, eh? Those fellows will come up directly and we will execute the Will forthwith."

"But unfortunately Miss Fluxton is still insensible: she was flung from her horse this afternoon and her head is seriously injured."

"Whew!" said my uncle, solemnly, "is she very—"

At this moment the door opened and a footman ushered into the presence Netherby, in a russet garb and an awe-struck countenance, and Stanley, pale with terror and repeatedly stroking his hair, to my uncle.

"Hillo! What? I don't want you!" he shouted to the unlucky fellows—"go and be hanged to you both for a couple of," etc. etc.: long before he could finish the wretched rustics had fled to the servants' hall, while I shouted with laughter.

The old man flung himself into his arm-chair and moodily resumed: "You will have to wait and try again; meanwhile, make yourself happy with the pheasants. The I. F. Department will have to lose your valuable aid for the present."

"Unfortunately Briggs handed me a telegram from Lennox as I dismounted. The Kuttack Provinces want a loan at once, £900,000; I must run back and see about it, I suppose, or else there will be some terrible blunder. There are not above two of the subs who know where the Kuttack Provinces are. I don't want the department to be overhauled in the House: some fellow will be proposing to give us Cape Sherry, so I must at once wish you good-by!"

As I spoke the carriage passed the windows, and ere long I was once more whirled off to the great Babylon.

The Kuttack loan was duly negotiated, and a month more found us busy upon the Caribbee Succession Duty. Lord Mayor's-day, with the usual raid of Whitechapel upon decent hats, had just passed, when among my correspondence arrived two private letters.

One was directed in a hand that had been bold enough for a premier's, but now it shook sadly here and there, and the letters were occasionally blurred and smudged like the same worthy's fingers when knotted with gout. This could be from no one but my uncle:

"DEAR ALAN"—it began—"I thought you would like some news from Ashton this dull weather. Miss Fluxton has quite recovered: young Quickspeke is to marry her in a month. I do not think you would have had any chance, unless she had been ignorant of your proposal to Miss Gibbons. Some men never know Comet port from Oxford mixture. My sister Jane's boy is fond of a country life: I trust the new ministry will not forget such devoted public servants as yourself. Netherby and Stanley have just come in to witness my signature, so I must end over your affectionate uncle, C. H. NORRIS."

"Lambton!" I cried to my head clerk.

That functionary appeared prompt as the genii when Aladdin rubbed his lamp. "Oblige me by putting this letter in the hottest part of the fire," I observed, and the note was consumed to ashes forthwith.

Now for the other. It was written on black-edged mourning paper from the "severe affliction" department; the handwriting was firm yet delicate and lady-like.

"SHIP EUPHRATES, GRAVESEND, Nov. 11, 1866.—"MY DEAR MR. WOODWARD.—After your kindness to me at Ashton, and my promise to let you know what my plans were, you will not be surprised to hear that I am going to India as governess to the Honorable Sir R. Pryne's daughters. We sail in an hour. You will soon learn to thank me for sparing us the bitterness of saying farewell to one another. You carry with you my loving affection and best wishes for your happiness; a kinder fate might have saved me from signing myself your most sincere and sisterly friend, K. G."

"Lambton! a Hansom immediately!"

I reached Gravesend to hear the Euphrates sailed during the night. She might touch at Plymouth, but it depended on the weather.

Of course the Caribbee Succession Duty Papers could follow me to Plymouth; my name could be signed there as well as in London. I went down by the night mail, and next morning called upon the agent of the packet line to which the Euphrates belonged.

He informed me decisively but courteously that there was not the slightest chance of her touching at, or even sighting Plymouth. She had discharged her pilot at Folkestone, the telegraph had that morning brought word, and was rapidly making the best of her way down Channel with a favoring wind. Sometimes, when passengers joined at Plymouth, their vessels put in there; but the Euphrates had shipped her full complement before leaving Gravesend.

What was to be done now? It was certain I should not see Kate again. I was chagrined, certainly, nay, seriously grieved, I settled with myself while smoking my cigar on the Hoe. My affection for her was so deep that I could not all at once and philosophically consign her memory to that limbo of lost loves to be found at the bottom of most men's hearts. Yet it was absurd for a man of the world like myself, who hobnobbed familiarly with ministers, and had the entrée of every house worth knowing in Mayfair—it did seem absurd for me to be so hard hit at losing a simple clergyman's daughter. I could not return to town at once. It was to be hoped the Caribbee millionaires could wait a little longer for their documents. I am not sentimental, but it would be pleasant, I fancied, for a time to live "the world forgetting, by the world forgot." And so I determined to pay a visit, now it was so near, to the Lizard.

After a drive of a dozen miles from Helston, the little omnibus deposited me, with two more passengers, inmates of the little village, in an open court-yard at the back of the only inn in the locality. It was dusk, and beyond two or three squalid cottages and a cheery radiance of the kitchen window before me, I could see nothing save moon and mist. There was not a tree, not a bush, not a twig, nor had we passed any for the last two miles. Heather, swept by the keen breeze, and a vast cloud-curtain overhanging the cliffs facing the sea, closed in the prospect. I shivered and went in to find sour cider the only beverage attainable, unless I tried the landlord's wine and spirit store.

"Ye see, Sir, you don't often get gentlemen here but in summer, and there isn't much drinking among the men. The teetotal sect is a main trouble to tavern-keepers; and so saying the host consoled himself with a pull at cider "sharp" enough to cut his throat.

I slept well, for I had the inn to myself, and next day descended to the shore. There was a magnificent sea rolling into the little bay under a brisk southwester, turgid and swollen on the horizon, and breaking here and there into angry foam, which was overwhelmed forthwith by the succeeding surge, as a luckless trooper who falls in a cavalry charge is trampled under foot by his comrades. The coast was composed of serpentine rocks, cruel and sharp, like wolf's teeth, where they receded from the shore, but split into a hundred jagged reef-like masses, where the sea roared, and leaped, and chafed in sheets of surf before me. A lurid glare overhead, athwart which dirty yellowish cloud-drifts were hurried with their ragged edges catching the gleam for a moment, and then swept into the mist, boded but ill, thought, for mariners who should near these iron-bound coasts. It was a splendid spectacle, and as the day wore on I watched with the old light-house keeper the waves increase and every sail seek the offing. At nightfall a tremendous gale was raging, the wind howled, and a legion of demons seemed disputing the cliffs with the waves. Rain lashed down in torrents, and surf was sent flying in sheets over the moor. The old salt shrugged his shoulders, wished me good-night, and went in.

About midnight I was roused by the shouts of men running under my windows. I could hear their anxious voices over the roar of the storm. The landlord came to the door, knocked hurriedly, and said, "There's a large ship on the rocks off the Old Head, Sir; would you like to see the life-boat go out?" I did not wait for a second invitation, but soon joined him, clad in a boating-coat and a sou'wester tied well on my head.

We were almost carried off our feet as we came out upon the cliffs by the Head. It was an awful sight. By a straggling moon we could discern mountains of surf hurled over the rocks beneath us, and gleaming like sheets of flying silver. Out to sea was a writhing, howling wilderness, each surge striving to outtop its neighbor. Half a mile out, lit by a couple of blue-lights, lay the hull of a large vessel, broadside on the waves. You could hear them boom and hiss and shriek as they flew over her and overwhelmed her in foam. Every now and then a gun was fired, and the sea, cumbered with topmasts and wreckage, was vividly lighted up for a moment to pass into thicker darkness than ever, as the report reached our ears.

We ran down the zigzag path to the cove. Her crew were already hauling down the life-boats. They wanted one to fill up her quota. It was not hatred of life now I had lost my love that impelled me to offer my services; it was that stirring desire which comes over a man in serious issues to lend his arm and take his life in his hand if he can only save others. One who has pulled in an Oxford eight-oar is sure to get at home even with the ponderous oar of a life-boat. The crew hesitated, and some preferred waiting for Simmons, but he had some distance to come, and no one could say for certain that he knew any thing about the wreck. Meanwhile the storm blew in furious gusts; no more guns were fired from the stranded ship; the waves were evidently driving the men from below. There was no time to be lost. "Will you obey orders?" said the coxswain.

"I'll do my very best and drown with you, my lads, if we fail."

"Hurrah!" they cried, "put on the jacket and take your place!"

"Now then, easy, lads, shove her off," shouted the cox: "now's your time!"

The willing arms of the crowd pushed us down the slips and ran us out well into the surf, some getting knocked down and all thoroughly drenched in the operation.

"Bend to it, lads! stick to your oars, and we'll soon reach her." These were the last commands I heard. A huge roller sprang over us ere we could clear the surf, filled the boat with water, and half stunned me. "Hold hard, mate!" said the man who shared my bench, "we sha'n't ship any more."

We did not for some time get a further wetting; the difficulty was to keep one's seat as the boat rode madly up some mountainous wave to shoot headlong into its trough, and then to be knocked about in the broken water before the next swell came and the previous movements were repeated. It was desperate work, too, laying hold of the waves with the oar, such was the swiftness with which they flew by, and the force with which they beat upon its blade. I was exhausted before we had made half the distance, while my companion chewed his quid and pulled away with supreme indifference. "What ship is she?" I said to him. "I thought a collier at first," he returned, "but Bill tells me it's the You-fear-at-ease! Us can't abide them furrin names! She's an Indian."

The Euphrates! I thought, and Kate in danger! With clenched teeth I felt no more fatigue, but pulled mechanically, amazing my neighbor by my efforts.

"Look out!" roared the skipper, "grip for your lives!" and with the words a thundering swell caught us obliquely on the starboard, snapped two of the oars, and overturned the boat in an avalanche of foam. In a few seconds, which seemed ages to a submerged man, gripping the safety lines for dear life's sake, she righted herself. I picked myself up from the confusion of ropes and stores in which I lay, seized my oar hanging by its lanyard, took a long breath, and once more we made way, the water running out of the false bottom of the boat as we picked up two of our mates floating along upborne by their cork jackets.

Soon we gained the Euphrates, and ran as far as we dared venture into the caldron or surf around her; a few sailors appeared on the deck, and several women were wailing on the poop as every minute the huge seas leaped over them, carrying away one occasionally in their grasp. We could not help those ill-fated souls, as we were lying on and off, while our cox, flung the sailors a rope. All the boats, bulwarks, and deck lumber had long been swept off, and evidently most of her crew were lost already. —

While we were drawing up the end was at hand. Three immense rollers in close succession riding high, and hissing as they came on, discharged themselves viciously on the Euphrates. There was a roar, a loud cracking, and amidst the shrieks of the women the noble ship heeled over and went all at once to pieces. We drew out as quickly as we could from the confused surges and dangerous proximity of the wreckage. It is a marvel to me, looking back on that frightful night, how we survived, considering what cross-waves boarded us at this time, dashing spars and hen-coops over us, and tossing the heavy life-boat like an egg-shell where they would. Each of us did his best to save the poor creatures who were borne by us. Eight men and three children were picked up. Then we steered right into the heart of the wreckage and got in two ladies, but alas! neither was Kate. The moon now shone brightly over the awful waste of waters: no more bodies were to be seen, and the coxswain gave the word, "Home." Still I peered over every wave and scanned every trough in hopes of seeing—ha! what is that? Kate's pale, upturned face drifting by! In an instant I dropped my oar, leaped in the seething chasm, with two strokes was upon her, and grasped her hair! We were borne on, a surge flew over us, I was stunned, smothered, became insensible, but still I clung to my prize, and my cork jacket held us both up.

When the sun was high in the heavens next day, bringing out the sea-gulls in strong relief against the still sullen waves that chafed around the Lizard Head, I awoke to find myself famous.

Kate was safe and in a fair way to recover speedily from her fright and immersion. The crew had picked us up after a severe struggle with the currents that set in so strongly off the Head. Our love-story had oozed out by some means or other, I learned, and Kate and myself were receiving no small amount of popular sympathy. It was strange to find Rumor with her thousand tongues busy in this remote corner of the land.

Then came reporters by the dozen, like birds of prey which instinctively fly to their proper food. I became a hero now if I had been only a successful financier before. He was a made man among them who could only catch sight of my umbrella. I was daily drawn out into numberless paragraphs headed, "A deed of daring;" "Noble action;" "Gallant exploit," etc., as a small lump of gold is beaten into fibres broad enough to cover a country. Then when Kate and I were married as privately as we could, at Llandewednack Church (the most southerly church in England and the parish church of the Lizard), the enthusiasm of the papers knew no bounds. The "romantic incident," which at last gave me the "love of my lifetime," was blazoned far and wide; and many a leading article in that dull time of the year revelled in gushing superlatives and lost itself in praises of marriage, "the perennial Paradise of Humanity," to do us honor.

Four gratifying results followed this event:

I. I was presented with the gold medal of the Royal Humane Society and their thanks inscribed on vellum. — Other men, I believe, get silver medals and thanks written on parchment.

II. Lord Hanaper suddenly remembered the Inspectorship of Sealing-wax and Wafers was vacant—"and by Jove, Sir! that industrious and gallant Woodward shall have it!" It is worth £3000 per annum and a sinecure.

III. I received another letter from Mr. Norris, saying that he had revoked his will and was making a new one in my favor. "Excuse haste, Alan; Netherby and Stanley have just come up to witness signature."

IV. And lastly. If any thing were wanting to the perfect happiness which should always wait upon true love and successful heroism, this morning has supplied it. I have just become the happy father of twins. They are to be named Hero and Leander, and are at the present moment going on swimmingly.

MRS. MYRA CLARK GAINES.

MRS. MYRA CLARK GAINES.

WE give herewith the portrait of Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, whom the recent decision of the Supreme Court has made the richest woman in America, and whose name deserves to stand side by side with that of Cyrus W. Field as an example of that tireless will and perseverance which accomplishes its object in spite of all obstacles. For more than thirty years Mrs. Gaines has been engaged in this struggle to recover her father's estates, the story of which sounds more like one of romance than of plain, unvarnished fact.

Mrs. Gaines was born at Philadelphia, in 1806. Her father was Daniel Clark, a native of Ireland, who, beginning life as an adventurous trader, ended it as one of the richest merchants of New Orleans. Her mother was Zuleima Carrier, a French lady, who had separated from a first husband on learning that he had a wife living; for this reason the marriage was private, and was afterward discredited by the pretenders to the estate. Before she was a year old her parents separated. Mr. Clark took charge of his daughter, had her properly educated, and testified paternal affection toward her.

In 1813 Daniel Clark died, leaving an immense fortune, mostly invested in land in New Orleans and other cities on the Mississippi. A will was produced, bequeathing his fortune to his mother and the city of New Orleans, who immediately entered into possession.

Some thirteen years afterward Myra married Mr. Whitney, a member of a wealthy and respected family of Binghamton, New York, and claimed the property as his only legitimate child. The wealthy holders of the estate fiercely contested the claim, and literally persecuted Mr. Whitney to death. His widow, young, beautiful, and energetic, and left with three children to provide for, continued the suit. Her cause seemed almost hopeless when Major-General Gaines, of the United States army, became interested in the fortunes of the beautiful widow, and married her despite the great disparity of years. His fortune of a quarter of a million was soon swallowed up in legal proceedings, and he died in turn, leaving her again a widow, without means, opposed to a wealthy corporation. The case had been tried and lost at New Orleans, and carried to the Supreme Bench at Washington and lost there in 1852. Her suit now seemed hopeless, when, just at this juncture a will was discovered, duly executed by Daniel Clark, certifying that she was his only legitimate child, and creating her his sole heir. This will Mrs. Gaines offered for probate, and sued the possessors of her father's property thereupon. The New Orleans court again decided against her. She appealed anew to the Supreme Court at Washington, and after several years of tedious litigation, obtained a judgment on March 14, 1861, confirming the will, declaring her the only rightful heir of Daniel Clark, and entitling her not only to the whole property left by him, but to the rents of the same during the thirty years that had elapsed since the first claim.

Just as suddenly as she had risen from despair to success, her hopes were dashed to the ground. The civil war broke out, and suspended all proceedings for the recovery of the property for five years. At its close, claims of rightful possession under the first will were set up by the holders of the estate, and carried through the local courts to the United States Supreme Court, where they have recently been decided in Mrs. Gaines's favor. The estate in question embraces a large portion of the city of New Orleans; its value was estimated in 1839 at $6,480,000, and is said to have increased during thirty years to $40,000,000. Mrs. Gaines, during this long course of litigation, is said to have become one of the cleverest lawyers of the country. She is still in the prime of life, and we trust may live long to enjoy her hard-earned fortune.

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XLVIII. WHO IS HE?

On the morning after the last escape of Beatrice, Clark went up to Brandon Hall. It was about nine o'clock. A sullen frown was on his face, which was pervaded by an expression of savage malignity. A deeply preoccupied look, as though he were altogether absorbed in his own thoughts, prevented him from noticing the half-smiles which the servants cast at one another.

Asgeelo opened the door. That valuable servant was at his post as usual. Clark brushed past him with a growl and entered the dining-room.

Potts was standing in front of the fire with a flushed face and savage eyes. John was stroking his dog, and appeared quite indifferent. Clark, however, was too much taken up with his own thoughts to notice Potts. He came in and sat down in silence.

"Well," said Potts, "did you do that business?"

"No," growled Clark.

"No!" cried Potts.

"Do you mean to say you didn't follow up the fellow?"

"I mean to say it's no go," returned Clark. "I did what I could. But when you are after a man, and he turns out to be the DEVIL HIMSELF, what can you do?"

At these words, which were spoken with unusual excitement, John gave a low laugh, but said nothing.

"You've been getting rather soft lately, it seems to me," said Potts. "At any rate, what did you do?"

"Well," said Clark, slowly—"I went to that inn—to watch the fellow. He was sitting by the fire, taking it very easy. I tried to make out whether I had ever seen him before, but could not. He sat by the fire, and wouldn't say a word. I tried to trot him out, and at last I did so. He trotted out in good earnest, and if any man was ever kicked at and ridden rough-shod over, I'm that individual. He isn't a man—he's Beelzebub. He knows every thing.

He began in a playful way by taking a piece of charcoal and writing on the wall some marks which belong to me, and which I'm a little delicate about letting people see; in fact, the Botany Bay marks."

"Did he know that?" cried Potts, aghast. "Not only knew it, but, as I was saying, marked it on the wall. That's a sign of knowledge. And for fear they wouldn't be understood, he kindly explained to about a dozen people present the particular meaning of each."

"The devil!" said John.

"That's what I said he was," rejoined Clark, dryly. "But that's nothing. I remember when I was a little boy," he continued, pensively, "hearing the parson read about some handwriting on the wall, that frightened Beelzebub himself; but I tell you this handwriting on the wall used me up a good deal more than that other. Still what followed was worse."

Clark paused for a little while and then, taking a long breath, went on.

"He proceeded to give to the assembled company an account of my life, particularly that very interesting part of it which I passed on my last visit to Botany Bay. You know my escape."

He stopped for a while. "Did he know about that, too?" asked Potts, with some agitation.

"Johnnie," said Clark, "he knew a precious sight more than you do, and told some things which I had forgotten myself. Why, that devil stood up there and slowly told the company not only what I did but what I felt. He brought it all back. He told how I looked at Stubbs, and how Stubbs looked at me in the boat. He told how we sat looking at each other, each in our own end of the boat."

Clark stopped again, and no one spoke for a long time.

"I lost my breath and ran out," he resumed, "and was afraid to go back. I did so at last. It was then almost midnight. I found him still sitting there. He smiled at me in a way that fairly made my blood run cold. 'Crocker,' said he, 'sit down.'"

At this Potts and John looked at each other in horror.

"He knows that too?" said John.

"Every thing," returned Clark, dejectedly. "Well, when he said that I looked a little surprised, as you may be sure."

"I thought you'd be back," said he, "for you want to see me, you know. You're going to follow me," says he. 'You've got your pistols all ready, so, as I always like to oblige a friend, I'll give you a chance. Come.'"

"At this I fairly staggered."

"Come," says he, "I've got all that money, and Potts wants it back. And you're going to get it from me. Come."

"I swear to you I could not move. He smiled at me as before, and quietly got up and left the house. I stood for some time fixed to the spot. At last I grew reckless. 'If he's the devil himself,' says I, 'I'll have it out with him.' I rushed out and followed in his pursuit. After some time I overtook him. He was on horseback, but his horse was walking. He heard me coming. 'Ah, Crocker,' said he, quite merrily, 'so you've come, have you?'"

"I tore my pistol from my pocket and fired. The only reply was a loud laugh. He went on without turning his head. I was now sure that it was the devil, but I fired my other pistol. He gave a tremendous laugh, turned his horse, and rode full at me. His horse seemed as large as the village church. Every thing swam around, and I fell headforemost on the ground. I believe I lay there all night. When I came to it was morning, and I hurried straight here."

As he ended Clark arose, and, going to the sideboard, poured out a large glass of brandy, which he drank raw.

"The fact is," said John, after long thought, "you've been tricked. This fellow has doctored your pistols and frightened you."

"But I loaded them myself," replied Clark.

"When?"

"Oh, I always keep them loaded in my room. I tried them, and found the charge was in them."

"Oh, somebody's fixed them."

"I don't think half as much about the pistols as about what he told me. What devil could have put all that into his head? Answer me that," said Clark.

"Somebody's at work around us," said John.

"I feel it in my bones."

"We're getting used up," said Potts. "The girl's gone again."

"The girl! Gone!"

"Yes, and Mrs. Compton too."

"The devil!"

"I'd rather lose the girl than Mrs. Compton; but when they both vanish the same night what are you to think?"

"I think the devil is loose."

"I'm afraid he's turned against us," said Potts, in a regretful tone. "He's got tired of helping us."

"Do none of the servants know any thing about it?"

"No—none of them."

"Have you asked them all?"

"Yes."

"Doesn't that new servant, the Injin?"

"No; they all went to bed at twelve. Vijal was up as late as two. They all swear that every thing was quiet."

"Did they go out through the doors?"

"The doors were all locked as usual."

"There's treachery somewhere!" cried John, with more excitement than usual.

The others were silent.

"I believe that the girl's at the bottom of it all," said John. "We've been trying to take her down ever since she came, but it's my belief that we'll end by getting took down ourselves. I was against her being sent for from the first. I scented bad luck in her at the other side of the world. We've been acting like fools. We ought to have silenced her at first."

"No," rejoined Potts, gloomily. "There's somebody at work deeper than she is. Somebody—but who?—who?"

"Nobody but the devil," said Clark, firmly.

"I've been thinking about that Italian," continued Potts. "He's the only man living that would bother his head about the girl. They know a good deal between them. I think he's managed some of this last business. He's humbugged us. It isn't the devil; it's this Italian. We must look out; he'll be around here again perhaps."

Clark's eyes brightened.

"The next time," said he, "I'll load my pistols fresh, and then see if he'll escape me!"

At this a noise was heard in the hall. Potts went out. The servants had been scouring the grounds as before, but with no result.

"No use," said John. "I tried it with my dog. He went straight down through the gate, and a little distance outside the scent was lost. I tried him with Mrs. Compton too. They both went together, and of course had horses or carriages there."

"What does the porter say?" asked Clark.

"He swears that he was up till two, and then went to bed, and that nobody was near the gate."

"Well, we can't do any thing," said Potts; "but I'll send some of the servants off to see what they can hear. The scent was lost so soon that we can't tell what direction they took."

"You'll never get her again," said John; "she's gone for good this time."

Potts swore a deep oath and relapsed into silence. After a time they all went down to the bank.

THE RUN ON THE BANK.

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE RUN ON THE BANK.

Not long after the bank opened a number of people came in who asked for gold in return for some bank-notes which they offered. This was an unusual circumstance. The people also were strangers. Potts wondered what it could mean. There was no help for it, however. The gold was paid out, and Potts and his friends began to feel somewhat alarmed at the thought which now presented itself for the first time that their very large circulation of notes might be returned upon them. He communicated this fear to Clark.

"How much gold have you?"
 "Very little."
 "How much?"
 "Thirty thousand."
 "Phew!" said Clark, "and nearly two hundred thousand out in notes!"
 Potts was silent.
 "What'll you do if there is a run on the bank?"
 "Oh, there won't be."
 "Why not?"
 "My credit is too good."
 "Your credit won't be worth a rush if people know this."

While they talked persons kept dropping in. Most of the villagers and people of the neighborhood brought back the notes, demanding gold. By about twelve o'clock the influx was constant. Potts began to feel alarmed. He went out, and tried to bully some of the villagers. They did not seem to pay any attention to him, however. Potts went back to his parlor discomfited, vowing vengeance against those who had thus slighted him. The worst of these was the tailor, who brought in notes to the extent of a thousand pounds, and when Potts ordered him out and told him to wait, only laughed in his face.
 "Haven't you got gold enough?" said the tailor, with a sneer. "Are you afraid of the bank? Well, old Potts, so am I."
 At this there was a general laugh among the people.

The bank clerks did not at all sympathize with the bank. They were too eager to pay out. Potts had to check them. He called them in his parlor, and ordered them to pay out more slowly. They all declared that they couldn't.

The day dragged on till at last three o'clock came. Fifteen thousand pounds had been paid out. Potts fell into deep despondency. Clark had remained throughout the whole morning.
 "There's going to be a run on the bank?" said he. "It's only begun."

Potts's sole answer was a curse.
 "What are you going to do?" he asked.
 "You'll have to help me," replied Potts.
 "You've got something."

"I've got fifty thousand pounds in the Plymouth Bank."
 "You'll have to let me have it."
 Clark hesitated.
 "I don't know," said he.
 "D—n it, man, I'll give you any security you wish. I've got more security than I know what to do with."
 "Well," said Clark, "I don't know. There's a risk."

"I only want it for a few days. I'll send down stock to my London broker and have it sold. It will give me hundreds of thousands—twice as much as all the bank issue. Then I'll pay up these devils well, and that d—d tailor worst of all. I swear I'll send it all down to-day, and have every bit of it sold. If there's going to be a run, I'll be ready for them."

"How much have you?"
 "I'll send it all down—though I'm devilish sorry," continued Potts. "How much? why, see here;" and he penciled down the following figures on a piece of paper, which he showed to Clark:

California Company.....	£100,000
Mexican bonds.....	50,000
Guatemala do.....	50,000
Venezuela do.....	50,000
	£250,000

"What do you think of that, my boy?" said Potts.

"Well," returned Clark, cautiously, "I don't like them American names."

"Why," said Potts, "the stock is at a premium. I've been getting from twenty to twenty-five per cent. dividends. They'll sell for three hundred thousand nearly. I'll sell them all. I'll sell them all," he cried. "I'll have gold enough to put a stop to this sort of thing forever."

"I thought you had some French and Russian bonds," said Clark.

"I gave those to that devil who had the—the papers, you know. He consented to take them, and I was very glad, for they paid less than the others."

Clark was silent.

"Why, man, what are you thinking about? Don't you know that I'm good for two millions, what with my estate and my stock?"

"But you owe an infernal lot."

"I haven't I notes and other securities from every body?"

"Yes, from every body; but how can you get hold of them?"

"The first people of the county!"

"And as poor as rats."

"London merchants!"

"Who are they? How can you get back your money?"

"Smithers & Co. will let me have what I want."

"If Smithers & Co. knew the present state of affairs I rather think that they'd back down."

"Pooh! What! Back down from a man with my means! Nonsense! They know how rich I am, or they never would have begun. Come, don't be a fool. It'll take three days to get gold for my stock, and if you don't help me the bank may stop before I get it. If you'll help me for three days I'll pay you well."

"How much will you give?"

"I'll give ten thousand pounds—there! I don't mind."

"Done. Give me your note for sixty thousand pounds, and I'll let you have the fifty thousand for three days."

"All right. You've got me where my hair is short; but I don't mind. When can I have the money?"

"The day after to-morrow. I'll go to Plymouth now, get the money to-morrow, and you can use it the next day."

"All right; I'll send down John to London with the stock, and he'll bring up the gold at once."

Clark started off immediately for Plymouth, and not long after John went away to London. Potts remained to await the storm which he dreaded.

The next day came. The bank opened late on purpose. Potts put up a notice that it was to be closed that day at twelve, on account of the absence of some of the directors.

At about eleven the crowd of people began to make their appearance as before. Their demands were somewhat larger than on the previous day. Before twelve ten thousand pounds had been paid. At twelve the bank was shut in the faces of the clamorous people, in accordance with the notice.

Strangers were there from all parts of the county. The village inn was crowded, and a large number of carriages was outside. Potts began to look forward to the next day with deep anxiety. Only five thousand pounds remained in the bank. One man had come with notes to the extent of five thousand, and had only been got rid of by the shutting of the bank. He left, vowing vengeance.

To Potts's immense relief Clark made his appearance early on the following day. He had brought the money. Potts gave him his note for sixty thousand pounds, and the third day began.

By ten o'clock the doors were besieged by the largest crowd that had ever assembled in this quiet village. Another host of lookers-on had collected. When the doors were opened they poured in with a rush.

The demands on this third day were very large. The man with the five thousand had fought his way to the counter first, and clamored to be paid. The noise and confusion were overpowering. Every body was cursing the bank or laughing at it. Each one felt doubtful about getting his pay.

Potts tried to be dignified for a time. He ordered them to be quiet, and assured them that they would all be paid. His voice was drowned in the wild uproar. The clerks counted out the gold as rapidly as possible, in spite of the remonstrances of Potts, who on three occasions called them all into the parlor, and threatened to dismiss them unless they counted more slowly.

His threats were disregarded. They went back, and paid out as rapidly as before. The amounts required ranged from five or ten pounds to thousands of pounds. At last, after paying out thousands, one man came up who had notes to the amount of ten thousand pounds. This was the largest demand that had yet been made. It was doubtful whether there was so large an amount left. Potts came out to see him. There was no help for it; he had to parley with the enemy.

He told him that it was within a few minutes of three, and that it would take an hour at least to count out so much; would he not wait till the next day? There would be ample time then.

The man had no objection. It was all the same to him. He went out with his bundle of notes through the crowd, telling them that the bank could not pay him. This intelligence made the excitement still greater. There was a fierce rush to the counter. The clerks worked hard, and paid out what they could in spite of the hints and even the threats of Potts, till at length the bank clock struck the hour of three. It had been put forward twenty minutes, and there was a great riot among the people on that account, but they could not do any thing. The bank was closed for the day, and they had to depart.

Both Potts and Clark now waited eagerly for the return of John. He was expected before the next day. He ought to be in by midnight. After waiting impatiently for hours they at length drove out to see if they could find him.

About twelve miles from Brandon they met him at midnight with a team of horses and a number of men, all of whom were armed.

"Have you got it?"

"Yes," said John, "what there is of it."

"What do you mean by that?"

"I'm too tired to explain. Wait till we get home."

It was four o'clock in the morning before they reached the bank. The gold was taken out and deposited in the vaults, and the three went up to the Hall. They brought out brandy and refreshed themselves, after which John remarked, in his usual laconic style,

"You've been and gone and done it."

"What?" asked Potts, somewhat puzzled.

"With your speculations in stocks."

"What about them?"

"Nothing," said John, "only they happen to be at a small discount."

"A discount?"

"Slightly."

Potts was silent.

"How much?" asked Clark.

"I have a statement here," said John.

"When I got to London, I saw the broker. He said that American stocks, particularly those which I held, had undergone a great depreciation. He assured me that it was only temporary, that the dividends which these stocks paid were enough to raise them in a short time, perhaps in a few weeks, and that it was madness to sell out now. He declared that it would ruin the credit of the Brandon Bank if it were known that we sold out at such a fearful sacrifice, and advised me to raise the money at a less cost."

"Well, I could only think of Smithers & Co. I went to their office. They were all away. I saw one of the clerks who said they had gone to see about some Russian loan or other, so there was nothing to do but to go back to the broker. He assured me again that it was an unheard of sacrifice; that these very stocks which I held had fallen terribly, he knew not how, and advised me to do any thing rather than make such a sacrifice. But I could do nothing. Gold was what I wanted, and since Smithers & Co. were away this was the only way to get it."

"Well!" cried Potts, eagerly. "Did you get it?"

"You saw that I got it. I sold out at a cost that is next to ruin."

"What is it?"

"Well," said John, "I will give you the statement of the broker," and he drew from his pocket a paper which he handed to the others. They looked at it eagerly.

It was as follows:

100 shares California @ £1000 each. 65 per cent. discount.....£35,000

50 shares Mexican. 75 per cent. discount 12,500

50 shares Guatemala. 80 per cent. discount 10,000

50 shares Venezuela. 80 per cent. discount 10,000

£67,000

The faces of Potts and Clark grew black as night as they read this. A deep execration burst from Potts. Clark leaned back in his chair.

"The bank's blown up!" said he.

"No, it ain't," rejoined Potts.

"Why not?"

"There's gold enough to pay all that's likely to be offered."

"How much more do you think will be offered?"

"Not much; it stands to reason."

"It stands to reason that every note which you've issued will be sent back to you. So I'll trouble you to give me my sixty thousand; and I advise you as a friend to hold on to the rest."

"Clark!" said Potts, "you're getting timider and timider. You ain't got any more pluck these times than a kitten."

"It's a time when a man's got to be careful of his earnings," said Clark. "How much have you out in notes? You told me once you had out about £180,000, perhaps more. Well, you've already had to redeem about £75,000. That leaves £105,000 yet, and you've only got £67,000 to pay it with. What have you got to say to that?"

"Well!" said Potts. "The Brandon Bank may go—but what then? You forget that I have the Brandon estate. That's worth two millions."

"You got it for two hundred thousand."

"Because it was thrown away, and dropped into my hands."

"It'll be thrown away again at this rate. You owe Smithers & Co."

"Pooh! that's all offset by securities which I hold."

"Queer securities!"

"All good," said Potts. "All first-rate. It'll be all right. We'll have to put it through."

"But what if it isn't all right?" asked Clark, savagely.

"You forget that I have Smithers & Co. to fall back on."

"If your bank breaks, there is an end of Smithers & Co."

"Oh no. I've got this estate to fall back on, and they know it. I can easily explain to them. If they had only been in town I shouldn't have had to make this sacrifice. You needn't feel troubled about your money. I'll give you security on the estate to any amount. I'll give you security for seventy thousand," said Potts.

Clark thought for a while.

"Well!" said he, "it's a risk, but I'll run it."

"There isn't time to get a lawyer now to make out the papers; but whenever you fetch one I'll do it."

"I'll get one to-day, and you'll sign the papers this evening. In my opinion by that time the bank'll be shut up for good, and you're a fool for your pains. You're simply throwing away what gold you have."

Potts went down not long after. It was the fourth day of the run. Miscellaneous callers thronged the place, but the amounts were not large. In two hours not more than five thousand were paid out.

At length a man came in with a carpet-bag. He pulled out a vast quantity of notes.

"How much?" asked the clerk, blandly.

"Thirty thousand pounds," said the man.

Potts heard this and came out.

"How much?" he asked.

"Thirty thousand pounds."

"Do you want it in gold?"

"Of course."

"Will you take a draft on Messrs. Smithers & Co.?"

"No, I want gold."

While Potts was talking to this man another was waiting patiently beside him. Of course this imperative claimant had to be paid or else the bank would have to stop, and this was a casualty which Potts could not yet face with calmness. Before it came to that he was determined to pay out his last sovereign.

On paying the thirty thousand pounds it was found that there were only two bags left of two thousand pounds each.

The other man who had waited stood calmly, while the one who had been paid was making arrangements about conveying his money away.

It was now two o'clock. The stranger said quietly to the clerk opposite that he wanted gold.

"How much?" said the clerk, with the same blandness.

"Forty thousand pounds," answered the stranger.

"Sorry we can't accommodate you, Sir," returned the clerk.

Potts had heard this and came forward.

"Won't you take a draft on London?" said he.

"Can't," replied the man; "I was ordered to get gold."

"A draft on Smithers & Co.?"

"Couldn't take even Bank of England notes," said the stranger; "I'm only an agent. If you can't accommodate me I'm sorry, I'm sure."

Potts was silent. His face was ghastly. As much agony as such a man could endure was felt by him at that moment.

Half an hour afterward the shutters were up; and outside the door stood a wild and riotous crowd, the most noisy of whom was the tailor.

The Brandon Bank had failed.

Mixed (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.
Coffee roasted and ground daily.
Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may conveniently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

Bogus or Imitations.
We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.
DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND
Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND
CURES
Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.
This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

FACETIÆ.

"THERE is but one good wife in this town," said a clergyman in the course of his sermon—the congregation looked expectant—"and every married man thinks he's got her," added the minister.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Afford, to.—Not to spend more than double your income.

Age.—An indefinite article, added to as a minor, but never allowed to increase after thirty.

Agreeable.—Epithet for any one who carries flattery to its furthest limits.

Agriculture.—Something which produces strawberries and green pease during winter.

Air.—Haughty or otherwise—an element of success.

Allowance.—A paltry pittance made by a father or husband to compare one with slaves for hire.

Amusement.—The aim of life.

Angel, fem.—To be found poetically, before marriage and after death.

Arithmetic.—A torture invented by tradespeople.

Avarice.—Any attempt to spend less than double our income.

Awkward.—Being brought to the point by two men at once, to each of whom she has promised encouragement.

Bait.—Hymen's Market, where unmarried ladies are trotted out for inspection, and knocked down to the highest bidder.

Bank.—A gold-field somewhere in the city, where any man can find money when it is to be spent on himself.

Bargain.—Goods which cost 20 per cent. more than they are worth.

Beau.—A being impervious to the rays of beauty.

Beggar.—Reduced to keeping one man-servant and a pony for the children.

Blush, to.—An art almost extinct. Can be had, however, on the payment of a large sum.

Break.—Used in connection with a heart; perhaps the only thing which was never known to break.

Bridal.—What every female neck bends to willingly, as long as there is no curb.

Brute.—A husband who uses the curb after the bridal.

Business.—Any one's but your own.

Butterfly.—A bachelor who looks before he leaps.

LEARNING.—PAPA: "Well, sissy, how do you like your new school?" Sissy: "Oh, so muts." PAPA: "That's right. Now tell me all you have learned to-day." Sissy: "I have learned the names of all the little boys."

An old Marquesan chief, on being told by a missionary that in heaven there was no war, or hunger, or thirst, or sickness, or death, replied: "That will be a good place for cowards and lazy folks, who are afraid to fight and too lazy to climb bread-fruit and coconut trees."

A woman's tears soften a man's heart; her flatteries his head.

There is said to be living in Winchester a man who is possessed of such a powerful memory that he is employed by the various benevolent societies to "remember the poor."

"It is well," as the man said who suddenly found himself where the water-bucket usually goes.

A benevolent lady went to visit a family who were said to be almost starving. She found them half clad, cold, and not a morsel of food in the house. "What do you most need? what would you like to have?" she asked the mother of the family. "Why, I did a'most want a head-dress, they're so becoming!"

THE EMBARRASSMENT OF RICHES.

EDWIN SENDS HIS WIFE TO A SALE TO BUY SOME FURNITURE—"And look here, Angelina," says he, "don't attempt to Bid yourself; but just glance round the Room, choose a Broker whose Appearance inspires you with implicit Confidence, make a fair Arrangement with him, and let him be your Agent in the Matter."

LEAP-YEAR.

DOMESTIC.—We beg to give the subjoined advice to "young beginners" in the mysteries of "housekeeping." When you go to buy a leg of mutton, invariably keep your wether-eye open!

THE WEATHER.

I've got a deal of common-sense,
But no imagination;
I never made the least pretense
To shine in conversation.
I dare not stray in any way
An inch beyond my tether;
And, when I've nothing else to say
I talk about the weather.

When Mary Ann and I go out
I long to play the lover,
But what on earth to talk about
I never can discover.
I blush to say I often show
The whitest kind of feather,
And stammer out, "Look here, you know—
Let's talk about the weather."

I've run a bill at Mr. Snip's
For articles of raiment;
He always has upon his lips
A hint about its payment.
Whenever Mr. Snip and I
Are left alone together,
You can't imagine how I try
To talk about the weather.

I go to parties now and then,
But never find it answer;
I'm forced to mix among the men
Because I'm not a dancer.
I merely put on evening dress—
White kid and patent leather—
On purpose that I may express
My thoughts about the weather.

A story is told of an Irishman who spent his spare hours during the winter in building a boat in his cellar. When asked how he was to get it out, he said, "By jabsers, I never thought of that." The house had to be raised and the back wall of the cellar taken out before the launch could take place.

The world has a million roosts for a man, but only one nest.

Whatever may be the end of man, there can be no doubt when we see those long trains gracefully sweeping the floors and roads, that the end of woman is—"Dust."

WANTED TO KNOW.

If the person who was overwhelmed with the flood of expectation ever recovered himself.

If the body of a man who was drowned in a sea of troubles was ever found.

The length of the rod of instruction.

How many acres there are in the field of fame.

If the man who was thrown out of employment received any broken bones.

If the lady who held her breath is still holding it.

If the tongue of a wagon ever spoke.

If the eye of a needle can see.

If an ear of corn can hear.

If a rooster's crow can fly.

If water flows from a wagon spring.

Does the kernel of a nut command a regiment?

"Attention, men!" said a corporal to a division of recruits; "when your names are called, you say here; and he who is not here, says absent."

HIGH WORDS—Conversation on Mont Blanc.

When does a criminal resemble an old book?—When he is bound over.

Wanted, by a confectioner—a candid woman.

Mrs. Muffles says it is "dre'ful" hard to lose a husband. She never got used to it until she lost her fourth. Practice makes perfect.

A New Hampshire farmer, who had an invariably good-natured wife, longed to hear her scold for a change, and was advised that a load of crotchety firewood would make her very desirably cross. He tried it. When the pile was gone, he asked if he should get such another supply. "Oh, yes," said she, "for that crooked wood you brought before does lie around the pot so nicely."

STANDING ORDER WITH BEGGARS—Present alms.

An irreverent anecdote is told of a young man who made application for membership of a church, and was placed on probation for the usual period. His conduct having been exemplary, he was notified that he would be received, but replied that he had about made up his mind to join a fire company.

What magazine would be likely to give the best report of a fire?—A powder magazine.

PROVERB FOR HUSBANDS—Where suspicion finds one fault it creates twenty.

"Time is money," as the man said when pawning his watch.

AN ILL-BRED MAN—A sick baker.

When intoxicated, a Frenchman wants to dance, a German to sing, a Spaniard to gamble, an Englishman to eat, an Italian to boast, a Russian to be affectionate, an Irishman to fight, and an American to make a speech.

SOCIAL ANOMALIES.

The more a woman undresses herself, the more she is supposed to be dressed.

The gayer the festive occasion, the blacker is man's apparel.

The louder the company, the stiller the Champagne.

The dearer the hands, the dirtier the treachery.

The slower the acquaintance, the faster the friendship.

The firmer the attachment, the softer the kiss.

DESIGN AFTER NATURE.

New Costume recommended to Ladies who intend going to the Sea-Shore.

This Little Duck wears an Effective Aquatic Jacket, strongly recommended for the Boating Season.

MARY. "Please, Sir, I've been Looking every where for the Third Volume of that Book you was Reading."

LODGER. "Oh, I took it back to the Library this Morning, I—"

Children's Spring and Summer Cloaks and Dresses.

WE give herewith descriptions and patterns of numerous styles of spring and summer cloaks for children. Like those for adults, they are mostly tight-fitting, though many sacks are still worn. A hood, cape, or fichu is frequently worn over the tight-fitting cloak, the ends of the latter being crossed in front and carried behind. The favorite material for children's cloaks is ladies' cloth, of a gray, brown, or some other light color. The trimming consists of bias folds of the same stuff as the cloak, or of satin, the first being generally set on with satin piping. The satin folds are commonly set on with a row of stitching through the middle. Satin and galloon are much used for binding the edges of the cloaks.

The descriptions of the spring cloaks will be found with the patterns on the Supplement. We give a description of the children's summer suits shown in our illustration, the patterns of which will follow in future Numbers. This Number also contains patterns and descriptions of a variety of spring and summer bonnets and parasols.

Fig. 2.—Suit for boy from 3 to 5 years old. Skirt of Scotch plaid, pleated at the top. Paletot of black cloth, trimmed with black velvet ribbon and buttons.

Fig. 5.—Black silk paletot, trimmed with black satin. Dress of blue and under-skirt of gray mohair. Brown straw beret, trimmed with brown satin rouleaux.

Fig. 7.—Dress of blue and white woolen plaid. Black silk paletot, trimmed in the manner shown in the illustration with black satin piping and satin buttons. Toquet of rice straw, trimmed with velvet ribbon.

Fig. 8.—Dress of gray cretonne. Paletot of gray tricot beaver, trimmed with dark gray silk cord, simulating button-holes, and small mother-of-pearl buttons. Toquet of rice straw, with blue crape veil.

Fig. 10.—Dress and paletot of white piq , trimmed with bias folds of the same and a muslin quilling. Beret of English straw, trimmed with feathers.

Fig. 11.—Dress of Irish linen. Paletot of light brown summer velours, trimmed with black silk galloon. Leghorn round hat, with crape veil.

Fig. 1.—PALETOT FOR BOY FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.

BLANCHE AND BESS.

SORE-TASKED is he who would express
The rival charms of Blanche and Bess!
Myself the umpire, naught know I
Of rules wherewith the case to try.

Who loves to greet the kindling rays
That fill the morn of summer days,
Will find their beauties far more fair
In Blanche's brow and eyes and hair.

Whose heart is glad when calm and still
The sunset rays our valleys fill,
Their cloud-rift splendors may descry
In Bessie's cheeks and lips and eye.

Now who shall choose, I prithee say,
Twixt dawning and declining day,
And deem these scenes to be more fair
Than those, when all are past compare?

Away! How'er to others' thought
Some choice may beckon, mine is taught,
As by some influence from above,
Where both are lovely, both to love!

THE TONGUE.

WHATEVER beauty of form and grace of proportion the human tongue may have, no one but the possessor is supposed to be cognizant of them. People are not in the habit of thrusting out this organ to the gaze of others, except in illness for the inspection of the doctor, or in rudeness, to express contempt of an opponent.

The tongue, however, though not wont to make a frequent appearance before the public, demands no less care for the proper performance of the duties of its private station. Upon its surface there is apt to gather a fur which is not easily removed by the ordinary rinsing of the mouth. There is an instrument of silver, called a tongue-scraper, which was never absent from the toilette-cases of our grandams, but is now almost obsolete, that is well adapted to this purpose, and should be used every morning to remove the covering of thickened mucus which accumulates in the course of the night. This fur, if left, gives a pasty sensation to the mouth, and destroying the delicacy of the taste, and the disposition for food, may spoil the appetite.

Dr. Holmes, in one of his medical essays, gives an historical importance to the tongue-scraper. "I," says he, "think more of this little implement, on account of its agency in saving the colony at Plymouth in the year 1623. Edward Winslow heard that Massasoit was sick and like to die. He found him with a houseful of people about him, women rubbing his arms and legs, and friends 'making such a hellish noise' as they probably thought would scare away the devil of sickness. Winslow gave him some conserve, washed his mouth, scraped his tongue, which was in a horrid state, got down some drink, made him some broth, dosed him with an infusion of strawberry leaves and sassafras root, and had the satisfaction of seeing him rapidly recover. Massasoit, full of gratitude, revealed the plot which had been formed to destroy the colonists, whereupon the Governor ordered Captain Miles Standish to see to it." The Captain did effectually "see to it," and stabbing Peckswot, the ringleader, with his own knife, broke up the plot and saved the colony.

The old-fashioned doctor is apt to trust too much to the tongue as an indicator of the state of the stomach, and has often recourse to a severe drench of the remote organ where a simple scrape of the near and tangible one would be more effectual. A mere fur of the tongue should alarm no one, if unaccompanied by no other indication of disease, for in nine cases out of ten it is only a local foulness, easily removed by the scraper, or destined quickly to disappear through the natural self-cleansing of the mouth.

The tongue, though its recuperative power is very great and rapid, as is proved by the quickness and completeness with which a cut, a blister, or a burn, or any ordinary injury of it will heal, may become the seat of serious disease by prolonged irritation. Thus, a jagged tooth, the continued pressure of the pipe-stem, and the end of the cigar will produce tedious ulcers of the tongue, and occasionally deadly cancers.

The tongue has the exclusive credit for functions that does not belong to it. It is not either the sole organ of language or of taste. The throat, with its vocal chords and its palate, and the nose, with its nerves and its air-passages, have a large and indispensable share, both in tasting and talking.

The tongue is ordinarily the most abused of all the organs of sense. While the eye and the ear merely suffer from neglect, the tongue is laboriously perverted. Its nature, by the persistent diligence of a malevolent art, is so totally changed that its dislikes become likes, and its likes dislikes. Tobacco, at first spat at with infinite disgust, is finally fondled with delight by the enslaved tongue, and the simple food of nature is rejected for the spiced dishes of art.

The tongue, it must be confessed, as the organ of material taste has no very dignified function, and has reason to withdraw itself from public notice. It has been likened to a commissary-general, whose supplies are necessary to the action of the other more noble organs, but whose sword is seldom drawn, while its aspect is by no means heroic.

ALL IS CHANGE.

VARIETY is said to be the spice of life; but too much of the spice will spoil the taste for the more simple and substantial constituents. This we fear has been very much the case with us Americans. We are in a constant state of transition, changing our places of abode, our houses, our furniture, our modes of worship even, with the same facility as we put off and on yesterday's and to-day's dress. Fashion, which is proverbially quick to change all over the world, is more so in the United States than elsewhere. The new bonnet or last robe, devised by the fertile fancy of the artistes of Berlin or Paris, becomes generally adopted in New York and throughout the country long before it is so in either of those foreign cities where it may have originated. The reason is obvious. All the world here can afford to indulge more or less in the caprices of fashion; and our people, with their natural alertness and the great facility of communication, catch the novelties as soon as fledged in Europe, bring them across the ocean, and scatter them, at once, in their flight over the whole country. Our fashionable dames returning from their travels, and expecting to surprise their friends with the last bonnet from Paris, are again and again disappointed, on landing, to find what they supposed to be so rare an exotic already naturalized and blooming in every street. Rapidity of change is essential to fashion, and if the last be recognized the first must be conceded, and this may be freely done so far as the outline of a bonnet or the cut of a robe is concerned.

We protest, however, against shifting from one country to another every two or three years, from New York to Paris and back again; removing from this to that abode every six months, now to a furnished mansion, and then to an hotel; undoing every thing that was done in the house last summer, and doing it over again this; altering the proportions of one room, and removing the furniture of the other. If it were only a question of expense or comfort, people might be left to indulge in these caprices; but this perpetual change lowers the tone of American life, and is especially hurtful to the young. It is fatal to the sentiment of home. The most careless observer can not be unconscious of the powerful influence wrought upon the child by the purely material objects by which he may be surrounded. In his objective mind it is the wooden, brick, or stone structure, as it may be, the room of certain proportions, the familiar furniture, the old sofa and capacious arm-chair, the house and its contents, in fact, which constitute the home. And these objects are so closely associated with the affections of childhood that it is not safe to sever them, for if those go, these are apt to follow.

A frequent change of abode very often interferes with all systematic plans of education, hinders constancy and concentration of effort, and prevents the formation of those early friendships so essential to the humane development of character. Upon the parents the effect is no less disastrous, for by their wandering life they become dependent for companionship upon every chance passer, and learn to live upon the accidental excitement of the hour. The effect upon their manners and tastes may be readily inferred. That irritability and restlessness, which are so common as to be considered almost national characteristics, find, in these constant changes, a powerfully exciting cause, as they would their best remedy, in a fixed home and a permanent society.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Sensible Friend.

HOW little I thought, my dear Letitia, when I began to make these little observations upon Manners upon the Road that we should find that manners was a word of so wide a scope. Yet, if you reflect, behavior means very much more than making a bow or—not whistling aloud in church. Behavior, indeed, if I should trust myself to repeat the philosophic observation of my friend Peter Paul Pry, in whose society I take a great deal of pleasure, behavior is the whole manifestation of the man. It is the method in which he does and says every thing; and as manner is more subtle than matter, it more truly reveals his meaning, or conceals it. How often I have heard Mrs. Tilbury say, "Oh, my dear girl, how glad I am to see you!" and I knew from her manner that she meant, "Deuce take it, how shall I get rid of this woman!" Her words said one thing, her manner another; and I trusted the manner.

So one day when my sister was coming out from a friend's house, Mr. Pry said, with a quiet smile, "How Miss Tims hates Mrs. Tompkins!"

"Why, you surprise me," answered my sister. "I thought she said that she was always so glad to meet her, for she was such an amiable and charming person."

"Ah! did she say so?" replied Mr. Pry. "I didn't hear what she said, I only heard what she meant."

Now my sister is not very well versed in the ways of the world—she is what is commonly called an innocent, but such an innocent is by no means a fool, and she instantly asked:

"Mr. Pry, would you have every body say and do exactly what they mean?"

Mr. Peter Paul Pry is not easily disturbed, and he answered as promptly,

"Certainly not."

"Why, Mr. Pry," continued my sister, "do you seriously approve of falsehood? If you had a child would you teach him to say what he did not mean?"

"Why, Mrs. Smith," said Mr. Pry, gayly, and pleasantly imitating her manner, "if you thought me a rascal would you say so?"

"No, because that is unnecessary. I could show you that I thought you so without saying it."

"Certainly," answered Mr. Pry, "just as Miss Tims showed what she thought of Mrs. Tompkins. Your manner would be the interpreter."

My sister, Mrs. Smith, was a little confused, and she waited a moment to rally. But Mr. Pry continued:

"Mrs. Smith, do you think that if you are not glad to see a friend when she calls, you ought to say that you are? And if you ought not, ought you to allow her to deceive herself by supposing that you are? Have you any right to allow her to remain under a false impression? If you do, are you not conniving at the falsehood?"

My sister, Mrs. Smith, told me, when she was repeating the little conversation, that she was rather overwhelmed by this onset. But she replied:

"Charity and kindness are not inconsistent with truthfulness. If I am not glad to see a bore, it is better that I should be pained by his presence than that I should pain him by telling him I wish he hadn't come."

"Certainly," said Mr. Peter Paul Pry, "you do quite right to regard it as a moral discipline."

I tell you this conversation, my dear Letitia, because I think that you may not have thought of the moral involved. It may not have occurred to you that the fault is sometimes upon your side when those rather heavy neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Boulder, come in for a sociable evening. They are severe trials, I allow. I often think as I see them standing upon your step and ringing the bell that Providence moves in inscrutable ways of discipline, and that you are being trained for a saint.

Bores—yes, bores. Dear me! long and long ago, in the days when I used to ride horseback, I was pacing with the beautiful May Violet, the belle of my young days—whose card I have somewhere, and whom you could not recognize in the comfortable Mrs. Embonpoint who fills the entire seat of her carriage—well, I was pacing with her over the road at Saratoga, or Sharon, or Ballston, or Newport, or Niagara, or Long Branch, or among the White Mountains; which was it?—well, at all events, we were pacing along, and I said that I was horribly bored by Ned Noddy—twin brother to Tom. The beautiful May Violet looked at me quietly, and said:

"I never allow myself to be bored."

"Give me the secret," I exclaimed, laughing.

"Pity," said May Violet, and smiled, and broke into a canter, and I galloped after, and we met another party of riders, and all loitered home in the sunset, and I did not have another chance to speak to her until the evening at the hotel. Then this was what I saw.

We were all sitting in the large parlor—you remember the large parlor where they used to have the small dances—and every body was telling the delightful story of an idle day, when I saw Ned Noddy making for May Violet. She received him as she did every body with that superb and radiant smile, of which the soft evening glow still shines upon the face of Mrs. Embonpoint. He stood before her and talked about Heaven knows what! Ned was a ninny then, and the Honorable Edward Noddy does not seem to me very different now although he is—But no matter what. You know as well as I. And the marvel was that she talked to him. I do not mean that she had an air of breathless interest, nor that she was evidently really interested at all. But she was perfectly attentive; listened to all he said; made the most of it; asked questions in return; put him at perfect ease, and after about a quarter of an hour rose and said, "Now, Mr. Noddy, let us go over and join—" somebody, and go she did, and when she had reached her, bowed to him, said "Thank you," and had done with him.

As for Noddy he had been put at his ease; he felt very happy, and May Violet had not deceived him nor any one else. Do you not see that she had been, as it were, a great charitable society? She was a sister of a spiritual order of Vincent de Paul, and had been nursing the sick. She had been giving an alms—an alms no less honest and honorable than that you give to any poor woman who appeals to you and moves your compassion. And what was the secret? It was precisely what she said in her saddle. It was pity. She acknowledged the claim of destitution in the parlor as she does now, I do not doubt, at the area gate. "This man is horribly destitute of every attraction"—such was her angelic reasoning. "There is nobody who will bestow upon him a look or a thought, and they would gladly cast him out among the dogs. Here, sufferer and forlorn, here are ten minutes of conversation." It was pure kindness and holy sympathy. When she went out of the parlor, stately, radiant—Oh days departed!—I bowed low to her, and I said, respectfully, "Good-night, Saint May Violet!"

I can imagine, dear Letitia, what you will say. I can hear you exclaiming, "Oh yes, when you are a superb belle in a summer hotel parlor you can do what you please, and you can be very gracious to bores, and you can send them about their business when you have done with them. But what are you to do with Mr. and Mrs. Boulder who come in upon you, and deliberately, with malice aforethought, murder a whole evening?"

Well, but, Letitia, if you are caught, make the best of it, not the worst. Don't sit and sulk and talk in monosyllables, and drive them out of the house with a very profound and a very accurate impression that you are hideously ill-mannered and probably equally ill-tempered. In the first place, tell Biddy or John that you are very much engaged whenever the Boulders call, except about once a month; and in the second place, if they come in, exert yourself to entertain them. It is discipline, and will do no harm. On the contrary, it will be of great service. Incorrigible bores you can always dispose of. I assure you there is nobody more frequently attacked by them than I. My life is, in a certain sense, a warfare with them, or rather, let me say, an immense discipline for myself. Oh dear, dear! the golden sands of time which these fellows steal, these wretchedly unconscious thieves! But when they seem really to approach the great treasures, and threaten to carry off a day, then I am like Violet May; I rise, and I say, "If you please, I must now attend to this or this."

It needs courage merely: but some are courageous only in extremity. You are not bound to endure the weight of the Boulders as often as they choose to impose themselves upon you. But you are bound to maintain courteous terms with your neighbors; and as manner tells tales and reveals quite as much as words to a sensitive appreciation, the true way is not to feel bored. That may seem preposterous; but it is not so. If you cultivate the distinct consciousness that you can, and that you will relieve yourself of the bore when you choose, you will not feel bored, and your face and your manner will positively glow with the confidence of speedy release.

I speak to you plainly, my dear Letitia, and I do so in perfect faith, because you are a married woman, and feel more free than if you were still merely a belle of the ball-room. That is a pretty little class who seem to suppose that there is no escape. Ah, dear little pretty people, so carefully and richly clad, whirling in the delicious waltz, whose measures still stir this ancient heart, these passive heels, this old dancer emeritus—you who dream by day of the ball by night, and who sweetly repudiate the poor eastern creatures at whom a Sultan flings his handkerchief—how much better, and how different are you? You permit every conceited fellow to steal and squander as much of your precious time as he chooses, by hobbling with you in the waltz and putting you cruelly out of time. The bore to you is the man who can't dance tolerably. Now, him you are not obliged to endure. Say, "I am so sorry that we don't go together nicely," and sternly refuse to try. You are sorry, you dear little jades; you know that nothing makes you more sorry than to have a gawky fellow ask you to dance, except to dance with him. "Queen of herself, though China fall." That is the secret—that is the wisdom of Pope and of Violet May—and if you will be wise, you too will be happy.

Tell your daughter so, dear Letitia, with the love of

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CURTAINS.

IN describing curtains we begin with the indispensable window-shade. White Holland is now preferred to colored shades. Dark brown and green are out of use. Delicate neutral tints that subdue light without reflecting color, and which harmonize with the other colors of the room, are the next choice after white. A wide gilt band is the only ornament. An excellent contrivance for raising shades is now in use. It is similar to the plan by which carriage curtains are raised and lowered, and is much more convenient than the old-fashioned cord over pulleys. It is cheaper also, and does not get out of order so easily.

Curtains are selected to match the carpets and furniture covers. When tapestry is used, the pattern should be the same throughout the room, and the reps and satins with which the furniture is upholstered are also used for curtains. Draped curtains should be amply long and full, and lined and interlined to make them fall into rich folds. Thick heavy reps and satins are formed into side draperies and fastened back to display the flowing lace curtains beneath. Tapestry borders, gimps, and wide bands of velvet are used for trimming. The lambrequin or hanging drapery at the top of the window falls in deep points at the sides, and is fancifully notched and curved. The trimming is a deep fringe, made of several colors, for tapestry, and of one shade, with steel ornaments, for solid colors. The material is drawn plain across the window, or arranged in set folds. Full drapery of thick material is also used at the head of windows over lace curtains, without side hangings.

Brocaded and damask satins are not so fashionable as the plain surfaces and reps; but the beautiful cloth of gold and the rich brocades, so like embroidery, are always admired. Solid colors are sometimes trimmed with a brightly contrasting shade. Crimson and drab are seen together, and green is trimmed with a walnut brown. A reception parlor, furnished lately for a newly-married pair, is upholstered throughout with fawn-colored satin. The side draperies for the windows are each the full width of the satin, which is a yard and a half. They are lined with silk of precisely the same shade, and thickly interlined. The trimming is a four inch border of scarlet velvet at the sides and bottom of the curtain. The cord and tassels that hold them back are of both colors mingled. Lace curtains, falling to the floor, are displayed between them. The lambrequins are vandyked and fringed.

In less expensive materials there is the wide, solid-colored silk reps, sold at $9 a yard, and the striped terry in chintz patterns, a blue stripe alternating with one in cashmere colors, or a quiet gray beside tapestry medallions, for $7 the yard. The worsted reps are from $3 to $4 50 a yard, and are two yards wide. These are suitable for plain parlors, and for dining-rooms and libraries, and are trimmed with gay borders, or with the same color. It is in rich, warm colors, crimson, brown, and green, and blue if preferred, but blue is not a desirable color for curtains.

Cornices are very narrow and plain. Black walnut studded with steel is a suitable cornice for heavy reps. The immense tassels have walnut heads and steel pendants among the woolen fringe. Wooden pins for holding back the curtains are preferred to gilt.

LACE CURTAINS.

Beautiful lace curtains are displayed with fine mesh, almost covered by the embroidery. Small flowers are in the centre and a wide border surrounds the whole curtain. Some of these are $100 a window, and others are as low as $12 50. The rich appliqué laces vary from $25 to $75. Nottingham laces are fresh and pretty for chamber windows. A whole window may be furnished for $4, but the handsomest are $22. These are bordered, with striped centres, and at a short distance the imitation is not easily detected.

The tamboured muslin is admired for country houses. They should be made wide and full and looped at the side by white cords and tassels.

Dotted Swiss muslin is trimmed with a fluted ruffle and secured to the side pins with narrow frills.

CHINTZ AND CRETONNE.

The European plan of fitting up the whole chamber or a country drawing-room with chintz is being introduced here. The lambrequins, the portières, or door-hangings, the mantle-covers, toilette draperies, bed-curtains, and sofa and chair covers, are all of the same material. Glazed chintz of bright yet durable colors is used for this purpose. It is in light blue and drab grounds, with gay stripes and medallions. French cretonne, thicker than chintz, is considered preferable. It has a satin-like twill that renders it very strong. It is in antique and in Oriental patterns, particularly appropriate for the Turkish lounges and easy-chairs of the bedrooms.

Buff and dove colored linen, white and pink striped dimity, and the Jacquard linens in twilled stripes of contrasting colors, are also used for chamber furniture. Loose summer wraps for parlor use should be of white linen, bound with a bright color.

TABLE AND PIANO COVERS.

Turkish table-covers are mosaics made of tiny pieces of cloth, needle-worked together like India shawls. They are marked $100 and $125. Covers of Aubusson tapestry are shown in small squares at from $20 to $75. Green cloth centres with appliqué borders in bright colors are easily made with piano-covers to match. The appliqué pattern is sometimes in leaves of gilt. The soft velvet-looking Moquette of beautifully blended colors is sold at $20.

TABLE CHINA.

A visit to the china establishments discloses myriads of the beautiful things with which housewives love to adorn their tables. Connoisseurs say there have been great improvements made in all kinds of pottery ware within the past ten years. The eye is no longer offended with clumsily-shaped table wares covered with grotesque ornaments. Taste and skill are displayed in their shape and decoration, and the more common articles, the necessities as well as the luxuries, are made after graceful and artistic designs.

In table china the preference at present is for pure shapes and simple outlines, with very little ornamental moulding, but highly enameled and decorated with gilt. Heraldic designs, antiques, medallions, and monograms are the favorite centre decorations. Solid bands of gilt and of enameling in high colors surround the device. There are buff grounds and bright coral, shaded crimson and pomona green, on which are wreaths of small flowers or Grecian tracery in gilt. Many handsome French sets have the plates and platters ornamented only on the rim. Centre ornaments are concealed by the food, and are soon defaced by the knife and fork. For these reasons monograms and initials should always be near the edge. The best artists charge from $9 to $12 a dozen for monograms, which adds about $150 to the expense of a set of china.

The oval shape, so long preferred for the larger articles of dinner sets, is giving place to round dishes for vegetables and salads, soup tureens, and in fact every thing but meat platters. Very few dishes are now placed on pedestals. There is a tendency to place every thing low and near the table except the centre épergne. Composts and custard-stands are but slightly elevated above the flat salver at their base.

DINNER SETS.

Among the plain white china we were shown dinner sets of one hundred and fifty pieces, in which are included a small breakfast, dessert, and tea sets. These were of light French ware almost transparent. The prices ranged from $40 to $75. Cheaper sets are sold at $30. These are of very fair quality, so little inferior to those just mentioned that the difference could only be detected by a practiced eye. They are suitable for ordinary use, and contain every thing necessary for a small family table. A very full set of pure white china from the French Exposition is marked $800. It is exceedingly thin and fragile, with no ornament except a border of curved moulding. Its beauty consists in its delicate material and artistic shapes.

Very pretty decorated sets may be bought for $150. Many persons prefer the narrow ornamental borders of such sets rather than more profuse ornament. With elaborate decoration and heraldic devices a full dinner set will cost $700. A quaint antique design entirely covered over with Chinese figures and hieroglyphics is worth $1000.

The English stone china, so much used all over Europe, is being introduced here. It is of dark, rich colors thickly strewn with flowers, and is appropriate for country houses furnished in the cottage style. The majolica ware is admired for dessert sets. It comes in the deep cobalt-blue grounds, and in rich-shaded sea-green, with oak-colored perforated borders in vine-wreaths and leaves. Wedgewood is pretty made in tea sets. It is not very popular, though of clear shades with classic decorations. There are tiny tête-à-tête sets of the transparent Sèvres, and others of more substantial china in vivid colors without gloss. There are black coral grounds with gay medallions of flowers and landscapes, called the Pompadour sets. Japanned tea-trays are grained to represent rosewood and walnut. They are without ornament in the centre and surrounded by a Roman border of red and gilt. Bread trenchers of stone china are shown, but those of carved wood are preferred. A large knife with carved handle accompanies them.

TOILETTE SET, VASES, AND JARDINIÈRES.

The vivid colors now applied to china are especially appropriate for toilette sets. It is the fancy now to arrange receptacles for flowers on all the toilette articles. Tops of cosmetic boxes and of perfume bottles are surmounted by a lily large enough to hold a single flower, or with a cornucopia for a bouquet. A novelty in vases is a fine etched glass bowl of floral pattern, in standards of carved walnut wood. There are also thick cut-glass vases, tulip-shaped, resting on leaves of real bronze. A pair of French china vases represents the four seasons. The painting is beautifully done, and the border around the medallion is considered a masterpiece. The price is $200. Very large vases for a hall are covered with grotesque Chinese figures. They are marked $350.

GLASSWARE.

The prevailing styles of glassware for table use are light delicate shapes with only slight borders and monograms for decorations. The glass called mousseline by the French is much used. It is very frail, but pretty, and displays to advantage the engraving, cutting, or etching, with which it is ornamented. Breakfast goblets have round bowls on a slight stem. Table tumblers are deep and cylindrical, but are very little used. Wine-glasses are mounted on the merest straw stems. Preserve dishes are round and on low pedestals, or without any. Bohemian ware is losing favor. Rose-colored glasses and the pomona green are used for Rhine wines.

A dinner set of etched glass is sold for $50. The set consists of goblets and finger-bowls, a dozen of each, four decanters, and four dozen glasses of different shapes, for Champagne, claret, wine, and liqueur.

A pretty claret pitcher is of a new shape, without a stopper. The glass is engraved in a border of grapes and leaves, with monogram on the bowl. A wine pitcher of Bohemian glass, frosted blue and white, has a pocket or a cave under the handle for holding ice, so that it may not dilute the wine. There are handsome dessert sets of frosted glass, white and gilt, or of ruby. The épergne is for flowers. There are two large compotiers for fruit, four cake salvers shaped like shells, and a dozen plates. The ruby set is $150.

CUTLERY, ETC.

A new table-knife may be mentioned here. The blade and handle are forged from one bar of steel, and are heavily plated with silver. The handle is shaped similarly to a fork handle, and is more convenient to use than a bulky one of ivory. It can be replated every year at less expense than is required to keep ivory handles in repair, and the handles are not in danger of coming loose, as is the case with the latter. The price is $12 a dozen for table-knives, and $10 for the smaller dessert size.

Among the new labor-saving machines is a patent contrivance for mixing the batter of cakes and puddings. A crank turns a wheel and a paddle which, by constant rotary motion in the batter, makes it light and of proper consistency. A larger machine, of more force, kneads dough in the same way. Another patent coffee-pot is added to the list, which claims to condense the coffee instead of boiling it. The aroma that usually escapes with the steam is here retained because the steam is condensed. A table file is made of porcelain and preferred by many to the best steel.

A new broom has been invented which, when worn out, can be unscrewed from the handle and replaced by a new one at a small expense, and which possesses greater elasticity from being set into a brass cap instead of being banded at the top like the common broom. But one of the new inventions in which housewives will most delight is a washing-machine which has the great advantage over others of its species that the fire does the work of the laundress without necessitating any manual labor. This machine is in the form of a large boiler, provided with tubes, through which the hot suds are forced upward by means of a vacuum and poured back upon the clothes placed within it, thus cleansing them thoroughly by the rapid circulation of water through the fabric.

PERSONAL.

SEVERAL ladies of high social position in this city—Mrs. WM. B. PARKER, Mrs. JOHN SHERWOOD, Mrs. EDWARD COOPER, Mrs. WM. T. BLODGETT, Mrs. GEO. F. BETTS, Mrs. DE BIRMINGHAM, and Mrs. S. L. M. BARLOW—did a very kindly thing in lending their influence and efforts to a series of concerts and dramatic entertainments ("Private Theatricals") at the theatre of the Union League Club, in aid of the charities of New York on the evenings of April 20, 22, 24, 27, 29, May 1, and the afternoon of May 2.

—Mr. CHARLES A. DANA is making a great success of the Sun. Already it is paying a handsome interest to its stockholders. Its editorials—brief, scholarly, able—have the true journalistic ring. Its local and general news is clearly and concisely given; its literary selections admirable; its telegraphic intelligence as full as that of any of its contemporaries. It is therefore not surprising that a paper so excellent in every department, sold for two cents, should be found in the homes and in the hands of "all sorts and conditions of men."

—The senior counsel of the President of the United States, Mr. BENJAMIN RAND CURTIS, formerly one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the only one, we believe, who ever resigned from that position—is described as a man without a smile or a trifle. He is like DANIEL WEBSTER in stature, face, and manner; seldom walks in any body's company, but with slow, deliberate stride comes alone to the Capitol, and entering the Senate, sits in a condition of vigilant retirement. He exchanges no words with his legal brethren. If he is introduced to any body he shakes hands with that gravity that WEBSTER used to revel in. He weighs about 190 pounds, perhaps more. Nature gave him a good, large, Websterian head, and his face is a fine old liver-color.

—Mrs. DISRAELI has at length reached the point of her highest aspirations. Not only is her husband Prime Minister of England, but she recently gave a dinner party at which the notable people of the kingdom assisted, the Premier taking the Princess of Wales down to dinner, Mrs. DISRAELI leaning on the arm of the Prince. That, to her, must have been a most satisfactory banquet.

—Nowadays, when one of our city ladies desires to hold a consultation with a first-class modiste, the visit must be made to the latter, a card sent in, and time awaited to see whether her modisteship can "receive." Something of the same sort, though a trifle more Pelham-ish, is told of a famous inventor of fashions in Paris, named WORTH. "When this truly great man is composing he reclines on a sofa, and one of the young ladies of the establishment plays 'Verdi' to him; he composes chiefly in the evening, and says that the rays of the setting sun gild his conceptions. Like every great genius, he is very modest, and thinks the very weakest tea of himself. A short time since he told the Duchess de — that he could give her a dress, but he could not supply style."

—The New York correspondent of the Chicago Tribune makes a strong demand upon the public credulity when he asks it to believe, that when Mr. BRYANT called on Mr. DICKENS at his hotel and sent up his card it was returned with the reply that Mr. DICKENS made it a rule to see no one. It was this discourtesy, says the correspondent, which led Mr. BRYANT to decline to preside at the journalistic dinner given to Mr. DICKENS on the 18th ult.

—An enthusiastic admirer of Mr. COLFAX says that he is not only one of the best fellows in the world, but that "his face is a banquet-house." His tones, grasp, and air are of the pleasantest, and he puts you at ease with yourself in a moment. As much as any of the oncoming statesmen of the country he possesses Emerson's ticket of admission to the highest honors:

"The only credentials,
Passport to success,
Opens castle and parlor,
Address, man, address!"

—It must have been quite diverting the other evening at Cleveland, Ohio, to see Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS quit the stage at one part of the performance, step down into the leader's chair in front, assume the baton, and lead the orchestra; which she positively did, because the leader was naughty and didn't show at the right moment. Perhaps, as Mr. WEBSTER used to say, he was "suffering from an accident of hospitality."

—It is rumored that should changes take place in the Cabinet, after the termination of the JOHNSON trial, Mr. SEWARD will visit the States of Central America and perhaps take a run over to China. He has fairly earned his vacation, and the whole country will be glad to see him go away and have a good time.

—The Rev. Mr. SPURGEON is said to be very happy in his domestic relations, his wife being in entire sympathy with him in all his efforts. They have two children, twins, boys now eleven years old, who are studying in the Metropolitan Tabernacle College. The following touching incident in connection with them will be interesting to the readers of the Bazar: "When Mr. and Mrs. SPURGEON had departed last year on their summer tour, the two boys entered into conversation with each other as to how they should act with respect to the evening's devotions. After some consultation on the subject, it was finally arranged that one should read the chapter and that the other should pray. When the evening had come and the hour of prayer had arrived, they called together all connected with the house, and having read and prayed as they had planned during the day, they dismissed the servants and retired to repose. When the parents returned home and learned what had been done, with tears they embraced their little ones, and rendered praises and thanksgivings unto God."

—Hon. JOHN MAGEE, who died a few days since at his home in Schuylers County, New York, was one of the wealthiest men of the time, estimated at $40,000,000. He was one of the original projectors of the Erie Railway, and for many years a leading director. He was also the originator and, up to his demise, president of the Steuben County Bank. The bulk of his fortune has been made within the last ten or fifteen years by dealing in coal lands in Pennsylvania, which he bought and sold on a gigantic scale. Among other bequests he left $30,000 to the American Bible Society, and $30,000 to the American Tract Society.

—The "LONG JOHN WENTWORTH" of the British Parliament is Mr. WARD HUNT, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who stands six feet six inches in his stockings and is proportionately stout—the tallest, heaviest, and one of the ablest men in the House of Commons.

—A new star in the musical firmament has arisen in Florence. Her name is LINDA CARACIOLO. She is young, handsome, possesses a wonderful voice, has been thoroughly drilled by the best masters, and has, besides, histrionic talent of a high order. The operatic world craves such things and pays liberally for first-class warblers.

—The Head Centres of empire in France and Prussia have been doing honor to plebeian talent.—NAPOLEON having just conferred the decoration of the Legion of Honor on M. PAUL DUPONT, a famous printer of Paris; and the Prussian monarch having sent a splendid porcelain vase from the royal manufactory at Berlin to Dr. NELATON as a mark of his Majesty's satisfaction at the successful operation to which Count de GOLTZ, the Prussian ambassador, owes the re-establishment of his health.

—Mrs. FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE has two daughters, one of whom is married to Dr. WISTAR (old, historical family), of Philadelphia. The other resides in Georgia, on a plantation of her father's, and is said to be greatly beloved by the colored people, formerly Mr. B.'s slaves.

—LEON COWESAC, valet of the Emperor LOUIS NAPOLEON, died recently in Paris, quite wealthy. He owned the house at Vichy in which the EMPEROR was accustomed to stay during his visits to that watering-place, and on arriving used to say, in a jocular way, "Well, LEON, I am your lodger again." Happy LEON!

—Dr. TIMOTHY TITCOMB HOLLAND paid, last year, government tax on an income of $7315. At least he confessed to that amount.

—A connubial festivity of the highest artistic distinction is about to take place in Paris.—M. GUSTAVE DORE being about to wed Mlle. NILSSON, the prima donna. As each is very rich, very gifted, and very celebrated, they ought to be very, very happy. Is there any Accident Insurance Company willing to take a risk on that? It comes under the head of "Extra Hazardous."

—Mrs. VICTOR HUGO, being moved thereto by the reputation of her husband, has done a very successful novel, which is understood to present much of the history of her husband's life. A similar literary experiment is about to be followed by the wife of another illustrious exile, Madame EDGAR QUINET, who has in press a work which will contain not only memoirs of her own and her husband's life in banishment, but many details of the proscription of 1851.

—That rollicking young gentleman, the Archduke HENRY, of Austria, who lately married a clever young actress against the commands of the Emperor, and was consequently told he mustn't come to the royal abode any more, has been permitted to return, the Kaiser having recognized the marriage. He, moreover, has promised to be good to the young people, and make Mrs. "Henry" a baroness, and receive her at court.

—The author of the "Schonberg-Cotta Family," Mrs. CHARLES, is a small, slight lady, very English, whose modest, almost timid, manners at once engage interest and sympathy. She is the only child of a Member of Parliament who died a few years since. Mr. CHARLES is a merchant of London, who, though engaged in business, shares in the tastes of his wife, and furnishes her ample means for her gratification.

—M. THIERS is now seventy, but incessantly active as ever. He has preserved the freshness and almost fiery impetuosity of a young man, and is a most indefatigable student and worker. He rises every morning at five o'clock and repairs immediately to his study, which, of a very large size, forms a sort of gallery, and contains five windows, four of which open on St. George's Place, and the fifth on the garden of the mansion—a garden such as nowadays is rarely met with in Paris—with tall old trees, a splendid lawn, and countless rose-buds. Roses are THIERS's favorite flowers. He remains at work until noon, when he takes a light breakfast in his study. Like all men working with their heads, he eats very little in the morning and does not smoke at all.

—The younger GLADSTONE (W. H.) recently made his maiden speech in Parliament during the dinner-hour, very naturally selecting a time when his father was not in his seat. It was polished, graceful, and well delivered. He was well received in a thin house, and had the tact not to talk a minute too long. A chip of the ancient block.

Directions for Making Bonnet Frames and Bonnets.

With the aid of the accompanying figures, our readers will be enabled to make their own bonnet-frames, cheaply and easily, which will often prove a great convenience to those living in the country. We also give patterns of the latest styles of bonnets, which it is often difficult or impossible to obtain in small places.

Fig. 1.—Outer Wire of Bonnet Frame—Reduced.

The making of a bonnet frame is very simple; the material needed is foundation muslin, coarse and fine wire, and, for some styles, also silk.

For the simple forms, shape first the outer edge of the frame of coarse wire, allowing the ends to lap over about an inch, and fastening them together as shown in Figs. 1 and 2, with fine wire such as is used in making flowers. Instead of this, fine bonnet-wire may be used, which is easily taken out. The so-formed wire circle (see Fig. 1), the size of which is according to the size and front part lay the pleat as shown above and sew the foundation to the outer wire. The Augusta bonnet is made after the same pattern as the Marie Antoinette.

The "Pompadour" bonnet, Fig. 6, consists of three bands and a head-piece of the foundation muslin. In forming this, cut first of any silk at hand—it is immaterial whether it be old or new—two bias bandeaux, each two and a half inches wide, the one eleven and the other twelve inches in length; in addition to these a straight piece of foundation muslin twelve and a half inches long, for the front band. The material of the bandeaux is to be laid over on both sides at the distance of three-fourths of an inch from the edge, so that each finished band shall be one inch wide. In each of the seams made by thus folding the material lay a fine wire and back-stitch it fast. The upper edge of the stuff may be laid under in a narrow hem and then hemmed to the under edge as shown by Fig. 8. In order to give the silk bands the shape form of the frame, and is designated in the descriptions accompanying each, must now be bent into the requisite form as shown in the pattern accompanying each description. The ends which are fastened together must always come in the middle of the back of the frame. The cross wires, of fine wire, must next be fastened to this, as shown in the patterns and accompanying descriptions. Each of these pieces should be cut about half an inch longer than is given in the cut. The ends of these cross wires are wound around the outer edge of the frame-work as shown in Fig. 4. It is well to use scissors or a knife in order to make the fastening firm. The points where the wire crosses are fastened by means of threads, the ends of which are tied. Having finished the frame-work, stretch the foundation muslin lightly over it, fastening only on the outer border.

For the frame of a black bonnet use black foundation and black wire, and for a white bonnet white material; for a lace or crape bonnet in colors wind the frame with narrow bias strips of the same material, and cover the foundation with several thicknesses of the same, in order that it may not show through. Pliers are used for cutting the wire; if these are not at hand make an oblique cut with the scissors, after which it is easily broken.

The most simple style here given is the "Metternich," Fig. 5. In making the frame for this, fashion the outer part of the frame-work from a wire twenty-five inches long, after the pattern given in Fig. 52 of the Supplement, as shown in the illustration Fig. 1. The cross wires are placed as shown in Fig. 52 of the Supplement, and the accompanying illustrations Figs. 2-8. Over the prepared frame-work stretch tightly a piece of foundation, hem-stitch it over the outer wire, cut the edges shown by Figs. 48 and 49, Supplement, the outer side of the stuff must be stretched and the wire bent as shown in the pattern. The finished bandeaux are fastened together at the points designated by the numbers. Then cut according to Fig. 50, Supplement, a piece of foundation muslin, bias along the middle, and extending a quarter of an inch beyond the edges. This must be sewed to the bands on the under side, holding the material in as required between the numbers 56 and 57. The Pompadour and Watteau bonnets are made in this manner:

Having completed the frame, proceed to cover it with the material chosen.

The manner of doing this, as also the arrangement of bows, flowers, lace, feathers, etc., can scarcely be described, but must be learned from illustration, and will depend on individual taste and the skill of the maker. It only remains to mention that the material must always be put on bias, so that it can be stretched at will, whether it be plain, pleated, or puffed over the frame. In putting on the outside material—if it be plain it must be tightly stretched—lay it over the frame, cut it at the distance of half an inch beyond the edge of the bonnet, and sew it fast to the foundation on the inner side, taking care not to let the stitches be visible on the outside. Line with tulle or material like the bonnet.

The borders may be made in different ways. Take either a piece of the bonnet material, or, in case that be light, of silk or velvet of the same color. Figs. 9-11 show a rounded border. Take a bias strip two inches wide, as shown by Fig. 9, and sew it on the bonnet, taking care to sew through the double material, and to draw the thread tight; lay away a quarter of an inch from the edge of the wire, and sew this down on the inside of the frame.

Fig. 7 is the Marie Antoinette. Begin this by fastening the ends of a wire twenty-four inches long in the manner shown by Fig. 2, bend it in the shape given by Fig. 53 of the Supplement, and fasten to this the middle long wire and the cross wires as shown by Figs. 3 and 4. On this lay the doubled stuff bias along the middle line, and cut the sides, leaving half an inch of the material beyond the edge. In the the stuff over the edge and hem down on the under side so that the stitches shall not show on the outside.

The border shown by Fig. 12 is made in a similar manner, but in this a fold without a cord is laid on the right side. This may be of a different color from the bonnet.

Still another border is made by a bias strip of stuff one and a half inches in width; lay the edges over at the width of a quarter of an inch (see Fig. 13), fold the strip together at half its width, and fasten one end to a corner of the bonnet, laying it so that the middle seam made by doubling shall lie exactly on the front edge of the bonnet; stretch the strip along the edge till it exactly fits, then fasten it on the other corner and hem down on the inside. On the outside the border will lie smooth, and does not need to be fastened.

For the band simulating a diadem, which is seen on the front of many bonnets, sew together two widths of wire bonnet, each nine inches long, and cover them with a strip of bias material, five inches wide, laying in a piece of stiff muslin. Fig. 14 shows a finished band. The ends must be fastened inside near the front edge of the bonnet. The remainder is left loose.

As the bonnets are mostly fastened under the chin by means of tulle or crape, the ribbons are usually narrow. They are sewed on the corners of the bonnet, and tied back under the hair. The ribbon is folded down to the width of an inch by making two pleats, and is then sewed on as shown by Fig. 17.

CHAPTER L.

THE BANK DIRECTORS.

THE bank doors were closed, and the bank directors were left to their own reflections. Clark had been in through the day, and at the critical moment his feelings had overpowered him so much that he felt compelled to go over to the inn to get something to drink, wherewith he might refresh himself and keep up his spirits.

Potts and John remained in the bank parlor. The clerks had gone. Potts was in that state of dejection in which even liquor was not desirable. John showed his usual nonchalance.

"Well, Johnnie," said Potts, after a long silence, "we're used up!"

"The bank's bursted, that's a fact. You were a fool for fighting it out so long."

"I might as well. I was responsible, at any rate."

"You might have kept your gold."

"Then my estate would have been good. Besides, I hoped to fight through this difficulty. In fact, I hadn't any thing else to do."

"Why not?"

"Smithers & Co."

"Ah! yes."

"They'll be down on me now. That's what I was afraid of all along."

"How much do you owe them?"

"Seven hundred and two thousand pounds."

"The devil! I thought it was only five hundred thousand."

"It's been growing every day. It's a dreadful dangerous thing to have unlimited credit."

"Well, you've got something as an offset. The debts due the bank."

"Johnnie," said Potts, taking a long breath, "since Clark isn't here I don't mind telling you that my candid opinion is them debts isn't worth a rush. A great crowd of people came here for money. I didn't hardly ask a question. I shelled out royally. I wanted to be known, so as to get into Parliament some day. I did what is called 'going it blind.'"

"How much is owing you?"

"The books say five hundred and thirteen thousand pounds—but it's doubtful if I can get any of it. And now Smithers & Co. will be down on me at once."

"What do you intend to do?"

"I don't know."

"Haven't you thought?"

"No, I couldn't."

"Well, I have."

"What?"

"You'll have to try to compromise."

"What if they won't?"

John shrugged his shoulders, and said nothing.

"After all," resumed Potts, hopefully, "it can't be so bad. The estate is worth two millions."

"Pooh!"

"Isn't it?"

"Of course not. You know what you bought it for."

"That's because it was thrown away."

"Well, it'll have to be thrown away again."

"Oh, Smithers & Co. 'll be easy. They don't care for money."

"Perhaps so. The fact is, I don't understand Smithers & Co. at all. I've tried to see through their little game, but can't begin to do it."

"Oh, that's easy enough! They knew I was rich, and let me have what money I wanted."

John looked doubtful.

At this moment a rap was heard at the back door.

"There comes Clark!" said he.

Potts opened the door. Clark entered. His face was flushed, and his eyes bloodshot.

"See here," said he, mysteriously, as he entered the room.

"What?" asked the others, anxiously.

"There's two chaps at the inn. One is the Italian—"

"Langhetti!"

"Ay," said Clark, gloomily; "and the other is his mate—that fellow that helped him to carry off the gal. They've done it again this time, and my opinion is that these fellows are at the bottom of all our troubles. You know whose son he is."

Potts and John exchanged glances.

"I went after that devil once, and I'm going to try it again. This time I'll take some one who isn't afraid of the devil. Johnnie, is the dog at the Hall?"

"Yes."

"All right!" said Clark. "I'll be even with this fellow yet, if he is in league with the devil."

With these words Clark went out, and left the two together. A glance of savage exultation passed over the face of Potts.

"If he comes back successful," said he, "all right, and if he doesn't, why then?" He paused.

"If he doesn't come back," said John, finishing the sentence for him, "why then—all right."

CHAPTER LI.

A STRUGGLE.

ALL the irresolution which for a time had characterized Despard had vanished before the shock of that great discovery which his father's manuscript had revealed to him. One purpose now lay clearly and vividly before him, one which to so loyal and devoted a nature as his was the holiest duty, and that was vengeance on his father's murderers.

In this purpose he took refuge from his own grief; he cast aside his own longings, his anguish, his despair. Langhetti wished to search after his "Bice"; Despard wished to find those whom his dead father had denounced to him. In the intensity of his purpose he was careless as to the means by which that vengeance should be accomplished. He thought not whether it would be better to trust to the slow action of the law, or to take the task into his own hands. His only wish was to be confronted with either of these men, or both of them.

"THUG! DO YOU KNOW WHAT THAT IS?"

It was with this feeling in his heart that he set out with Langhetti, and the two went once more in company to the village of Brandon, where they arrived on the last day of the "run on the bank."

He did not know exactly what it would be best to do first. His one idea was to go to the Hall, and confront the murderers in their own place. Langhetti, however, urged the need of help from the civil magistrate. It was while they were deliberating about this that a letter was brought in addressed to the Rev. Courtenay Despard.

Despard did not recognize the handwriting. In some surprise how any one should know that he was here he opened the letter, and his surprise was still greater as he read the following:

"SIR,—There are two men here whom you seek—one Potts, the other Clark. You can see them both at any time."

"The young lady whom you and Signor Langhetti formerly rescued has escaped, and is now in safety at Denton, a village not more than twenty miles away. She lives in the last cottage on the left-hand side of the road, close by the sea. There is an American elm in front."

There was no signature.

Despard handed it in silence to Langhetti, who read it eagerly. Joy spread over his face. He started to his feet.

"I must go at once," said he, excitedly. "Will you?"

"No," replied Despard. "You had better go. I must stay; my purpose is a different one."

"But do not you also wish to secure the safety of Bice?"

"Of course; but I shall not be needed. You will be enough."

Langhetti tried to persuade him, but Despard was immovable. For himself he was too impatient to wait. He determined to set out at once. He could not get a carriage, but he managed to obtain a horse, and with this he set out. It was about the time when the bank had closed.

Just before his departure Despard saw a man come from the bank and enter the inn. He knew the face, for he had seen it when here before. It was Clark. At the sight of this face all his fiercest instinct awoke within him—a deep thirst for vengeance arose. He could not lose sight of this man. He determined to track him, and thus by active pursuit to do something toward the accomplishment of his purpose.

He watched him, therefore, as he entered the inn, and caught a hasty glance which Clark directed at himself and Langhetti. He did not understand the meaning of the scowl that passed over the ruffian's face, nor did Clark understand the full meaning of that gloomy frown which lowered over Despard's brow as his eyes blazed wrathfully and menacingly upon him.

Clark came out and went to the bank. On quitting the bank Despard saw him looking back at Langhetti, who was just leaving. He then watched him till he went up to the Hall.

In about half an hour Clark came back on horseback followed by a dog. He talked for a while with the landlord, and then went off at a slow trot.

On questioning the landlord Despard found that Clark had asked him about the direction which Langhetti had taken. The idea at once flashed upon him that possibly Clark wished to pursue Langhetti, in order to find out about Beatrice. He determined on pursuit, both for Langhetti's sake and his own.

He followed, therefore, not far behind Clark, riding at first rapidly till he caught sight of him at the summit of a hill in front, and then keeping at about the same distance behind him. He had not determined in his mind what it was best to do, but held himself prepared for any course of action.

After riding about an hour he put spurs to his horse, and went on at a more rapid pace. Yet he did not overtake Clark, and therefore conjectured that Clark himself must have gone on more rapidly. He now put his own horse at its fullest speed, with the intention of coming up with his enemy as soon as possible.

He rode on at a tremendous pace for another half hour. At last the road took a sudden turn; and, whirling around here at the utmost speed, he burst upon a scene which was as startling as it was unexpected, and which roused to madness all the fervid passion of his nature.

The road here descended, and in its descent wound round a hill and led into a gentle hollow, on each side of which hills arose which were covered with trees.

Within this glen was disclosed a frightful spectacle. A man lay on the ground, torn from his horse by a huge blood-hound, which even then was rending him with its huge fangs! The dismounted rider's foot was entangled in the stirrups, and the horse was plunging and dragging him along, while the dog was pulling him back. The man himself uttered not a cry, but tried to fight off the dog with his hands as best he could.

In the horror of the moment Despard saw that it was Langhetti. For an instant his brain reeled. The next moment he had reached the spot. Another horseman was standing close by, without pretending even to interfere. Despard did not see him; he saw nothing but Langhetti. He flung himself from his horse, and drew a revolver from his pocket. A loud report rang through the air, and in an instant the huge blood-hound gave a leap upward, with a piercing yell, and fell dead in the road.

Despard flung himself on his knees beside Langhetti. He saw his hands torn and bleeding, and blood covering his face and breast. A low groan was all that escaped from the sufferer.

"Leave me," he gasped. "Save Bice."

In his grief for Langhetti, thus lying before him in such agony, Despard forgot all else. He seized his handkerchief and tried to stanch the blood.

"Leave me!" gasped Langhetti again. "Bice will be lost." His head, which Despard had supported for a moment, sank back, and life seemed to leave him.

Despard started up. Now for the first time he recollected the stranger; and in an instant understood who he was, and why this had been done. Suddenly, as he started up, he felt his pistol snatched from his hand by a strong grasp. He turned.

It was the horseman—it was Clark—who had stealthily dismounted, and, in his desperate purpose, had tried to make sure of Despard.

But Despard, quick as thought, leaped upon him, and caught his hand. In the struggle the pistol fell to the ground. Despard caught Clark in his arms, and then the contest began.

"THE NEXT INSTANT DESPARD HAD SEIZED HIS THROAT AND HELD HIM DOWN SO THAT HE COULD NOT MOVE."

Clark was of medium size, thick-set, muscular, robust, and desperate. Despard was tall, but his frame was well knit, his muscles and sinews were like iron, and he was inspired by a higher spirit and a deeper passion.

In the first shock of that fierce embrace not a word was spoken. For some time the struggle was maintained without result. Clark had caught Despard at a disadvantage, and this for a time prevented the latter from putting forth his strength effectually.

At last he wound one arm around Clark's neck in a strangling grasp, and forced his other arm under that of Clark. Then with one tremendous, one resistless impulse, he put forth all his strength. His antagonist gave way before it. He reeled.

Despard disengaged one arm and dealt him a tremendous blow on the temple. At the same instant he twined his legs about those of the other. At the stroke Clark, who had already staggered, gave way utterly and fell heavily backward, with Despard upon him.

The next instant Despard had seized his throat and held him down so that he could not move.

The wretch gasped and groaned. He struggled to escape from that iron hold in vain. The hand which had seized him was not to be shaken off. Despard had fixed his grasp there, and there in the throat of the fainting, suffocating wretch he held it.

The struggles grew fainter, the arms relaxed, the face blackened, the limbs stiffened. At last all efforts ceased.

Despard then arose, and, turning Clark over on his face, took the bridle from one of the horses, bound his hands behind him, and fastened his feet securely. In the fierce struggle Clark's coat and waistcoat had been torn away, and slipped down to some extent. His shirt-collar had burst and slipped with them. As Despard turned him over and proceeded to tie him, something struck his eye. It was a bright, red scar.

He pulled down the shirt. A mark appeared, the full meaning of which he knew not, but could well conjecture. There were three brands—fiery red—and these were the marks:

On the same evening Potts left the bank at about five o'clock, and went up to the Hall with John. He was morose, gloomy, and abstracted. The great question now before him was how to deal with Smithers & Co. Should he write to them, or go and see them, or what? How could he satisfy their claims, which he knew would now be presented? Involved in thoughts like these, he entered the Hall, and, followed by John, went to the dining-room, where father and son sat down to refresh themselves over a bottle of brandy.

They had not been seated half an hour before the noise of carriage-wheels was heard; and on looking out they saw a dog-cart drawn by two magnificent horses, which drove swiftly up to the portico. A gentleman dismounted, and, throwing the reins to his servant, came up the steps.

The stranger was of medium size, with an aristocratic air, remarkably regular features, of pure Grecian outline, and deep, black, lustrous eyes. His brow was dark and stern, and clouded over by a gloomy frown.

"Who the devil is he?" cried Potts. "D—n that porter! I told him to let no one in to-day."

"I believe the porter's playing fast and loose with us. But, by Jove! do you see that fellow's eyes? Do you know who else has such eyes?"

"No."

"Old Smithers."

"Smithers!"

"Yes."

"Then this is young Smithers?"

"Yes; or else the devil," said John, harshly. "I begin to have an idea," he continued. "I've been thinking about this for some time."

"What is it?"

"Old Smithers had these eyes. That last chap that drew the forty thousand out of you kept his eyes covered. Here comes this fellow with the same eyes. I begin to trace a connection between them."

"Pooh! Old Smithers is old enough to be this man's grandfather."

"Did you ever happen to notice that old Smithers hadn't a wrinkle in his face?"

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing—only his hair mightn't have been natural; that's all."

Potts and John exchanged glances, and nothing was said for some time.

"Perhaps this Smithers & Son have been at the bottom of all this," continued John. "They are the only ones who could have been strong enough."

"But why should they?"

John shook his head.

"Despard or Langhetti may have got them to do it. Perhaps that d—d girl did it. Smithers & Co. will make money enough out of the speculation to pay them. As for me and you, I begin to have a general but very accurate idea of ruin. You are getting squeezed pretty close up to the wall, dad, and they won't give you time to breathe."

Before this conversation had ended the stranger had entered, and had gone up to the drawing-room. The servant came down to announce him.

"What name?" asked Potts.

"He didn't give any."

Potts looked perplexed.

"Come now," said John. "This fellow has overreached himself at last. He's come here; perhaps it won't be so easy for him to get out. I'll have all the servants ready. Do you keep up your spirits. Don't get frightened, but be plucky. Bluff him, and when the time comes ring the bell, and I'll march in with all the servants."

Potts looked for a moment at his son with a glance of deep admiration.

"Johnnie, you've got more sense in your little finger than I have in my whole body. Yes: we've got this fellow, whoever he is; and if he turns out to be what I suspect, then we'll spring the trap on him, and he'll learn what it is to play with edge tools."

With these words Potts departed, and, ascending the stairs, entered the drawing-room.

The stranger was standing looking out of one of the windows. His attitude brought back to Potts's recollection the scene which had once occurred there, when old Smithers was holding Beatrice in his arms. The recollection of this threw a flood of light on Potts's mind. He recalled it with a savage exultation. Perhaps they were the same, as John said—perhaps; no, most assuredly they must be the same.

"I've got him now, any way," murmured Potts to himself, "whoever he is."

The stranger turned and looked at Potts for a few moments. He neither bowed nor uttered any salutation whatever. In his look there was a certain terrific menace, an indefinable glance of conscious power, combined with implacable hate. The frown which usually rested on his brow darkened and deepened till the gloomy shadows that covered them seemed like thunder-clouds.

Before that awful look Potts felt himself cowering involuntarily; and he began to feel less confidence in his own power, and less sure that the stranger had flung himself into a trap. However, the silence was embarrassing; so at last, with an effort, he said:

"Well; is there any thing you want of me? I'm in a hurry."

"Yes," said the stranger, "I reached the village to-day to call at the bank, but found it closed."

"Oh! I suppose you've got a draft on me, too."

"Yes," said the stranger, mysteriously. "I suppose I may call it a draft."

"There's no use in troubling your head about it, then," returned Potts; "I won't pay."

"You won't?"

"Not a penny."

A sharp, sudden smile of contempt flashed over the stranger's face.

"Perhaps if you knew what the draft is, you would feel differently."

"I don't care what it is."

"That depends upon the drawer."

"I don't care who the drawer is. I won't pay it. I don't care even if it's Smithers & Co. I'll settle all when I'm ready. I'm not going to be bullied any longer. I've borne enough. You needn't look so very grand," he continued, pettishly; "I see through you, and you can't keep up this sort of thing much longer."

"You appear to hint that you know who I am?"

"Something of that sort," said Potts, rudely; "and let me tell you I don't care who you are."

"That depends," rejoined the other, calmly, "very much upon circumstances."

"So you see," continued Potts, "you won't get any thing out of me—not this time," he added.

"My draft," said the stranger, "is different from those which were presented at the bank counter."

He spoke in a tone of deep solemnity, with a tone which seemed like the tread of some inevitable Fate advancing upon its victim. Potts felt an indefinable fear stealing over him in spite of himself. He said not a word.

"My draft," continued the stranger, in a tone which was still more aggressive in its dominant and self-assertive power—"my draft was drawn twenty years ago."

Potts looked wonderingly and half fearfully at him.

"My draft," said the other, "was drawn by Colonel Lionel Despard."

A chill went to the heart of Potts. With a violent effort he shook off his fear.

"Pooh!" said he, "you're at that old story, are you? That nonsense won't do here."

"It was dated at sea," continued the stranger, in tones which still deepened in awful emphasis—"at sea, when the writer was all alone."

"It's a lie!" cried Potts, while his face grew white.

"At sea," continued the other, ringing the changes on this one word, "at sea—on board that ship to which you had brought him—the Vishnu!"

Potts was like a man fascinated by some horrid spectacle. He looked fixedly at his interlocutor. His jaw fell.

"There he died," said the stranger. "Who caused his death? Will you answer?"

With a tremendous effort Potts again recovered command of himself.

"You—you've been reading up old papers," replied he, in a stammering voice. "You've got a lot of stuff in your head which you think will frighten me. You've come to the wrong shop."

But in spite of these words the pale face and nervous manner of Potts showed how deep was his agitation.

"I myself was on board the Vishnu," said the other.

"You!"

"Yes, I."

"You! Then you must have been precious small. The Vishnu went down twenty years ago."

"I was on board of the Vishnu, and I saw Colonel Despard."

The memory of some awful scene seemed to inspire the tones of the speaker—they thrilled through the coarse, brutal nature of the listener.

"I saw Colonel Despard," continued the stranger.

"You lie!" cried Potts, roused by terror and horror to a fierce pitch of excitement.

"I saw Colonel Despard," repeated the stranger, for the third time, "on board the Vishnu in the Indian Sea. I learned from him his story—"

He paused.

"Then," cried Potts, quickly, to whom there suddenly came an idea which brought courage with it; "then, if you saw him, what concern is it of mine? He was alive then, and the Despard murder never took place."

"It did take place," said the other.

"You're talking nonsense. How could it if you saw him? He must have been alive."

"He was dead!" replied the stranger, whose eyes had never withdrawn themselves from those of Potts, and now seemed like two fiery orbs blazing wrathfully upon him. The tones penetrated to the very soul of the listener. He shuddered in spite of himself. Like most vulgar natures, his was accessible to superstitious horror. He heard and trembled.

"He was dead," repeated the stranger, "and yet all that I told you is true. I learned from him his story."

"Dead men tell no tales," muttered Potts, in a scarce articulate voice.

"So you thought when you locked him in, and set fire to the ship, and scuttled her; but you see you were mistaken, for here at least was a dead man who did tell tales, and I was the listener."

And the mystic solemnity of the man's face seemed to mark him as one who might indeed have held commune with the dead.

"He told me," continued the stranger, "where he found you, and how."

Awful expectation was manifest on the face of Potts.

"He told me of the mark on your arm. Draw up your sleeve, Briggs, Potts, or whatever other name you choose, and show the indelible characters which represent the name of Bowhani."

Potts started back. His lips grew ashen. His teeth chattered.

"He gave me this," cried the stranger, in a louder voice; "and this is the draft which you will not reject."

He strode forward three or four paces, and flung something toward Potts.

It was a cord, at the end of which was a metallic ball. The ball struck the table as it fell and rolled to the floor, but the stranger held the other end in his hand.

"Thug!" cried he; "do you know what that is?"

Had the stranger been Olympian Jove, and had he flung forth from his right hand a thunder-bolt, it could not have produced a more appalling effect than that which was wrought upon Potts by the sight of this cord. He started back in horror, uttering a cry half-way between a scream and a groan. Big drops of perspiration started from his brow. He trembled and shuddered from head to foot. His jaw fell. He stood speechless.

"That is my draft," said the stranger.

"What do you want?" gasped Potts.

"The title deeds of the Brandon estates!"

"The Brandon estates!" said Potts, in a faltering voice.

"Yes, the Brandon estates; nothing less."

"And will you then keep silent?"

"I will give you the cord."

"Will you keep silent?"

"I am your master," said the other, haughtily, as his burning eyes fixed themselves with a consuming gaze upon the abject wretch before him; "I am your master. I make no promises. I spare you or destroy you as I choose."

These words reduced Potts to despair. In the depths of that despair he found hope. He started up, defiant. With an oath he sprang to the bell-rope and pulled again and again, till the peals reverberated through the house.

The stranger stood with a scornful smile on his face. Potts turned to him savagely:

"I'll teach you," he cried, "that you've come to the wrong shop. I'm not a child. Who you are I don't know and don't care. You are the cause of my ruin, and you'll repent of it."

The stranger said nothing, but stood with the same fixed and scornful smile. A noise was heard outside, the tramp of a crowd of men. They ascended the stairs. At last John appeared at the door of the room, followed by thirty servants. Prominent among these was Asgeelo. Near him was Vijal. Potts gave a triumphant smile. The servants ranged themselves around the room.

"Now," cried Potts, "you're in for it. You're in a trap, I think. You'll find that I'm not a born idiot. Give up that cord!"

The stranger said nothing, but wound up the cord coolly, placed it in his pocket, and still regarded Potts with his scornful smile.

"Here!" cried Potts, addressing the servants. "Catch that man, and tie his hands and feet."

The servants had taken their station around the room at John's order. As Potts spoke they stood there looking at the stranger, but not one of them moved. Vijal only started forward. The stranger turned toward him and looked in his face.

Vijal glanced around in surprise, waiting for the other servants.

"You devils!" cried Potts, "do you hear what I say? Seize that man!"

None of the servants moved.

"It's my belief," said John, "that they're all rattling."

"Vijal!" cried Potts, savagely, "tackle him."

Vijal rushed forward. At that instant Asgeelo bounded forward also with one tremendous leap, and seizing Vijal by the throat hurled him to the floor.

The stranger waved his hand.

"Let him go!" said he.

Asgeelo obeyed.

"What the devil's the meaning of this?" cried John, looking around in dismay. Potts also looked around. There stood the servants—motionless, impassive.

"For the last time," roared Potts, with a perfect volley of oaths, "seize that man, or you'll be sorry for it."

The servants stood motionless. The stranger remained in the same attitude with the same sneering smile.

"You see," said he, at last, "that you don't know me, after all. You are in my power, Briggs—you can't get away, nor can your son."

Potts rushed, with an oath, to the door. Half a dozen servants were standing there. As he came furiously toward them they held out their clenched fists. He rushed upon them. They beat him back. He fell, foaming at the lips.

John stood cool and unmoved, looking around the room, and learning from the face of each servant that they were all beyond his authority. He folded his arms, and said nothing.

"You appear to have been mistaken in your man," said the stranger, coolly. "These are not your servants; they're mine. Shall I tell them to seize you?"

Potts glared at him with bloodshot eyes, but said nothing.

"Shall I tell them to pull up your sleeve and display the mark of Bowhani, Sir? Shall I tell who and what you are? Shall I begin from your birth and give them a full and complete history of your life?"

Potts looked around like a wild beast in the arena, seeking for some opening for escape, but finding nothing except hostile faces.

"Do what you like!" he cried, desperately, with an oath, and sank down into stolid despair.

"No; you don't mean that," said the other.

"For I have some London policemen at the inn, and I might like best to hand you over to them on charges which you can easily imagine. You don't wish me to do so, I think. You'd prefer being at large to being chained up in a cell, or sent to Botany Bay, I suppose? Still, if you prefer it, I will at once arrange an interview between yourself and these gentlemen."

"What do you want?" anxiously asked Potts, who now thought that he might come to terms, and perhaps gain his escape from the clutches of his enemy.

"The title deeds of the Brandon estate," said the stranger.

"Never!"

"Then off you go. They must be mine, at any rate. Nothing can prevent that. Either give them now and begone, or delay, and you go at once to jail."

"I won't give them," said Potts, desperately.

"Cato!" said the stranger, "go and fetch the policemen."

"Stop!" cried John.

At a sign Asgeelo, who had already taken two steps toward the door, paused.

"Here, dad," said John, "you've got to do it. You might as well hand over the papers. You don't want to get into quod, I think."

Potts turned his pale face to his son.

"Do it!" exclaimed John.

"Well," he said, with a sigh, "since I've got to, I've got to, I suppose. You know best, Johnnie. I always said you had a long head."

"I must go and get them," he continued.

"I'll go with you; or no—Cato shall go with you, and I'll wait here."

The Hindu went with Potts, holding his collar in his powerful grasp, and taking care to let Potts see the hilt of a knife which he carried up his sleeve, in the other hand.

After about a quarter of an hour they returned, and Potts handed over to the stranger some papers. He looked at them carefully, and put them in his pocket. He then gave Potts the cord. Potts took it in an abstracted way, and said nothing.

"You must leave this Hall to-night," said the stranger, sternly—"you and your son. I remain here."

"Leave the Hall?" gasped Potts.

"Yes."

For a moment he stood overwhelmed. He looked at John. John nodded his head slowly.

"You've got to do it, dad," said he.

Potts turned savagely at the stranger. He shook his clenched fist at him.

"D—n you!" he cried. "Are you satisfied yet? I know you. I'll pay you up. What complaint have you against me, I'd like to know? I never harmed you."

"You don't know me, or you wouldn't say that."

"I do. You're Smithers & Co."

"True; and I'm several other people. I've had the pleasure of an extended intercourse with you. For I'm not only Smithers & Co., but I'm also Beamish & Hendricks, American merchants. I'm also Bigelow, Higginson, & Co., solicitors to Smithers & Co. Besides, I'm your London broker, who attended to your speculations in stocks. Perhaps you think that you don't know me after all."

As he said this Potts and John exchanged glances of wonder.

"Tricked!" cried Potts—"deceived! humbugged! and ruined! Who are you? What have you against me? Who are you? Who?"

And he gazed with intense curiosity upon the calm face of the stranger, who, in his turn, looked upon him with the air of one who was surveying from a superior height some feeble creature far beneath him.

"Who am I?" he repeated. "Who? I am the one to whom all this belongs. I am one whom you have injured so deeply, that what I have done to you is nothing in comparison."

"Who are you?" cried Potts, with feverish impatience. "It's a lie. I never injured you. I never saw you before till you came yourself to trouble me. Those whom I have injured are all dead, except that parson, the son-of—the officer."

"There are others."

Potts said nothing, but looked with some fearful discovery dawning upon him.

"You know me now!" cried the stranger. "I see it in your face."

"You're not him!" exclaimed Potts, in a piercing voice.

"I am LOUIS BRANDON!"

"I knew it! I knew it!" cried John, in a voice which was almost a shriek.

"Cigole played false. I'll make him pay for this," gasped Potts.

"Cigole did not play false. He killed me as well as he could—But away, both of you. I can not breathe while you are here. I will allow you an hour to be gone."

At the end of the hour Brandon of Brandon Hall was at last master in the home of his ancestors.

MY SUMMER VACATION.

MY father lives in the little village of Darlington, on the line of the Downsville and Westport Branch of a well-known railroad. There was a time, not so very long ago, when the good people of that neighborhood knew and cared as little about railroads as I do about palanquins or camels. Being for the most part farmers, who never went away from home in summer, and had plenty of spare time in winter, they found the time-honored stage-coach quite fast enough for all their needs. Even I, although I laughed at the shabbiness and grumbled at the slowness of the old-fashioned vehicle, rather liked it. I am afraid that in my inmost heart I rather liked something to grumble at. Then I was conscious of a pleasant feeling of superiority over the rest of the Darlingtonians, when, after entering the house of Gray, Brown, & Co., in New York, I made my occasional visits home. I felt that the Darlington people were all behind the times. Moreover, I liked the air of quiet and repose about the whole place. There was no noise, no disturbance, no hurry; every thing was at rest and at peace. It seemed to me, the only occupant of the old coach late one summer evening, as we drove slowly into the village, almost like playing "come up to be dead," with the little doll's dress-maker and her friends.

But these days came to an end. The unquiet, restless, "improving" spirit of the age found its way to Darlington at last, and a branch railroad was built.

"Well!" thought I, as I stepped on the train to make my first visit to Darlington after the completion of the road, "now we'll see if this is an improvement."

Looking around I saw several acquaintances; but they were so busily arranging their bags and bundles, to be caught up at a moment's notice, that they could just spare time for a bow, or for

"How are you, Frank? Going home, eh?"

No one seemed to think of offering me a seat, although several might easily have done so. Even Nellie Brown, pretty little Nellie Brown, who had sat close by me many a time going to and from our boarding-schools in the old coach, looked up with a proper little "Good-evening, Mr. Hadley," and looked demurely out of the window again. I stood still, offering no remarks, but making no attempt to move on and find a seat, until Miss Nellie recovered a little from her attack of "car manners." She was not very long.

"Won't you have a seat?" she said. "The car seems pretty full."

"No," said I, sitting down by her, "the car isn't half full; but as most of my acquaintances here have each a whole seat, I've been trying to see if the railroad has improved them as much as they expected. How is it?"

"Oh, Frank!" she said, "how could I know you wanted to sit here?"

"You used to find out, somehow, in the old stage," said I.

"Of course," she answered. "There was only just so much room there, and we had to crowd so. Wasn't it horrid?"

"Well, not so very," said I, raising my voice as the whistle and bell began their usual noisy performances on approaching a station. "That lasted longer than this."

"Yes," and she laughed; "it lasted long enough. Do you remember the night the wheel came off, and we were four hours behind time?"

"Do you think I have forgotten any of those rides?" I shouted, as tenderly as I could under the circumstances. "Those were good times. Give me the slow old coach when you are with me, Nellie."

The whistling and ringing suddenly stopped, and I was shocked to find that I had been making the latter portion of my remarks at the top of my lungs, for the benefit of the whole car. They appeared duly impressed thereby; particularly Tom Marvin, one of the Darlingtonians. He stared straight into Nellie's face and laughed.

My first impulse was to grapple with him and throw him overboard; but I thought better of that. I merely looked at him with an air of stern dignity, calculated to impress upon his mind a sense of his own rudeness and my forbearance. I regret to say that he did not appear at all abashed. Some men seem to have been born without those finer sensibilities that would have made one of my nature wretched at the idea of having committed such a fault as that of which Tom had just been guilty. They may be happier for it, in their lower state of being; but alas for those with whom they come in contact!

As I helped Nellie from the cars to the noisy, unromantic dépot, dimly lighted by a few kerosene lamps, I thought again of the good old times when I used to get out of the stage, and walk slowly, very slowly sometimes, up the lane with her to her father's house. But I merely said:

"Good-night, Nellie. Tell your father I'll drop in to see him to-morrow."

"Yes, do," said that Tom Marvin. "I'll call for you, and we'll go together."

"All right," said I, with as much coolness as I could muster. "Come in the afternoon, will you?" But Tom was already engaged upon more important business. He had just remembered a message which must be sent to the other end of the village; and by bribery and flattery of the basest description he induced Nellie's two younger brothers, who had been sent to meet her, to go and deliver it; offering, by way of inducement, no doubt, to see Nellie home himself. So I stood by and saw them get into Captain Brown's buggy and drive slowly down the road. "Frank!" said I to myself, "Tom Marvin's a smarter man than you are. Have your fine sensibilities ended in this?"

Tom called for me the next afternoon, and we went to Captain Brown's. He was not at home; but Nellie was. There was a young lady with her whom she introduced as Miss Floyd, and whom she called Cousin Jennie. Tom had met her before; and immediately devoted himself to her, leaving me to talk to Nellie or listen to him, just as I chose. I knew well enough that he was only playing a part, in order to watch me, and was naturally embarrassed. Nellie must have had a little of the same feeling, for she began rather stiffly:

"How long do you expect to be at home?"

"Two or three weeks, I think. I have not quite decided."

"Oh, you must not go before our picnic. That is just three weeks from to-day," she said. "It is a sort of celebration of the anniversary of the commencement of the railroad."

"Don't ask me to celebrate that event," said I, solemnly.

"You need not go in the cars," she replied. "It is only fifteen miles to Cascade Valley, and a good many are going in their own carriages."

"I might go so, if I could find company," said I. "Do you think there is any one left in Darlington who could resist an opportunity of riding in the cars?"

"Oh yes; there's Tom," she said. "He'll go with you."

"Not I," interrupted Tom. "I'm insured, and I'll go in the cars. If I should be killed riding with you, I'm afraid they'd call it suicide."

I thought best to pass by this attack upon my skill as a driver in silence.

"Nellie will go," added Tom. "She is so light, it will not hurt her to be upset or thrown out."

"Don't listen to him, Nellie," said I. "I'll take good care of you. I will stay in Darlington on purpose, if you will go."

"Will you?" said she. "Then I'll go. Don't make such a rash offer again."

"If I am always to be as successful I shall keep on," said I.

After this graceful compliment a short pause ensued. Tom came to the rescue.

"Well!" said he, by way of calling attention to his remarks, "we have been idling here long enough. Are the stakes up, Nellie?"

"Perhaps Frank don't play croquet," she suggested.

"Then he must learn," said Tom, decisively; "he'll be lounging around here for the next three weeks, and what else can we do with him?"

But as it happened, I understood the game quite as well as they did. So we played croquet, Tom and Nellie, Jennie Floyd and I, until the lengthening shadows warned us that we should find a cold welcome at our respective tea-tables if we delayed much longer.

"Nice girl, that cousin," said I, as Tom and I walked homeward; "but so plain."

"So I thought, when I first saw her," said he; "but one forgets that, after a little."

"Especially when Nellie is by to be looked at," said I. Tom half laughed; but whether in contempt of Nellie's charms, or my admiration of them, I could not tell.

We played croquet again the next day, and the next. We played every pleasant day; beginning early and staying late. I liked the game before; but I was just beginning to feel its full fascination. How pretty Nellie looked, taking aim with her mallet a long time before striking the ball; and then she went into such charming little fits of despair when it rolled ignominiously past the arch, instead of through it! They were happy, idle, careless days; days when we gave ourselves up wholly to the pleasures of the passing time, not heeding or caring for the chains that Fate was weaving in with the fading flowers.

But there was one drawback to my happiness. I could never manage to see Nellie alone. I could not make an engagement to take her out, and ask her to keep it secret; and so, no matter how skillfully I laid my plans, something was sure to happen. If I asked her to ride, one of her little sisters, incited thereto by Tom, no doubt, would insist so pertinaciously upon going too, that I could not refuse without offending Nellie.

A small carriage was no protection against these young invaders; they would sit on the floor, on Nellie's lap, any where or any thing except staying at home. If we walked, we invariably met Tom or Miss Floyd, or both; if I called alone, Jennie Floyd was always there.

I began to hate Tom. I forced myself to treat him with a semblance of civility; but I cast about in my mind for some way of getting rid of him. Duels were out of fashion; I could not challenge him. If I could have invented a convenient pretext for having him arrested and kept out of the way for a few days, I would have run the risk of being prosecuted afterward; but I could not. I thought of doing battle with him after the fashion of prize-fighters, and directing my attack wholly toward his face, injuring his personal beauty to such an extent that he would not feel inclined to appear before ladies immediately. But I rejected this idea with scorn, as beneath the dignity of a gentleman; and Tom was stronger than I. The only feasible plan seemed, to ask him to ride, take the worst horse in Darlington, be upset, and run the risk of breaking my own neck for the chance of breaking his. That would be as fair as dueling, and not cause so much scandal. But before I had time to put this valorous scheme in execution, Fortune (favoring the brave) gave a faint smile in my direction.

Tom was obliged to go to the city on business, and Jennie Floyd went to spend the afternoon of the same day with a friend, taking Nellie's two little sisters with her. At last I felt that my opportunity had come.

I asked Nellie to take a ride; and I determined to find out in the course of that ride whether she preferred Tom to me. Fearing lest it might be Tom, I prudently postponed the subject until we turned to go home. But just as I was beginning an eloquent and carefully prepared sentence she gave a little scream.

"There's the train!" she said. "Is your horse afraid of the cars?"

"Oh no, not at all," said I, with outward composure, but with inward trembling; for in truth I did not know whether he was or not. I had just been reading "Les Misérables," and thought white lies in a good cause rather laudable than otherwise. But Nellie, if she had never read about the good nun and her one falsehood, had read something in the book of human nature. She did not believe me. She took the reins from my hands, and insisted upon my getting out and standing at the horse's head.

The train had just left the station, and passed so slowly that I could see the passengers very distinctly; and there, standing on the last platform of the last car, was Tom. Nellie bowed; but I, in my foolish exultation, called out,

"Won't you ride home with us, Tom?" intending to exasperate him thereby.

Imagine my horror when he replied,

"Yes, I believe I will," and actually leaped from the car. He ought to have been killed on the spot; any one else would have been; but he was not. He came up to us laughing, in high spirits at having "done" me once more; and continued so during the whole ride home. He and Nellie chattered and laughed until I felt like putting them both out of the carriage and leaving them. I maintained a severe and cutting silence; but so far from being a check upon them, every time they looked at me they only laughed the more.

When we reached Captain Brown's I let Tom help Nellie out; and with a cool "Good-evening" to one or both, just as they chose to take it, was about to drive on. But Tom shouted back from the doorway,

"Hold on, old fellow! I'm going to ride the rest of the way with you."

It was of no use to pretend not to hear; his lungs are good, and he might have been heard a quarter of a mile off; and not wishing to make an unnecessary display, even of my just wrath, I waited, while he and Nellie stood on the piazza laughing and talking in the same ill-mannered and absurd way as before. I wondered how she could endure his nonsense; I began to wonder how I could have admired her so much; and then I wondered what they were talking about. I thought I could distinguish my own name; after which their mirth subsided, and Tom came soberly down the path to the carriage.

"Drive around by the mill, will you?" said he, as he got in. "I want to talk to you a little."

"Can't," said I. "I'm in a hurry, for I'm going back to the city to-morrow."

"To-morrow!" repeated Tom. "You can't go to-morrow. It is the day of the picnic, you know, and you're to take Nellie."

"I'll leave her to you," said I; "you are better able to amuse her than I."

Tom repressed his rising inclination to laugh again, and said:

"Tired of her already, are you? Just as I said!"

"What right had you to say any thing about it?" I asked, angrily.

"A very good right," said Tom, flushing a little at my tone. "She is a dear friend now, and will soon stand in a still nearer relationship to me."

I did not know until then how dear she was to me. My heart seemed to stand still; I could not have answered him if I had tried. He saw my state, and took advantage of it to turn the horse down the mill road. Finally he broke the silence.

"Frank," said he, "why do you make me angry when I meant to be so good? I meant to apologize most humbly for what I did this afternoon; and for what I've been doing all along. You see, it was such a good joke, and it amused Jennie so to see how solemnly you took every thing."

I did not answer. I could only think, "Nellie is to be Tom's wife—I have lost Nellie!" He went on.

"But I am really sorry for what I did to-day."

You shouldn't have tempted me so. And now you blame Nellie for what I did; you could not see that she was fretting over it more than you were. If she hadn't laughed I think she would have cried."

And in spite of his sorrow he threw himself back in the carriage and roared again at the recollection of the disconsolate couple he had escorted home.

"I'm sorry!" he gasped, at length; "but oh, Frank, I can't help it!"

"There is no necessity for so many apologies," I said, trying to collect my faculties sufficiently to draw from him some further acknowledgment of his engagement. "If I had known Nellie was to be your wife—"

"My wife!" said he; "she isn't to be my first wife, at any rate. She is to be my cousin. I've been engaged to Jennie Floyd more than six months."

"To Jennie Floyd!" said I, shaking hands with him wildly. "Allow me to congratulate you!"

"Congratulate away," said Tom; "but meanwhile give me the reins. And don't think that I rode home with you on Nellie's invitation to-day. I assure you it wasn't her fault. So stay and take her to the picnic to-morrow, for Jennie and I don't want her."

I took his advice; and having grown wiser by experience, I resumed our interrupted conversation just as soon as we were fairly seated in the carriage. I do not think our ride was made any the less pleasant by the result.

LONDON GOSSIP.

THE following incident is said to have recently caused some amusement in the London fashionable circles:

A lady of distinction, the Marchioness of Finsbury, lately spent more than an hour in a music store in Regent Street, buying all the pieces of music with a sentimental title that she could find. When she had finished her purchases, and was already on the threshold of the door, she paused a moment with a hesitating air. The clerk, who had assiduously waited on so good a customer, stepped forward and asked her if she wished for any thing else. The marchioness made an effort to collect her thoughts, and turned back, fixing her beautiful eyes on the face of the clerk, who blushed to the ears.

"I had quite forgotten one thing," said she, in a voice that seemed tremulous. "I don't know what is the matter with me to-day. I came back to ask you if—"

She made a short pause, as if to summon up her courage. Meanwhile the clerk, pulling up his false collar, leaned gracefully on the counter and bent forward.

"I came back," continued the marchioness, "to ask if you would be good enough to give me a kiss before parting?"

"My lady!" exclaimed the astonished clerk.

"I desire that you should give me a kiss before parting," repeated the marchioness, with a deliberate air, fixing her eyes on the clerk, who seemed turned into stone. Without betraying the least emotion she repeated the request for the third time, saying, "If you can not give it to me to-day I will call some other time."

The clerk, intoxicated with joy at the hasty thought that the beautiful marchioness had taken a sudden fancy to him, did not wait for any further entreaties, but, springing over the counter, threw his arm round the waist of his fair customer, and impressed the asked-for kiss upon her cheek. To his surprise his sole response was a blow in the face from the parasol of the marchioness, who began to shriek wildly, and did not cease until three policemen rushed into the shop and took the wondering clerk in custody. The affair was explained the next day in court, where the magistrate at once set the unfortunate culprit at liberty on learning that A Kiss Before Parting was the name of a fashionable song, the existence of which till then was wholly unknown to him.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. A. B.—Street suits for fresh mourning are made of Tamise cloth, of poplin alpaca, and of serge, trimmed with folds of the same, piped with lustreless gros grain. Shawls of iron grenadine are worn with these black dresses.

A YOUNG LADY, AND ELLA.—For a demi train make a gradual slope of half a yard from the front to the back breadth. One wide ruffle from the knee down is a favorite style for lawn skirts. The skirt proper should be slightly sloped from the waist to the knee. Narrow ruffles at the bottom of the skirt are also used. Silk skirts should be lined throughout with glazed cambric, and faced with wiggling half a yard deep. For trained skirts of rich materials alpaca of the precise shade of the dress should be faced over the wiggling an eighth of a yard deep. The trimming of sashes is a matter of taste. They are quite pretty trimmed only across the ends. They are usually draped about the hips with trained dresses, but this is not absolutely necessary. One dart is usually taken in a loose Gabrielle front. Any lace handsome enough for a bridal veil would be very expensive, as the whole veil must be made of it. Tulle, trimmed with a ruche of the same, is a favorite style, and is appropriate both for elaborate and plain dresses. Boots are made of the same material as the traveling dress. Thick twilled serge is the most appropriate. A plain buttoned boot—half high Polish—is made of Griston's kid for traveling. We have already given several patterns of silk aprons.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Three narrow ruffles on the edge of the skirt will not make you appear shorter. An over wrap, cut from an Undine pattern given in the Bazar, will suit your height—four feet nine. It is prettily made of chené silk, silk serge, or poplin.

ANNIE.—The Marie Antoinette fichu is worn at this season over a long blouse or redingote. In summer it will be a sufficient wrapping of itself. The short dress worn with it should have two skirts; the upper one gathered up at the seams to form a frill of a bunched appearance.

A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.—The morning dress of which you speak is simply a loose sack, with a sloping seam in the middle of the back and under the arms. A loose Gabrielle may be made in the same way.

F. SPRAGUE.—Any worsted dealer in New York, we presume, will execute your commission from samples of worsteds or the pattern to be worked. We can not undertake to purchase articles for subscribers.

SUMMER BONNETS.

WE give patterns and descriptions of a number of new and tasteful bonnets, the details of which will be found on page 436. The accompanying illustrations show the bonnets complete.

Pompadour Bonnet.

THIS bonnet is made of black figured lace, black silk blonde, and black ribbon. The diadem is formed of a bronze band inlaid with steel; a roll of colored velvet or satin, or a half wreath of fine flowers can be substituted for this. A wide lace scarf falls over the back of the bonnet in the form of a veil, and is brought forward for strings, which are fastened with a rosette under the chin. Figs. 48-51, Supplement, give the pattern of the frame. The front of this frame is covered with a puffing made of a straight piece of lace. The edge of the bonnet is trimmed in front and behind with a quilling formed of two pieces of blonde, three-fourths of an inch wide, the straight edges of which are sewed together; a similar quilling is set on the band in front. The lace scarf that forms the veil is a yard and five-eighths long and a quarter of a yard wide; this is pointed at the ends and bordered with edging three-fourths of an inch wide. The veil is pleated on the back of the bonnet. A ribbon rosette bow, shown on page 436, Fig. 18, of half the size, fastens the ends together in front. A double bow with short ends is set on the top of the bonnet, which is completed by the bronze and steel band beforementioned.

Augusta Bonnet.

THIS tasteful bonnet is of white lace trimmed with broad white blonde and watered ribbon an inch and a half wide. A wreath of sweet-brier with buds and leaves forms a diadem in front, with the ends extending down on the strings. Fig. 52 of the Supplement gives the pattern of the frame of this bonnet, which is cut of white stiff lace, and bound with a narrow strip of satin. It is then covered with several thicknesses of tulle, laid on smooth, and finally with a single thickness of tulle, gathered in such a manner as to form two high puffs in front. The back of the bonnet is covered with watered ribbon, an inch and a half wide, the long ends of which are tied under the chignon; this is covered again with a scarf made of a strip of tulle, a yard and five-eighths long and five inches wide, edged with blonde two inches wide, then doubled, as is seen in the illustration, so that the lower edge of one row of blonde just reaches to the upper edge of the other, and laid in pleats across the back of the bonnet. A rosette of watered ribbon is set in the middle of the scarf, on the top, and another confines the ends under the chin. A satin band, covered with pleated lace, is fastened in front, and covered with the sweet-brier wreath beforementioned.

Trianon Hat.

THIS pretty hat is made entirely of blue crape. Bows of blue satin and a spray of blue satin flowers with moss-green leaves complete the trimming. It is made on a foundation of straw; and old straw bonnet can be ripped up and made to answer very well for the purpose. The crown is soft and oblong, the rim is two inches high. Having prepared the foundation, cover it with six thicknesses of crape, laid on plain, bind with a bias fold of blue satin, and put in a white silk lining. The hat is trimmed round the edge with a puffing; for this take a strip of double crape, five inches wide, hem the edges half an inch wide, gather it on both sides just above the hem, and fasten it to a strip of double crape, so that the hem may form a frill on either side of the puff thus made. Sew narrow blue ribbons on each side of the hat, to be tied under the chignon. The scarf consists of a strip of crape, a yard and a half long and five inches wide, hemmed round the edge, and pleated on the hat. The ends of the scarf are fastened under the chin with a double bow of satin ribbon, which is shown on page 436, Fig. 20. A similar bow is set on the front of the hat, over which the spray of flowers is placed, and is carried over the top of the hat, with the end hanging loose behind.

Watteau Bonnet.

THIS bonnet, which is a very good accompaniment to the favorite Watteau paletot, is of black figured lace. The trimming consists of blue satin puffing, a black feather, and a steel butterfly. Figs. 48-51, Supplement, give the pattern of the frame. This is covered with pleated lace, and a lace edge, two inches wide, is set round the bonnet. A scarf made of a straight strip of lace, a yard and a half long and four inches wide, bordered with an edge two inches wide, is fastened on the back of the bonnet. The puffing on the front consists of a bias strip of satin, twenty inches long and five inches wide, sloping gradually to a width of three inches at the ends, and arranged in the same manner as that of the Trianon hat. A somewhat narrower puffing is set on the back of the hat, so as to cover the setting on of the scarf, which falls over the puff in the manner shown in the illustration. The ends of the scarf are confined by a blue satin bow, which is shown on page 436, Fig. 19. A feather and steel band, with two narrow ends of ribbon, complete the trimming.

Marie Antoinette Bonnet.

Fig. 53 of the Supplement gives the pattern of the frame of this bonnet, an illustration of which is seen on page 436, Fig. 7. This is cut of black stiff lace, and is covered with several thicknesses of black lace laid on smooth, and lastly with one thickness of pleated, beaded lace; lace edging, beaded leaves, and a pink rose complete the trimming. A frill of two rows of lace is set round the edge of the bonnet, and is surmounted in front with a satin piping. A wreath of beaded leaves forms the heading behind. The rose is placed on the left side. A lace scarf, bordered with a lace edging, is confined with a rose under the chin. Strings of black watered ribbon.

Metternich Bonnet.

THIS stylish bonnet is made entirely of gray crape. Fig. 52, of the Supplement, gives the pattern of the frame, which is covered with several thicknesses of crape, laid on plain, and finally with a single thickness gathered so as to form two high puffs in front. Three fan-shaped bows of gray ribbon, an illustration of which is shown on page 436, Fig. 20, and a lace edge, an inch and a half wide, together with black-berry blossoms set on a black silk band, form the diadem. A pleated scarf of gray crape, edged with lace an inch and a half wide, passes over the back of the bonnet and is brought forward and fastened under the chin with a spray of black-berry blossoms. A bow of gray ribbon, two and a half inches wide, with short ends, is set on the back of the bonnet, and strings of narrow ribbon tie it behind under the chignon. A single black-berry blossom is set on the left side of the front.

COSMETICS.

A LADY about to paint, or varnish, or enamel herself has, first, if she be wise, to consider the matter from a hygienic or health-disposing point of view. She has to consider what the skin is, what it has to do, and how the interior economy may resent any violation done to this delicate expansion. Having decided to rouge upon a white ground, she has to consider what the white ground shall be, and what the pink to be laid upon it. As for rouge, the best is a preparation, by a treatment unnecessary to state here, from the coccus cacti, or cochineal insect; an inferior sort is got from safflower, the petals of a flower used in dyeing. White skin-pigments usually go under the name of "pearl-powder," though the composition of none of them has any thing to do with pearls, and though—so-called—pearl-powders differ extremely in their nature. Any lady whose complexion is good already had better let well alone. It is not within the competence of any art to give the delicate tints which mantle upon a really beautiful female skin. My advice to ladies having delicate complexions, and valuing the gift, would be to keep their complexions good by observance of certain points of discipline; early hours, not too much dancing, distilled water for the toilette, and low alkalized soap; if soap for the face, any alkali will answer.

There was a time when the chemical nature of things was not so well known as to-day; when the creamy whiteness of flake-white—none other than superior white-lead—entered into the composition of pearl-powders. I need not pause to reprobate the awful danger of employing this material for such a purpose, seeing that the employment is abandoned. Subsequently to the going out of white-lead as face or pearl powder another metallic preparation—the trisnitate of bismuth—came in. It is not so decidedly poisonous as a lead compound, but it is poisonous enough to prove injurious to the skin; indeed, I know not of any metallic pigment so innocent that it can be laid on the skin continuously without incurring serious damage. Such pigments mar the beauty of the skin at least, perhaps lead to evil constitutional effects through absorption. Even if white-lead and trisnitate of bismuth were not injurious to the skin and poisonous gener-gate is celebrated for its sulphurous springs. The water of these springs holds sulphureted hydrogen dissolved. If it be a fact that the lady in question went into a Harrogate bath of sulphurous water while skin-painted with bismuth magistery, then it must have come true what the tale records—viz., that she in one instant turned as black, wherever the pigment was laid on, as any Ethiop. Pearl-powders, as now used, are variously made. Some are nothing else than powdered talc or French chalk; others a mixture of the same with common chalk; a third order contains starch-grains mingled with the preceding one, or both. By starch-grains I would be meant to signify the preparation known as "violet-powder," which really has no more to do with violets than it has with cabbages or cucumbers, being really nothing else than starch-grains odorized by orris-root—iris florentina, sweet-smelling iris—a root that smells not unlike violets. Much discrimination is used by perfumers in selecting a proper sort of starch-grain. Whencesoever starch comes, it has the general characteristic of being in grains. These are readily made manifest under microscopic examination, and are then found to be different not merely as to size, but as to shape. Hence it is that the investigator can tell whether one kind of starch be mingled or adulterated with another. For example, arrow-root—genuine arrow-root—is starch obtained from the Maranta arundinacea. It happens to have an agreeable taste, and hence is so valuable for dietetic uses. It is more expensive than the starch of wheat or of potatoes—than starch, indeed, generally—and hence it is often contaminated. Now the grains of wheaten starch happen to be large and coarse; hence the material, although it will do very well for hair-powder, is not satisfactory when used as a ally, their use as skin-pigments would be attended with a great disadvantage. They both turn black under the influence of sulphureted hydrogen—a gas which in small quantities exists pretty largely diffused. The effect of bringing concentrated sulphureted hydrogen in contact with skin whitened by a lead or bismuth preparation would be to turn the skin suddenly black. Under the usual circumstances of society no such extreme issue as utter blackness need be contemplated; but a certain darkening of color would rapidly ensue, destroying the harmony of the work of art perfected with so much care—dissipating the illusion of a beautiful complexion. The tale is recorded in books of a certain lady who had been whitening her skin with trisnitate of bismuth—magistery of bismuth our grandmamas and grandpapas called it—and who chanced to bathe while whitened thus in the Harrogate waters. Harrocomplexion-powder; the grains are too staring. Horse-chestnut starch has been much employed for this purpose; so in like manner the starch of ordinary chestnuts; in short, perfumers have, or pretend to have, each a specialty. Nothing whatever can be alleged against the use of any starch pure and simple when used for toilette purposes; on the contrary, it imparts a softness and a freshness both salutary and delightful. Violet-powder so-called, indeed, hardly comes under the definition of a cosmetic. When made up with other ingredients to constitute the so-called pearl-powder, is it injurious then? That will depend on the character of the materials with which it is compounded. On white-lead we have already pronounced. It may well be called fata, not only to beauty, but in certain cases to life also, and to health in all cases. In ordinary domestic usage, thus to write, in the ordinary employment of skin-cosmetics by ladies themselves, violet-powder, the so-called pearl-powder, and rouge, usually complete the list. When female charms have so much wanted that higher artistic resources are needed, or thought to be needed, then the case is one for out-of-door practice. Then come the operations of enameling and blue-veining—operations that are kept a secret, but in performing which the chemist, if he so pleased, could beat the professional artists who make ladies "beautiful 'forever' out of the field.

VOICES CALLING.

"Oh, hush!" she whispered, "I hear them speaking, Voices calling upon the air;" And, while she listened, the pale light glistened, And lay, and floated upon her hair. "Oh no!" they answered, "we hear no speaking, We hear no voices upon the breeze; It must be only the night wind lonely, That sighs and whispers among the trees."

"Oh, hush!" she murmured, "I hear them singing— Singing the songs that I used to know;" And, while she listened, the tear-drops glistened, And through long lashes began to flow. "Oh, no!" they answered, "we hear no singing, We hear no voices singing so; 'Tis but the waking of sea waves breaking Upon the shingle far below."

"Oh, hush!" she whispered, "I hear them calling, Sweet voices of the long ago;" And, while she listened, the pale light glistened, And lay on her sweet face, white as snow. "Oh no!" they murmured, "she wanders wildly, We hear no voices on the breeze; She's listening only to night winds lonely, That sigh and whisper among the trees."

"Hush! hush!" they answer, while dews were falling, While dead leaves rustled through the air; And, while they shimmered, the pale light glimmered On a face and form like the angels fair. "Oh, pray!" they whispered, "our love is dying, Her voice is fainting across the sea;" And, while they listened, the far dawned glistened, O God! her morning breaks with thee.

THE SPANISH LACE.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

A PRETTY face reflected in the dressing-glass, turning this way and that in the inspection of a pretty figure. An unsatisfied face, though; and its owner put up the roundest little hand in the world, and twitched petulantly at the scarlet shoulder-knots that gave her dress an odd resemblance to a red-winged blackbird.

"If I only had a Spanish lace shawl," said the owner of the pretty face and figure. "It looks so unfinished— But, there!" And with that she seized her gloves and handkerchief and went slowly down the stairs, complaining to herself against the fate that refused her a black Spanish lace shawl to heighten the dazzle of those plump white shoulders.

"Well, my pretty blackbird," said her admiring father, as he stood upon the rug and confronted her entrance, "this is an early hour for you, and I declare I don't see but that you eclipse the lovely beings that take three hours to dress in."

"Of course I needn't be so long as people who have whole constellations of diamonds to secure, and no end of lace to pull out!"

"You have two black diamonds, my dear, that I wouldn't mortgage for a kingdom."

"You silly man!"

"And as for the lace," continued her father, "why, here!" and in a moment his dextrous hand had thrown what seemed a shadow through the air, and, dark and soft and clinging as a cobweb, it had fallen all around her. She caught a glimpse of herself in the mirror, as the exquisite thing hung from her hair about her shoulders and her dimpled arms; it was the loveliest little Andalusian picture that was ever painted.

"Oh, papa! how good you are! how kind you are! What made you think of it? You dear old man! Oh, me—how perfectly beautiful! Put down your mouth and let me kiss you—but don't disturb my hair!" And with these words she had sprung upon an ottoman and flung her arms round his neck, squeezing him with rapturous embraces to the detriment of all his starch and much of her toilette. But then she was a motherless and spoiled thing, and this was the least of her liberties.

"There, there, there!" cried the father, swinging her by the waist a minute ere he set her on her feet. "Let me off this time, and I promise not to do it again."

"I don't want you to do it again. How came you to do it this time, you dear old fellow?"

"How came I to do it this time? What made me think of it? Why, to speak plain, Therese, have I had any rational conversation for a month past, into which there did not enter the flavor of Spanish lace?"

"What kind of a flavor is that, papa?"

"Ask Professor Blot, my dear."

"I know myself," she answered, with her coquettish way, which she must needs exercise on her father till some younger cavalier took her off his hands. "It is made up of one part orange grove in full blossom, so that its air is only a divine perfume—like love, you know, papa, sweet but bitter too."

"What do you know about love?"

"Ah, much! Then there is one part moonlight, castle-turrets in the distance, two lovers, duenna, the tinkling of a guitar, an answering nightingale, the whole mingled with the music of a falling fountain's waters, and you may throw in the 'bay-leaf,' if you please!"

"Well, my dear, I am glad it takes so small a thing to make you happy and high-spirited. I have hesitated a little about the matter, I may as well confess—not that I do not want to grant all your wishes, little daughter—but because five hundred dollars, which is the price of your shawl, as you may as well know—"

"Oh, I have known that a long time, papa," she answered, with a sigh of remembrance and of relief.

"Because that five hundred dollars will help five families over the severer portion of the winter; keep the hope in husbands' hearts, keep the life in little children, and keep girls like you from death and worse than death."

"How you do talk, papa! Can't you afford to give five hundred dollars to the poor too? I don't suppose, though, there is any need; the city allows so much fuel, and there are the soup-houses."

Her father made no more reply, for though he meant that at some time she should see and understand the darker sides of life, yet to-night he hardly cared to spoil his little girl's enjoyment of her new possession. He looked at his watch and touched the bell, ordering the coach at once, as he meant to drive round by MacNamee's—his porter's—house, for a necessary errand, before joining the throng at Mrs. Meyerbehr's.

Therese hid herself in her wraps, hung her just-obtained desire of life on her arm, and, humming light-heartedly to herself, tripped down the steps before her father to the coach.

Just as she paused on the carriage-step to adjust her garments, she felt a hand upon her arm. At first she thought it was the coachman who assisted her. Directly afterward she faced about with the thought that some one was stealing her precious Spanish-lace shawl. It was only a woman, though—a woman in rags—standing with clasped hands, and murmuring something, and looking up at her with an imploring face. But what a face! so swollen, and haggard, and ghastly, and bleared—so stamped with hunger and thirst, with sin and sleeplessness. Therese had never seen the sight before; she stared at it one instant in a fascination of horror, and then shrank into the farthest corner of the coach, just as her father and the coachman ordered the woman away on peril of a policeman.

It was a night of bitter cold; the sky was frosty with its stars; they drove rapidly on easy springs through the streets, the cushions were like clouds beneath them, the thorough-bred horses went like the icy wind itself. Therese, sheltered in her warm comfort and pleasure, looked through the window at the flaring flames of the lamps, the fitting crowds on the sidewalk; but of every face among them all that woman's took the place. She wondered about it, and kept silence—she wondered what had turned it, still so young, into that horrid guise—she wondered had that woman ever been a girl like herself, happy, petted, careless, and free. She saw a child selling matches beneath a lamp-post; she had passed her almost every night of the season without ever seeing her before; she shivered while thinking how cold the mite must be. She caught the eye of the little tambourine-girl, sitting on the curb-stone and blowing her tinkling fingers; she longed to steal her from that evil-looking brigand of a hurdy-gurdy player who held her in such slavery. She followed all the little noisy nuisances of news-boys with her eyes—she had never thought of them in all her life as any thing but irresponsible creatures, like bats, and beetles, and common house-flies; now she found herself conjecturing concerning their homes, their mothers, the sort of men they would grow into—it had not occurred to her before that they ever grew up at all. After that it was a long way to MacNamee's, the streets were of a different sort and poorly lighted, there was not so much to see, and she leaned back and thought of Mrs. Meyerbehr's, and whether the young German Baron would be there, and what Maud Clive, whose fiances were real point, would say to her Spanish lace, and then she put down her hand to caress the Spanish lace—and it was gone!

"Oh, papa! my shawl! that woman! It is gone!" she cried.

"Gone?" he exclaimed. And then, after a moment, with the testiness of human nature and outraged pocket-book, he added: "Very well. If you couldn't take care of it in stepping from the door to the coach, the sooner it's gone the better!"

"Oh, papa, how could I know?" she answered, with tears of vexation ready to start. "Don't you suppose it is in the coach? Make Jo stop at the lamp, please, and let us see!"

"Nothing of the kind here, my dear. Nothing of the kind in the coach—"

"Let us go back then; we may overtake her—"

"As easily as a will of the wisp. She has put it up the spout before this."

"Up the spout? Put my shawl up the spout? Why, it would ruin it! Oh no indeed—"

"It is of no use lamenting, Therese," said her father then, appeased by her innocence. "If it can be recovered at all the police shall see to it. Here we are. Now I wonder if MacNamee is in."

As it happened, MacNamee was not in. He had gone with the counting-room keys to his master's house; but he had been gone so long that his wife thought he would be back every minute, so wouldn't his master come in and wait? And as the errand at MacNamee's was of importance, and the night too cold for Therese to be left in the coach, she found herself directly afterward, party dress and all, in Mrs. MacNamee's kitchen, where the floor had been scoured till it sparkled like a snow-drift, and was, in Mrs. MacNamee's own terms, clean enough to eat from. Just as the elder guest had begun hectoring the chubby pair of twins that Providence had sent the MacNamees, possibly for fear one at a time should keep them idle, and who sat, in their absurd red flannel night-gowns, toasting their feet at the fire, the father of the twins himself entered. He was in a slight breeze, and wore a somewhat sheepish air, whether from welcoming so fair a lady in his domicile, or because he had loitered and belated himself in an ale-shop, and, going on his way, had recognized the carriage shortly after it left the house, when he had darted across the roadway, and ensconcing himself on the back of it, had enjoyed quite a comfortable drive till he dropped off just a square away. However, he immediately plunged into business with his master, and Therese sat, unnoticed and forgotten, looking into the fire in the place of the twins, who had been swept off to bed out of hand. She was in a very lowering mood for her; for she was indignant about her shawl; she was sadly disappointed, too; she was disturbed with her own carelessness and foolish fright; and when she thought of that wicked woman who had doubtless taken the thing she could have annihilated her. An old white puss came along and rubbed against her, then looked up at her familiarly, and accustomed to be dandled, sprang upon her knee. Therese shook her off angrily, and Mrs. MacNamee, returning, caught her as she fell.

"You're not fond of cats, miss?" said Mrs. MacNamee, stroking the purring creature's back. "No," replied Therese. "Particularly not in evening-dress."

"Oh, to be sure! of course not! I should beg your pardon for her if she knew any better. Our children think all the world of this one though," continued the loquacious matron. "And so do the father and I, for that matter. When a thing like that has summered and wintered with you, shared your bite and sup, and gone without when there was none, it seems, you know, young lady, like one of yourselves."

"I don't suppose that this one has gone without often," said Therese, then softening from her ill-temper, for her knowledge that MacNamee had good wages warranted the remark, and there was something engaging in the woman's tones that occasioned the softening.

"Not of late years, miss. Not since we came across your good father there, may the Lord reward him! But I know of them that do not always have their crust a day, and yet soak a part of it for the cat."

"A crust a day!" exclaimed Therese. "The same. And lucky to get that sometimes."

"Why, I didn't know—"

"That there were such people? No, I suppose not. I've often thought, when I was lady's-maid to Mrs. Meyerbehr, that the ladies wouldn't throw away a hundred dollars on any fan if they knew of the misery just round the corner."

Therese's heart smote her; there was her Spanish lace—no good to her, nor to any one either, now.

"Is there—is there much misery—did you say—round the corner?" she asked, in a trembling way, with a very vague idea of misery as something unspeakably uncomfortable, small-pox, perhaps, or people who had been burned out, or had their legs broken.

"Indeed there is, miss. Round this corner as well as many another! If you're interested in such things—" continued Mrs. MacNamee, with a doubtful glance, yet only too willing to enlist a recruit in such cause.

"Certainly I am!" exclaimed Therese. "I never heard about it before. Why didn't they tell my father they had only a crust a day, and not always that?"

"Good Heavens, miss! It would take a hundred of your father, rich as he is, and begging your pardon, to help them. My man tells me there's fifty thousand out of employment and wanting bread to-day, besides all there were before. It makes my heart stand still to think of them and be looking at the twins—"

"I—I can't believe it," whimpered Therese.

Her new friend stood up suddenly. "Just you follow me," she whispered. "And I'll show you enough misery to satisfy a king."

"Is it—is it catching?" asked Therese.

Mrs. MacNamee laughed in spite of herself, and only beckoned her along, seeing that, for all her eighteen years and wealth and learning, she was but an ignorant child in the rough schooling where Mrs. MacNamee had graduated.

"It's a filthy slum in some weathers," said she. "But all's frozen too solid to speak a white shoe with dust to-night, and yours are black, I think. I'll just show you Margaret—that's what they all call her in her alley."

Before Therese had thought again of contagion, of her evening dress, her fears, or her father's permission, she was following Mrs. MacNamee, who had thrown a hood over her head, following her through an entry and a clean back-yard, out upon a narrow lane and down a black alley, whose odors made her sick and in whose farther end a faint light glimmered.

This light glimmered from a low window, incrustured with dirt, and through which no sunbeam had ever fallen, which had no curtain, and which disclosed the interior of a fearful room. It was a room half underground; you descended into it by three or four steps down which in the wet weather the rain and slush might run in rivers from the alley. From ceiling to floor it was a welter of uncleanness. There was a bed in this room—at least there had been, as Mrs. MacNamee took care to tell Therese who bent and looked in with her at the window—but now there was only a heap of straw and an old shawl; the rest had all been sold. There was one chair, a broken splinter of looking-glass, an old newspaper pinned across a missing pane; the table must have been that day split up to burn, and its last ashes were whitening now in the cold stove on whose top a tallow-candle set into a bottle spluttered and guttered dimly. The walls of this room sparkled with the frost, and were covered with stains that seemed in themselves to declare it foul with fever. A woman sat in the single straight chair rocking herself to and fro, purple with the cold; she held a quiet little baby in her arms that was not crying any longer.

"God have mercy on them!" whispered Mrs. MacNamee, hoarsely. "I can't stand this!" But before she could have moved a door had opened, and another person had entered the room. It was another woman, and it seemed to Therese, who felt herself under an awful nightmare, that she had seen her somewhere before; that face so swollen and haggard and ghastly and bleared, so stamped with hunger and thirst, with sin and sleeplessness! It flashed upon her in a second that it was the woman who had tried to speak to her at the carriage-door.

This creature came into the room now like a flame, and she slammed the door so that the window shook, while the other woman held up a sudden warning hand. Her face was all aglow; it was wreathed with smiles till it seemed to be transformed.

"Look at here, Meg!" she cried, in a loud and ringing voice, a voice that rasped, though, as it rung. "Look at here! Treasure-trove!" She tossed something up in the air, caught it as it fell, shook it till it seemed like one of those dark clouds that sometimes swim across the stars, held it so that the dim candle-light should shine through it, and show her a trace of the pattern that wandered among the meshes in a tangle of wild wood-lily shapes, flags, maiden-hairs, and ferns. Here was a woman that had loved splendor, to whom Spanish lace was as beautiful as to another. "I know the value of such things!" cried she. "I wore them—once when he cared about me. It's worth five hundred dollars if it's worth a cent!"

"Are you mad, Katy?" said her companion, glancing up only one second, and then bending back again above her baby.

"I begged her for charity, the minx! I frightened her—to look at me frightened the like of her. It's just as well; for then she dropped the shawl. She'll never see it again. I don't know the number, and I won't know the street! I brought it home for you to see first, that had never laid eyes on a rag worth half a thousand. Think of that, Meg! Now I'll be off to the three balls—they'll ask no questions. I'll not get a tithe of its first cost," she went on, with her rapid torrent of words. "But oh, Meg, it will be fire, it will be meal, it will be meat for you, and milk for the baby—the bird of blessing! Just for a little breathing, a moment's rest. I'll not go to jail to be wintered since she's come. I'd like to be good enough to be her mother." And she was down on the floor, and her arms were round Meg, and she was laughing and sobbing and swearing together on her shoulder.

"Oh, Katy, hush! hush! hush! oh, do but see!" moaned the other woman, motioning toward the little baby; and then Katy turned, and stared, and blanched, and broke out into a loud keen wail, and cast herself upon the child that had just given up its little soul and died.

Before Therese saw what had become of Mrs. MacNamee that good woman had found the entrance, ran down the steps and was in the room. In a kind of dumb amazement Therese went after her. She understood, by an inspiration, perhaps, that the child had starved to death.

The two women never looked up at their unbidden guest. There was nothing strange to them in Mrs. MacNamee's entrance; nothing strange in the presence of this little butterfly of fashion in her gay dress, within their festering walls. The only strange thing in all their lives seemed then to have just happened; the baby that had been given to them, Heaven alone knew why, if Heaven concerned itself at all about such wretches, that had been the light of their eyes, that might have been the salvation of their souls, whose existence was something inscrutable to them, whose growth a marvel, for which they would have lived virtuous lives had they been able, and for which they sinned when they could; the baby that, though it belonged to but one of them they loved alike, had gone as mysteriously as it had come, had suddenly acquired purity and remoteness, and was no longer theirs. They filled the air together with their cries.

"Oh, Margaret! how's this?" Therese heard Mrs. MacNamee say, and saw her take the child from Margaret's arms. But how she herself came to be sitting in Margaret's chair presently, and holding the little dead baby, a feather's weight, on her lap she never asked. Mrs. MacNamee had left her, and she forgot to be afraid; had run up to her own house and brought down coal and kindlings in a basket, had set the fire to blazing up the chimney, and had run back for a tray of whatever cold and broken store there might be in her own frugal pantry. Margaret had flung herself into the middle of the heap of straw and had drawn the old shawl over her head. But Katy was groveling on the floor beside Therese, lifting herself now and then to glance at the tiny and shriveled face, and then prostrating herself again with fresh shudders and fresh sobs. "I don't dare to kiss her!" she cried. "Oh, she's too pure a thing! She was my own flesh once—now, now, now, she's nothing to me—I've lost her! oh, I've lost her!" And after that, to contradict her own words, she seized the hand and held it to her lips, and kissed its fingers, and its palm, its wrist, its arm, as if she would devour it. And Therese, far from that quail of loathing, felt as if her heart would break with pity; she put her own arm round the woman's squalid shoulder and cried with her. She wanted to say some kind and solacing word, to tell her she had not lost her little child if she only chose to follow where it led—but she did not know where to begin—she had learned how to speak many languages, but never the language of consolation. And while she hesitated, there was her father standing before her, and Mrs. MacNamee quaking in his shadow, lest the master should dismiss her husband from his place for her offense in having brought the young lady into such a reeking spot.

"Come, Therese," said her father, gently. "I have left the means to do all that is necessary. I will come myself again to-morrow. But now Mrs. Meyerbehr is waiting."

"Oh, papa, not to-night," murmured Therese, shrinking from the whole affair of the night, with its gay tumult and brilliancy. She gave the little child, however, to Mrs. MacNamee, who had brought down for it some clean white clothes cast off by the twins, and since then laid away in lavender, and lingered only for some sort of farewell to these poor people—when Katy suddenly rose and put the shawl, whose existence Therese had forgotten, into her hands.

"If I'd known you'd so good a heart—" she said; and went back to hang above the child once more as the kind neighbor made it ready for the blessed rest that had been vouchsafed to it so early.

Therese did not oppose her father's wish when the horses' heads were turned toward Mrs. Meyerbehr's; she thought at that moment that, blind and foolish, she would never have a wish of her own again. She wondered at him an instant for caring to continue, after such a scene; but never dreamed that he wished by the sharp and sudden contrast to impress her experience on his little girl's soul enduringly. She composed her dress, which was not, after all, very much deranged; and she left the lace shawl in the dressing-room before going down on her stately father's arm. She found herself gossiping with Maud Clive, and thinking how soiled and tumbled looked the flounces of real point; she danced with the young German baron, and saw that the ribbon of that noble order in his button-hole was tarnished; she felt as if she had been stunned out of herself till all the intoxicating fragrance of the exotics that lined the walls, the strains of heavenly music, the glitter of this stomacher of gems that cast off rays like the ægis, the shimmer of that silk like a sheet of moonlit sea-water—till all this splendor and delight waked her into a wild reaction, and nobody who saw her then, sparkling, flushing, laughing, floating away on the stream of the melody sung by flutes and violins, would ever have conjured up in connection with her any vision of trouble or shadow of care. She never conjured it up herself during the hour, she fairly forgot the place she had so lately left, till the coach-door shut behind her. It had seemed to her all the night as if she had just escaped from hearing some terrible tale, from seeing some sad tragedy upon the stage, from dreaming some black, wild, horrifying nightmare. But in the coach again it rushed freshly over her, and she burst into a passion of tears which not all her father's efforts could calm.

"Papa," said she, by-and-by, when she kissed him his good-night at two o'clock in the morning, "I shall send back my Spanish lace, and get the money, if you please. Ladies may wear that kind of thing in a court, where the order of government depends on the aristocracy's splendor and power of inspiring awe. But I am one of the people—and my brothers and sisters are starving!"

And when she knelt beside her bed, in the prayers she had not outgrown with her childhood, into each word there sprung new life and light, and full of purpose and resolution, she seemed to hear a voice that said: "Inasmuch as you have done it unto one of the least of these, you have done it unto me!"

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

IDARESAY the American belles will be just as much interested in hearing an account of the world in which we English belles live as we in knowing of their gay doings.

One can not blush on paper, you see, so I have no scruple in speaking of "we" English belles, thereby including myself among the number. It is too far for any of you to come on purpose to see whether I have the right thus to speak in the plural number; so you are privileged to imagine me a sparkling brunette, with raven tresses and deep, fawn-like eyes, or a fairy-like blonde, with a complexion of alabaster, and peach-bloom and bright golden hair, such as has been so much the rage of late, just as the fancy may take you.

In London the season properly begins after Easter, and lasts until the end of July; still, much earlier, when Parliament is sitting, there is a great deal of gayety going on, even in Lent. The principal event in fashionable life this year, as yet, has been the reappearance of our Queen among us again. Ever since the poor Prince Consort died, in December, 1861, and even since the year before that, when her mother the Duchess of Kent died, our sovereign has been but little before the public. For the first year or so of her widowhood she was well-nigh paralyzed with grief, and never came to London at all, save for a hurried visit of a few hours perhaps. Her time was divided between her Scottish home at Balmoral, particularly dear to her as the scene of so many happy hours in her wedded life, when she was able to throw aside for a while the burdens and pomps of her position; Osborne, that marine palace of hers in our picturesque Isle of Wight; and old Windsor Castle, the favorite dwelling of our royal rulers for many a day.

By very slow degrees she has begun to take her old place among her faithful subjects once more. Here and there about the country, during the last year or two, she has been present at the inauguration of certain statues and memorials to the memory of her late husband; last year she herself laid the foundation-stone of the Hall of Arts and Sciences at South Kensington, now in progress of erection, near to the Kensington Museum and the Horticultural Gardens, both of which owe their very existence to the Prince Consort, who did his best to cultivate a pure taste among us. They were built under his special supervision, on ground adjoining a large tract of land belonging to him. Belgravia has for years been the ultra-fashionable quarter of London, where the really great folks make annually a three months' sojourn away from their country homes, and where would-be great people also think fit to pitch their tents and catch a reflection of their greatness, if possible. Now, however, fine houses are springing up every where at South Kensington, which bids fair before long to claim the very crème de la crème for its own, a tendency likely to be fostered by royalty just now, seeing how much gold will thereby flow into its private coffers.

Now, for the first time these seven years, the Queen has appeared in person at a Drawing Room. It is true that for the last two years she has received a select few at her Courts, but Courts are not Drawing Rooms; and this announcement of Drawing Rooms to be held by her has given universal satisfaction, though the difference between a Court and a Drawing Room is very slight. If I mistake not a Court, so called, is an innovation in state receptions, introduced by our present sovereign for the first time.

The Courts took place at Buckingham Palace, the palace at which the Royal family really live when they are at the capital. Only 250 persons were allowed to be present at them. Except to the first of the season, which was reserved for members of our Government, and of the Diplomatic Corps and the like, these 250 did not come by invitation. When the Courts were announced in the Gazette, it was also stated that those who desired to appear must send their names to the Lord Chamberlain within a given date, when in due time, provided the number was not complete, they would receive cards of admittance, to be presented on arriving at the palace.

Drawing Rooms were also held by the Princess of Wales, or any of the Princesses, daughters of Her Majesty, who might be available, and such people as could not go to a Court could attend a Drawing Room if they pleased, the only actual difference between the two being that the Queen was not herself present at the latter; that the numbers who attended them were not limited; that they were not held at Buckingham Palace but at St. James's Palace, where the state apartments have always been specially appropriated to such purposes; and that whereas at a Court gentlemen and ladies could both be presented, at a Drawing Room ladies only appeared before royalty, though husbands and fathers could accompany their wives and daughters if they pleased; but if they themselves wished to be presented—failing to gain admittance to a Court—they must go to a Levé, all Levés being now held by the Prince of Wales.

Who are the people entitled to appear at Courts and Drawing Rooms? A most difficult question to answer. Of course, nobody of questionable character would for a moment be permitted to appear, and they are supposed to be restricted to people in the upper ranks of society; but a vast number of nobodies of no particular rank or standing find their way there, somehow or other, who would never have the smallest chance of receiving an invitation to a state ball or to any of the great houses, the entrées to which proclaim that you belong to the upper ten thousand. The etiquette observed is, that such persons as desire to be presented at a Drawing Room shall send in their names, together with the name of the lady who presents them, who must signify her intention of attending the same Drawing Room to the Lord Chamberlain some few days before, in order that they may be submitted to the Queen, when, if she is graciously pleased to receive them, a printed card will be forwarded to them signifying the same, all of which is a mere empty form.

And now about the dress worn on these occasions. If you wish to see English girls in their most attractive guise these are very fitting opportunities. We never look so well, I think, except perhaps when riding in Rotten Row. A pretty woman is ten degrees prettier on horseback than any where else.

The distinguishing marks of a lady's Court dress, and without which she would not be admitted, are the train, the lappets, and the plumes. The so-called lappets are now pretty generally superseded by long tulle ends, which, with the white plumes drooping gracefully at the side of the head, are exceedingly becoming, forming a kind of gossamer halo to the face.

The body of the dress, which must be low, always corresponds with the train. The so-called petticoat—which is in truth the skirt of the dress—is usually of tulle or tarlatan, worn over silk of the same color as the train, or in white or black, and trimmed to correspond with it. The trains are made of silk, satin, moire, and sometimes, early in the season, of velvet, trimmed with the most costly lace and puffs and bouillons of tulle caught up here and there with bows of ribbon and flowers, in every conceivable device. Sometimes they are arranged to fall from the shoulder, but usually from the waist, reaching to the hips on both sides, and so giving a full view of the petticoat. Until you actually enter the Presence Chamber the train is carried on the left arm, carefully arranged so as to display the rounded end at the bottom, with the trimming thereon, to full perfection. Débutantes, like brides, appear all in white, mostly in white silk trains and tulle petticoats, covered with bunches of white flowers.

Now having so far entered on the technicalities of going to Court, I will proceed to give you my experiences of what I saw and did there the many times I have been present.

The Drawing Rooms this season differ from any hitherto held, inasmuch as they take place at Buckingham Palace, like the Courts, and not at St. James's.

St. James's Palace is an ancient-looking building, occupying the site of a hospital, founded before the Norman Conquest. Henry VIII. was its first royal possessor, and the old gate-house and turrets, which face St. James's Street, were built at his commands. I can not pause to tell you half the historical reminiscences associated with it. All our sovereigns from that time have added their quota to its history; but it is vividly impressed on my mind that when at last you do arrive there—having come down St. James's Street at a snail's pace, hemmed in by other carriages, and eagerly scanned by the busy crowd who congregate there to see all there is to be seen, which is but little, a mere cloud of tulle and silk filling each carriage-window, with a much-bedizened head just visible above it all—you can not help, even in the midst of the brilliant scene around you, with the fresh peep of green grass in St. James's Park facing you, being in a manner awed by its sombre, dreary antiquity.

There is plenty of splendor, and glitter, and bustle, both within and without the old Palace, on Drawing Room days. Red-coated royal footmen buzz about the portals. Most of the liveries of the servants accompanying the guests are fresh and new. By-the-by, I am not quite sure that the fat coachmen in their cocked hats, with a large bouquet of flowers in the breasts of their bright-colored coats, seated alone on their large smart coach-boxes, covered with gorgeous hammer-cloths, with two flunkies in the rumble behind, gold stick in hand, and corresponding bouquets in corresponding gay coats, are not as imposing a part of the spectacle as any.

When at last you do arrive at the palace you alight under a low covered postern, more like the entrance to a vault than the entrance to a palace; then you find yourself in a long corridor, which brings you to the foot of the great staircase, where you present one of two large cards, with which you have to provide yourself, with your name clearly written thereon. There is a vast deal of bright coloring every where, beside the gay dresses of the guests. The royal pages who take these cards are in full court-dress, viz., black or claret-colored cloth or velvet coats, with elaborate steel buttons; ruffles, bag-wig, and sword; a cocked hat; a waistcoat embroidered in divers colors, with a frill of lace in front; knee-breeches, silk stockings, and shoes with buckles complete the costume.

The Yeomen of the Guard, or Beef-eaters, who line the ample staircase, still retain the quaint dress they wore when the corps was first raised, at the coronation of Henry VII.: low-crowned felt hats, curiously wrought short scarlet dresses, and Elizabethan-looking ruffs, standing up stiffly round the neck, with long staves in their hands.

At the entrance of each of the rooms stand two of the Gentlemen-at-arms, a corps whose duty it is to attend the sovereign on state occasions. Their uniform is bright scarlet, with very rich gold trappings, surmounted by a gilt helmet with a long waving white plume. As each room fills they cross their halberds before the door, when no one is allowed to pass.

At the top of the stairs you find yourself in the small guard-room, whose walls are covered with arms in every imaginable device; this leads into the old Presence Chamber, hung with fine old tapestry, which originally belonged to Charles I.

Then comes Queen Anne's room, a noble apartment, with large portraits of departed sovereigns on its walls, and plenty of gilding about it. A large baronial-looking fire-place is on one side; on the other a range of windows looking on to St. James's Park. The body of the room is filled with seats arranged face to face; and here you await your turn to enter the Royal presence, and have the best opportunity of seeing every body and the dresses worn by every body. The ladies' toilettes are as elaborate as they can be, and the few there present are in court-dress or uniform, for no plain morning or evening dress is allowed.

Certain people, of higher rank than the rest of the world—ministers, ambassadors, and the like assemble in the next room, an equally splendid one. They enjoy what is called the privilege of the entrée, and arrive by a different entrance, and pass before the Queen first.

In the court-yard outside, the Royal Band, in a uniform which looks one mass of gold, strike up as soon as the state carriages bearing the Royal family arrive; and if you happen to take up your station by the window you see them well, and the detachment of Life-Guards which accompanies the cortège. Then there is a general rustle and bustle of expectancy, and in an incredibly short time the entrée people make their obeisances, the farther door is thrown open, and your turn has arrived to make your way toward the throne-room.

You pass in single file along the narrow passage railed off from the rest of the room by brass rods and silk cord, and make your way across the next apartment to the door of the Presence Chamber, when your train is removed from your arm by the pages in waiting, and trails on the ground behind you; and before you at all realize your position you are bending before the Royal group.

The Queen, or her representative, stands on a raised dais before the throne; she is dressed in full dress, with feathers, lappets, and train, like those around her, and the Order of the Garter, or the Victoria and Albert Order, crosses her breast. On both sides of her are other members of the Royal family, and behind her, tier upon tier, the maids of honor, bedchamber women, equerries, and the other Court functionaries, together with certain other privileged persons, who have the right to join the general circle, as it is called, which indeed fills the whole room, save the passage left for those who come to pay their homage.

The stillness in the room is something appalling; and when you reach the Queen you give that other card to the Lord Chamberlain, who reads your name thereon in a loud, stentorian voice, which seems to ring through your ears with a painful distinctness.

If you are presented to the Queen you kiss her hand; but you only do this when presented, not when you go afterward to Court, then you merely courtesy and pass on, nor do you ever kiss the hand of any representative of the Queen even when presented.

After you have made a low obeisance to the Queen and the Royal family you back slowly toward the opposite door. Your train is again thrown on your arm, and the ceremony is over. You may, if you please, linger a little in the long gallery leading from the throne-room, and gossip with your friends; but these state pageants are soon over nowadays, and you are once more in your carriage and away before you know it. In England Drawing Rooms are held at two or three o'clock in the daytime, in Ireland and France in the evening.

Buckingham Palace, where Drawing Rooms have been held this year, is a more modern building and far larger; the state apartments are altogether grander, and the picture-gallery you have to traverse on your way to the throne-room contains chef-d'œuvres worthy of a visit for themselves alone.

ARDERN HOLT.

A LOVE LYRIC.

Love, too late your eyes betoken
What your lips have never spoken,
Never should your heart be broken
Were it linked with mine.

Love's that pressure of the hand
Lovers only understand,
Where is love there's fairy-land,
Thou the Queen of mine.

Love's a servitude to me
Sweeter far than liberty,
Dearest, if it's shared by thee,
Happy bondage mine.

Love's a silver-twisted cord,
Love's a strain of music poured
At the feet of the adored.
Listen, love, to mine.

Love's the pole-star of the young,
Love's a rosy halo hung
O'er existence. Thou hast flung Such a one o'er mine.

Love's an ecstasy, a sigh,
If the loved one be not by,
Love's a tear-drop in the eye;
Kiss them, love, from mine.

Love's a martyr, love's a saint Sent to teach us self-restraint:
Nothing selfish ever taint
Love that's yours and mine.

Love's all-powerful, all-wise;
Love's a preacher in disguise;
Love ennobles, purifies,
Such be yours and mine.

Love's a rose that ever flings
Fragrance over common things;
Love's a thorn that sometimes stings;
Thornless rose, be mine.

Mine to shield throughout the strife
Of a storm-disturbed life;
Mine to cherish as a wife,
Living, dying mine.

A LITTLE LESSON.

WE ought not to complain too bitterly or to be too much disheartened at the misfortunes that may befall us, as we never can be sure that the events, however apparently untoward, may not turn out to be no misfortunes at all in the end. This principle is well illustrated by the following case:

A seaman on board a man-of-war had both his legs broken by the bursting of a bomb on the decks in the midst of a battle. He was taken below, and his case was soon examined by the surgeon. The surgeon decided that the right leg could be saved, but that the left one was so badly fractured that it must come off. The next morning, being occupied himself with the cases of some of the officers, he sent two of his assistants to perform the amputation. They, somehow or other, made a mistake, and took off the right leg—which in this case was the wrong one.

The surgeon, when he came to see what had been done, was much incensed against the assistants, as was also the seaman himself. The latter, however, declared that he would not submit to another amputation, but would take his chance with the wreck of a leg which remained to him, and live or die as fate might determine.

Contrary to the surgeon's predictions, he got well. The left leg recovered and became as serviceable as ever. He had a wooden leg made to replace the other.

Some time afterward he was in another battle. A shot came from the enemy's ship, and, sweeping the deck, struck our seaman and took off his wooden leg. He seized hold of the capstan to steady himself, and as soon as he had recovered a little from the shock, and the astonishment of seeing the splinters of his wooden limb flying over the side, he snapped his fingers, saying:

"How lucky it is for me now that those blundering fellows took off the leg they did! For if they had taken off the other one I should not now have had any leg at all."

PARASOLS WITH DIFFERENT STYLES OF TRIMMING.

THE present styles of parasols do not differ in shape from those of last year. They are mostly covered with silk or poul de soie, and lined with white marcelline, though the lining is sometimes of the same color as the outside. The styles of trimming are numerous, consisting of bias folds, points, flaps, and puffs, either of the same material as the parasol or of satin; fringe, embroidery in satin stitch, point russe, etc. The trimming is usually of the same shade as the parasol, though a darker or lighter shade is sometimes used. Wooden handles are much in vogue, some being carved and etched in light or dark colors, and some white, smooth, and polished. Bone and ivory handles are also used. Elegant imported parasols are made, covered with point lace, with handles formed of solid pieces of gold-stone, onyx, amber, and cornelian; but these are very expensive, costing sometimes $3000 in gold.

Fig. 1.—MODE POULT DE SOIE PARASOL.—This parasol is lined with white marcelline. About half an inch from the outer edge sew on a frill of poul de soie two and a half inches wide, with the pleats some distance apart; and cut into points on the outer edge an inch deep by an inch and a half in width, with a strip an inch wide of the same material set under along this pointed edge. The place where the trimming is sewed on is covered by velvet ribbon a quarter of an inch wide. Above the frill small points of the poul de soie are sewed on. Fig. 15 shows the manner of making these. For each point take a piece of the material two inches square, and fold it so that it shall form a triangle; then fold it again in such a manner as to bring the three corners together. Having prepared the points sew them on as shown in the illustration, taking care to put the slit at the middle of the upper point. The places where these are fastened on the parasol are covered by means of the velvet ribbon which is sewed on. In addition to this a straight row of the velvet is sewed on above. The handle is of bone.

Fig. 2.—LIGHT GREEN POULT DE SOIE PARASOL.—This parasol is ornamented with small figures embroidered in silk twist and finished with bugles; above this a row of puffs of the poul de soie. These puffs are arranged together from a piece of stuff two and a half inches wide, which is pleated across at regular distances, and sewed on the parasol, so that the part lying between each point of pleating shall stand out in a loose puff. Between every two puffs is a little band of black satin. The lining is of white marcelline; the handle is of polished whitewood. The design given in Fig. 17 may be substituted for the abovementioned design, of which Fig. 16 gives one figure of the full size.

Figs. 3-7.—BLACK SILK PARASOL.—This parasol is ornamented on the edge with black silk fringe three inches wide, and tabs of the same material as the parasol. These tabs are each two and a half inches in length and two inches in breadth; they are bound around the edges with a satin binding a quarter of an inch wide, and are sewed close to each other on the parasol. Those tabs which fall over a rib of the frame must be laid on in a pleat on the upper edge, so that it shall not stretch. The place where the tabs are sewed on is covered by a row of puffs of the silk fastened by the small satin bands which are made like those already described in Fig. 2. The lining is of white marcelline, the handle of black quaintly etched wood. The closed parasol is fastened together by means of a braided ring of black silk cord (see Fig. 5). For making this six cords are needed; these are laid together at half their length and then divided into three strands, each consisting of four cords, and are braided together as shown by Fig. 6. The under end of the braid is wound firmly with black cord and then fastened under the upper end, where the cords are fastened together. (See illustration.) On the ring thus formed fasten two tassels; then draw a black silk cord through the braid of the ring, and fasten one end of this cord to the upper point of the parasol, and the other to the under end of one of the ribs.

may be substituted for the braided one. The pattern is worked of black silk twist. On a foundation of the requisite length crochet three rounds sc. (single crochet), taking care to put the needle through both the upper veins of the stitches. This forms the thick middle strip. Then work on both sides, and across one end of this strip, the interlacing scallops. In the first stitch of the last round work 1 sc. (single crochet), 10 ch. (chain stitches), 1 sc. on the 4th following stitch; then having turned the work crochet back on the chain stitches 1 sl. (slip stitch) in each ch., 1 sl. in that stitch of the thick strip in which was worked the first sc. before the chain row; then, returning, 15 sc. on the scallop; 1 sl. in that stitch of the strip in which was worked the sc. after the chain row, 2 ch. *. Now take the needle out of the loop and put it through the second of the three stitches of the thick strip which were passed over by the chain row; again take up the loop which was dropped from the needle—in doing which the needle must be put under the scallop—and crochet together with one thread the loop and stitch on the needle. Then work a scallop which is composed of 3 ch., 1 sl. in the 4th from the last sc. of the former scallop and 6 ch. In working the first 3 ch. of this row the working thread always lies behind the scallop just finished. In forming this scallop pass over 4 stitches of the thick strip, taking 1 sc. in the following stitch; then, turning the work, crochet a row of sl. back on the scallop; 1 sl. in the sc. of the strip before the chain row; then 15 sc. on the scallop, 1 sl. in the next sc. which was worked in the thick strip; 2 ch. Repeat from * until the thick strip is bordered with scallops as shown in the pattern. The scallops may be worked on one end as shown in the full-sized figure. Having finished the crochet work join the strip in a ring by sewing the scalloped end over the other.

Fig. 8 is a foundation of gray and black silk, the edges of which are cut in scallops and worked in button-hole stitch with gray silk twist, as shown in Fig. 20. Above the black border runs a vine which is embroidered in satin-stitch with black silk twist. Fig. 19 shows a section of the full size. On each side of the embroidery is worked a row of chain stitch, and outside of these a row in herring-bone. These rows are worked with black on the gray silk, and with gray on the black silk. Fig. 56, Supplement, gives the pattern of one-eighth of this cover.

Fig. 9 is a cover of lilac silk, embroidered in satin stitch and point russe, and finished on each side by a border of chain stitch and one of herring-bone, worked in violet silk. Fig. 18 shows a section of the full size.

Fig. 10 is a cover of gray silk which is ornamented with bugles and chain stitch in black silk twist, as shown in the pattern and the design given in Fig. 55, Supplement.

Fig. 11 is a cover of light and dark brown silk, and is worked as is shown by the pattern and the design given in Fig. 54, Supplement, in chain and herring-bone stitch, satin stitch, and point russe. The embroidery is done with dark silk on the light, and with light silk on the dark foundation.

Fig. 12 is a cover of light brown poul de soie, bordered with dark brown. This is embroidered in satin-stitch and point russe, and finished with chain stitches of light brown silk twist. The outer edges of the border are finished by a row of herring-bone stitch in light brown silk.

Fig. 13 is a cover of light brown silk, trimmed with bias folds of the same material and brown fringe. The bias folds are sewed on by means of brown satin cord.

Fig. 14 is a cover of gray poul de soie, trimmed as shown in the illustration with bias folds and points of black satin. The bias folds are bordered on one side with white and black satin cord.

Fig. 21 is a parasol trimming made of coarse silk twist, the threads of which are stretched across each other and fastened at the crossing points by means of two crystal beads. A bias fold of the stuff is sewed on at each side of these threads by means of satin cord.

stitches of silk twist, every five of which are drawn together and fastened by means of a cross stitch. Two rows of chain and one of herring-bone stitch complete the trimming, as shown in the pattern.

Key Pocket.

THIS pocket for keys, which is shown of the full size in the accompanying illustration, is of double brown silk, lined with a thin layer of wadding, and quilted with brown sewing-silk, in the manner shown by the illustration. The pattern of the part covered by the flap is given in Fig. 57, Supplement. The outer edge is bound with brown silk braid. The pocket is fastened by means of a button and button-hole. For this pocket cut of silk two double pieces of the shape given by the pattern, making the back and flap in one piece, and the front alone. Then cut to fit these two thin pieces of wadding, cover them on both sides with buckram, and lay them between the pieces of silk. Quilt in the pattern given, after which lay the two parts together and bind the edges with braid. (See illustration.) Finish with button and button-hole.

Netted Guipure and Tatted Cravat End.

THE ends of this cravat are ornamented with a square of netted guipure, bordered with tating and set on the ribbon. The squares are netted, and count seven holes in length and breadth. They are worked in point de toile, point de reprise, and point d'esprit, all of which stitches have already been described in the Bazar. The foundation is worked over a mesh a quarter of an inch in circumference.

ten the thread to the same stitch, after which pass it to the next stitch and work a small ring of 5 ds., taking up next the picot of the former ring, 4 ds., 1 p., 5 ds. The thread is first fastened to the same netted stitch, then to the following. Repeat twice from *; then repeat three times from *, by which the square is completely bordered. This is then set in the ends of the ribbon, as shown in the illustration.

Netted Cravat End with Rosette.

THIS cravat is pretty and easily made. The rosettes which form the ends are fastened to the stuff in button-hole stitch, and are netted with steel knitting-needles of fine cord over a mesh three-quarters of an inch in circumference. The star in the centre of each rosette is worked in point de reprise and point d'esprit. The rosette is begun in the centre by a foundation of eight stitches worked over a steel knitting-needle a quarter of an inch in circumference. Join these in a round, and work: 1st round.—Over the netting mesh, one stitch in each stitch of the foundation. 2d round.—On the steel needle, again a stitch in each stitch of the last round. 3d round.—Over the mesh, three stitches in each stitch of the last round. 4th-6th rounds.—On the steel needle, one stitch in each stitch of the preceding round. 7th round.—Over the mesh, four stitches in each stitch of the 6th round. 8th and 9th rounds.—On the steel needle, one stitch in each stitch of the preceding round. The 10th and 11th rounds are worked in the same manner, but on a somewhat finer needle; and the 12th on a very fine steel needle. The remaining rows may be worked on a fine darning needle. The rosette is worked in point de reprise and point d'esprit, and fastened to the ribbon as shown by the illustration.

INLAID WORK.

THIS is another way of adorning the surface of wooden articles of furniture or ornament. Tables, shelves, boxes, etc., of white-wood may be beautifully decorated with simple or elaborate designs so as closely to imitate the costly inlaying of rosewood or ebony.

The article to be ornamented must be of light-colored wood, the whiter the better, and made perfectly smooth by being rubbed with fine sand-paper and pumice powder. Then give the whole surface, or that portion which is to contain the pattern, an even coat of pure Damar varnish, and when dry rub it again with pumice powder, in order to smooth down the roughness brought out by the varnishing. The outline pattern may now be drawn either with a fine lead pencil or by the use of tracing-paper.

Fig. 16.—EMBROIDERY PATTERN FOR PARASOL, FIG. 2.

For a round table a beautiful design may be formed of ivy leaves of different sizes, arranged in a wreath with bunches of berries. Other designs, such as jasmine sprays or vine leaves, clusters of grapes and tendrils are very pretty and effective.

In tracing the pattern great care must be taken not to let the pencil marks go within the outlines, as it will be difficult to erase them, and the effect will be marred by any false marks or touches. When the whole pattern is distinctly traced upon the wood it will be ready for the color.

Now take fine black Japan varnish and a fine camel's-hair or sable brush of medium size, but capable of being brought to a point when required. Apply the black carefully, going around every part of the design without encroaching on the pattern, but filling up the little spaces, leaving the whole complete with the stems clearly traced and left in the whitewood. When this part of the work is finished the solid edges may be done with a larger brush for greater expedition, and filled up evenly with black, then left to dry entirely.

In commencing the coloring, if it seem inclined to spread into the white portions, another coat of the Damar must be applied, and become thoroughly dry before proceeding with the black. One coat of the black varnish will give it the appearance of rosewood; but if intended to represent ebony another will be required. The veins of the leaves may be drawn with a finely-pointed black-lead pencil to look as graceful and as nearly like those in a natural leaf as possible. Now, when all is thoroughly dry, finish the whole with an even coat of the Damar varnish, and it will be done. We have seen black varnished tables ornamented very prettily with yellow autumn leaves of small sizes, which, when grouped or formed into wreaths for round tables, or corner designs for square ones, and securely gummed on and varnished with this white Damar, look very well.

Yellow sprays of fern well dried by pressing in books are beautiful for this purpose. Common earthen vases or jars painted black, and then treated in this way with bright leaves, ferns, etc., are very pretty and useful as receptacles for grasses, scrap-jars, or flower-pots.

SPRING.

WHEN stern Winter retires
From his iron-bound reign,
And the sun dares to peep
Over mountain and main,
Then I rise from my rest,
And go forth on my way;
The birds watch me passing:
"Spring's coming," they say,
"Spring's coming—Spring's coming,"
They twitter and sing;
"Oh hasten, oh hasten,
Our beautiful Spring!"

I pass o'er the meadows,
And passing, I shower
My sweet simple treasures
Of leaf and of flower:
Sure, such bloomed in Eden
When Eve sat therein:
The late flowers are redder,
They blush for her sin.
Though their glories may glow
On the proud beauty's breast,
It is those nearest Eden
Who love mine the best!

I pass o'er the country,
And down to the shore,
While the winter-born babies
Look up and adore;
And the aged and stricken
Forget half their pain,
And bless Him who spared them
To see me again.
And the winter-made graves,
That are barren and brown,
I clothe with my pity,
And lend death my crown.

But I hear a voice crying,
"O Spring, you are sad;
Ay, sadder than Autumn,
Because you are glad!
You come with your smiling,
Your songs and your flowers,
And your sweet fitful changes
Of sunshine and showers;
While our songs are silent,
And our flowers are dead,
And our hearts are empty,
With no tears to shed!"

Can you hear when I whisper,
"Look up and be glad!
There's a better Spring coming
To those who are sad,
When your song will be sweeter
Than that which is hushed;
And the flowers she'll restore you,
Are yours, that Life crushed.
Yet take what I bring you,
And bear me a while:
'Tis the sin-drop of sorrow
To sigh at a smile!"

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE approach of the delightful and dreaded First of May brings a multiplicity of home duties. Delightful it is, in that merry May awakens a joy in many youthful hearts as sweet and fresh as the early blossoms it unfolds; dreaded it is by thousands who know, alas! too well the horrors of "Moving Day" in New York city. It is an old story—the labored packing, the perilous transfer of goods and chattels, the discomforts of home life before and after, to say nothing of the immense wear and tear of temper which usually distinguish this most miserable anniversary.

But aside from any considerations of moving spring brings many matters which need careful attention in every home. Of course, new bonnets and dresses must be got—no danger of any lady forgetting that! But far less pleasant is it to examine last year's wardrobe, and decide what can be renovated and made use of, and what should be disposed of as no longer serviceable. The children probably have outgrown every thing they did not wear out, and must be refitted entirely—no slight task for the careful mother, who wishes her children to be neatly and tastefully dressed, and yet desires to use such economy as is possible. Then household bedding needs attention; blankets must be examined and packed away; woollen garments thoroughly brushed and securely wrapped; and furs demand extra care to protect them from the depredations of moths. Indeed, unless one puts away her furs very early in the season she can hardly feel that they are secure, without she examines them several times in the course of the summer. Unless they are committed to the care of a furrier, the best that can be done is to brush them thoroughly, wrap them securely, and open them occasionally. Camphor, pepper, and similar articles may prevent the moth-miller from intruding after furs are put away; but if the eggs have previously been deposited it is quite impossible to foresee what mischief may result.

There is another care, even more dreaded than care of the wardrobe—that is, house-cleaning. And precious little sympathy do wives usually obtain from their husbands in this crisis. They—the husbands—never see the use of cleaning; the burden of their song is:

"The melancholy days have come, the saddest of the year,
Of cleaning paint and scrubbing floors, and scouring far and near."

"Where are those rooms, those quiet rooms, the house but now presented,
Wherein we dwell, nor dreamed of dirt, so cozy and contented?
Alas! they're turned all upside down, that quiet suite of rooms,
With slops, and suds, and soap, and sand, and tubs, and pails, and brooms."

Yet, for all that, these complaining husbands enjoy a nice, clean, fresh house exceedingly, only their faculties seldom permit them to discover that the paint needs scrubbing, and the carpets shaking; besides, they hate all great commotions which do not come within their "sphere." So all good wives may rightfully decide what is necessary to be done in the house-cleaning line; but let it be done with as little commotion as possible; and a little tact (what a wonderful faculty is woman's tact!) will serve to guard the master of the house from any special discomfort.

A little girl recently died in this city from an unusual cause; and although we do not know as the circumstances have been made public, it seems well for parents to take warning from them. The little girl was perfectly well on a certain Saturday, but ate some oranges, and with the fruit she ate considerable of the peel. That night she was not very well; the next day seriously ill. The physician was summoned; but it was too late to save the child. She died about noon on Sunday. The essential oil in the orange-peel had, as it were, poisoned her.

An exciting discussion occurred not long since in the convention of the Massachusetts Homeopathic Medical Society on the question of admitting a practicing female physician of Boston into the Society. A vote was taken, and the matter decided against the lady by thirty-three against thirty-one.

On the other hand, a New Bedford paper states that at the recent annual parish meeting of the First Congregational Society in that city, the ladies not only voted, but were placed on nominating committees, and were made members of standing committees of the Society.

A curious incident is related in a Lombard paper as having occurred at Brescia. It is a good story, and reminds one of the circumstances on which "No Thoroughfare" is based. A little boy was put out to nurse immediately after his birth. Three months afterward the parents went to see it. The nurse produced a girl-baby and insisted that this was their child. By dint of threats she was, however, obliged to confess that, with the hope of earning a double fee, she had carried the boy to the founding hospital, and the next day had presented herself at that institution to adopt a child, supposing she would receive the same she had left. It turned out that she had received a girl. On inquiry at the hospital it was discovered that at the hour when the child of these distracted parents was left there another male child was also deposited, and there were no distinguishing marks. The father, reasoning that he might always be tormented with doubts if he left either, concluded to adopt both, and did so.

At a wedding in one of the Southern States, when the minister inquired if any one objected to the marriage, a husky voice from the corner cried out, "I do!" All eyes were turned in that direction, when a man emerged from the crowd, holding his handkerchief up to his eyes and sobbing. "Why do you object?" asked the minister. "Because I want her myself."

Miss Braddon, in her recent novel, "Charlotte's Inheritance," gives, through one of the principal characters, this view of a "generous lover":

"A lover who is not generous is—bah! there is nothing in creation so mean as the wretch whom love does not render generous. When one sees the woman whom fate intends for one's wife, is one to stop to inquire the character of her father, her mother, her sister, her cousin? for there is no stopping when you begin that. A man who loves makes no inquiries. If he finds his jewel in the gutter, he picks it out of the mud and carries it away in his bosom, too proud of his treasure to remember where he found it—always provided that the jewel is no counterfeit, but the real gem, fit for the king's crown."

It is a very simple matter to make a modern bonnet—there is so very little of it, that almost any thing is sufficient in quantity, and the styles are so varied and fantastic that one can scarcely fail to put the necessary bits and ends together in a fashionable manner. The following recipe, however, may be valuable to the less ingenious:

A scrap of foundation, some fragments of lace, a shower of French rose-buds to droop o'er the face; Bright ribbons and feathers, with crape and illusion; Then mix and derange them in graceful confusion. Inveigle some fairy, out roaming for pleasure; And beg the slight favor of taking her measure; The length and the breadth of her dear little pate, And hasten a miniature frame to create; Then pour, as above, the bright mixture upon it, And lo! you possess "such a love of a bonnet."

In these days of ingenious dishonesty we scarcely can know what we may be eating in the shape of food. While we desire to have as good an opinion of mankind as possible, it is impossible not to realize that a large proportion of adulterated articles are sold by grocers and other dealers. In some cases we are not deceived, for we do not expect the pure article, yet there is much more unscrupulous dealing than is generally known. It is not a secret that clear, golden sirup can be made from starch and sulphuric acid; that beans, peas, and nuts, and rye are transformed into excellent coffee; that sugar is compounded with starch, sand, plaster of Paris, or any thing white; and that wines are made without a drop of grape juice, from beet-roots, from potatoes, and from, as has been stated, a thousand different substances. It is a pity we can not know a little more definitely what we are eating and drinking. But so it is. Unless one sees his coffee ground from the berry, he may be almost positive that he is drinking a motley mixture, which, to be sure, may taste exceedingly well. There is a little chicory in it, you may think. And what is chicory? A root, which, when dried, roasted, and ground, resembles coffee in appearance, although it has neither the essential oil, nor the aromatic flavor of coffee, nor does it possess the nutritive properties of that berry, though many consider it harmless. But a recent Number of the Scientific American makes this statement: "Chicory is now prepared, to our certain knowledge, of oak bark, of old coffee-grounds, of finely-sifted coal ashes, or else with the saw-dust falling from mahogany and walnut woods, as well as with iron black and ground horse-leathers; these are a few of the elegantly prepared articles sold under the name of 'coffee.' Therefore one needs to investigate a little further than merely to ascertain that there is "chicory" in his coffee. Loaf-sugar, which is esteemed the most elegant kind of sweetening, has been known to be prepared of acetate of lead, sulphuric acid, old paper, wool, flax, and even common rags, ground up, and impregnated with white sugar. However marvelous these adulterations may seem as chemical or mechanical experiments, they have become degraded into mere tricks of trade, filling the pockets of dealers, but often destroying the health of consumers.

A valuable course of lectures on the laws of physiology and health has been delivered to the students of the New York Union Theological Seminary, by Dr. Willard Parker. The subject of one of the recent lectures was tobacco; and Dr. Parker cited many facts to show the injurious effects of using this article. He said it was particularly injurious to studious men of sedentary habits and indoor life. Such should never smoke. The odor infects their clothing, study, and books, so that they live and breathe in a noxious atmosphere of tobacco. Those who spend most of their time in the open air are not in such constant peril. The lecturer stated that there are in this city not less than 235,000 smokers; that a moderate smoker consumes four cigars daily, and at the wholesale prices these cost 15 cents each. If the average daily expenditure of each smoker could be reckoned at 60 cents, this city would consume $141,000 per day, and $51,465,000 per year. This sum might be an offset to some of the extravagances charged to women. Men are not self-sacrificing enough, as a class, to resign a luxury because it is expensive—nor indeed, because it is harmful. But if women should judiciously use their influence against the use of tobacco the number of smokers might be diminished. We understand that a lectureship has been established by Dr. Parker, so that in succeeding years the students of the Seminary will receive lectures on physiology by various professional men.

The Riverside Magazine gives some interesting items about the ladies of Lima: The Alameda is the public garden and promenade of the city. In the afternoon it is thronged with pedestrians, of whom, generally, ladies form a fair proportion. All of them are dressed gracefully, some handsomely. Not many years ago the dress of a Lima lady was very peculiar. They wore, universally, the "saya y manto." The saya was a tight-fitting skirt, clinging close to the person, and restricting the gait very much. At the waist was fastened a white shawl, passing round the body, and hanging down in front; and over the shoulders and head was thrown the manto, which is a long black scarf, about three-quarters of a yard wide. It covered the head completely, and was held up with one hand, so as entirely to conceal the face, one eye only being visible. Nowadays, crinoline has usurped the place of the saya, but the manto is still indispensable. Every lady in Lima wears the manto instead of bonnet or hat, but it is no longer a general fashion to hide the features with it. Still, a great many ladies draw it about the face with one hand, leaving only two flashing black eyes to establish their identity by. These veiled ladies, or "tapadas" as they are called, are especially frequent in the Alameda. They are supposed to be young ladies, fond of amusement, and willing to enjoy for an hour all the privileges of a mask, and are always ready with a repartee for any pleasantry. They all have large, expressive black eyes. Indeed the women of Lima are celebrated for their beauty, and justly.

Throughout Alaska what are called "soap-berries" are said to be found in great abundance. They grow on bushes somewhat like whortleberries. When ripe they are red and juicy. One quart placed in a tub the size of a bushel will, when stirred, completely fill the tub with froth, and the more it is stirred the stiffer it becomes, until it can be cut with a knife. The taste for it is undoubtedly an acquired one, but the commodity is much sought after. The froth is of a beautiful pink color. Green berries will make nearly the same amount of froth, but it is of a white color, and is not so highly flavored. Foreigners stir it with sherry or port wine, and add sugar, considering it a delicious luxury. Large quantities are dried, and will keep for years. The dried berries are black and look dirty. A piece two inches square beaten in a water-pail will fill it full of froth, of a dark pink color.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY have just received
TWO FULL CARGOES of the
FINEST NEW CROP TEAS.
22,000 Half Chests by Ship Golden State.
12,000 Half Chests by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivalled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

Oolong (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
Mixed (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
English Breakfast, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
Imperial (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Yorke Hyson (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Uncolored Japan, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Gunpowder, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.
Coffees roasted and ground daily.
Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.
Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY), we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are
BOOTS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.
Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND
CURES
Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.
POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will be hereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

THE ENGLISH JOURNALS ON WOMEN.

THE London Saturday Review, which has so savagely criticised women of late, has just published a scathing article under the title of "The Girl of the Period," holding the English girls of the present day up to scorn, and drawing a most unflattering comparison between them and those of yore. The brutality of the attack has aroused the chivalry of the whole English press, and scores of journals have hastened to refute the slander, not the least among whom is the sprightly Echoes from the Clubs, whose witty poem and illustration we reproduce as a matter of interest to American ladies, so closely involved in all that concerns their fair English cousins:

"THE GIRL OF THE PERIOD."

"OURS."

Ours! We know them well, the darling maidens,
Destined mothers of the coming race,
Know each innocent voice's joyous cadence,
Know the gay smile on each fair young face.

Pure as pearls from difficult depths of ocean,
Pure as dew-drops from the lids of morn,
Hearts like theirs to every true emotion
Vibrate, brim'd with love, unscar'd by scorn.

What more beautiful, when dawn of summer
Opens softly bright the gates of rest,
Than a girl of ours, a sweet new-comer,
Fresh and fragrant from her maiden nest?

How she brightens all the breakfast-table!
How her loving looks, serenely gay,
Wield a magic influence, to enable
Men to meet the troubles of the day!

Younger creatures gladly round her gather,
Seek a sister's smile, a sister's kiss;
Tears may dim the eyelids of a father
Who can call so sweet a daughter his.

There shall come to her love's passionate idyl:
Come new hopes, new dreams, a stronger life;
Through the portals of a joyous bridal
May she pass, to be a perfect wife.

Strew white roses! scatter snowy favors!
She is happy in her flowers of youth,
Pressed to one true heart that never wavers,
Kissed by lips that never spake untruth.

Whom she loves shall deem the world worth winning—
Naught like love can make men's pulses stir:
She shall aid him well from the beginning—
Blest with boys like him, and girls like her.

Thus does Reno sketch the English maiden—
Fairest, purest, of the world's fair flowers;
Though the air with cynic trash is laden,
Firm our faith in this sweet girl of ours.

"THEIRS."

Theirs! Could England ever know so dire a
Fate for its young budding womanhood
As to find for model the hetaira—
In her wickedest and fastest mood?

Faith, the problem of the time is toughish
When they ask us to despise what's pure;
When the moral is considered muffish,
When strict virtue no one can endure.

Hear what says the gentlemanly journalist:
Woodland of Saint John, and Pimlico
Just explore, and you shall quickly learn a list
Of the female fashions as they go.

Dresses dropt 'neath palpitating shoulders—
Dresses raised to show the moulded knee:
Thus these girls of theirs attract beholders,
Careless what bewitched beholders see.

'Tis ANONYMA who sets the fashion:
Emulous of her these maidens are.
Each is smitten with an eager passion
To appear, at least, a fallen star.

Impulses of secret subtle sin burn
These young creatures, if the tale be true;
And they love salacious songs of SWINBURNE,
Prurience of the Saturday Review.

Of their modesty remains no relic at Close inspection; and we see that they Have a dainty delicate indelicate
Essayist, to show the wicked way.

He (or is it she?) would lead them merrily
Where vile vanities voluptuous dwell:
Ah, the world's wise King has told us, verily,
Folly's guests are in the depths of hell.

Oh these scribblers, utterly uncleanly,
Sedulous sowers of the Fiend's own tares!
Ours shall live pure lives, and die serenely:
God save girls from life or death of theirs!

FACETIÆ.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Cackler—A term only applicable to female poultry.

Cajoler—A powerful arm allowed too often to rust after marriage.

Calf—Padding my dear. A part of the stocking trade.

Calts to make—The eleventh commandment.

Canter—Two hours' hard gallop on the high road.

Carress—An expensive luxury.

Change—The subject.

Chop—A roast leg of mutton at lunch.

Church—In the city, the Sunday concert. In the country, quiet digestion.

Chair—A lovely hand driven to extremities.

Chorismen—When young, an excellent substitute for the military; when old, a necessary accompaniment to wedding-cake.

Coffin—A private box we are all presented with when the curtain rises on eternity.

Color—A charm given by Nature in the country and sold by Art in the metropolis.

Compan—The shades of evening.

Compliment—An involuntary recognition of merit.

Confession—A trap to catch a sunbeam. The ray renders darker what is left concealed.

A WONDROUS DEATH.—An editor recently alleged the following as the cause of the death of a lady: "The autopsy revealed extensive cardiac disease, hypertrophy complicated with aneurism of the aorta just below its bifurcation." The deceased lady's husband was almost driven mad in trying to comprehend the real cause of death, when a doctor stepped in and saved his sanity by considerably telling him it was heart disease.

THE FATTED CALF.—"Come home, my son," said a parent to one who had been absent from home for some time; "come home, and your mother will kill the fatted calf for you." "Tell her not to do it, father," replied the offspring; "for I have lived on veal ever since I've been here. Tell her to kill a quarter of a pig instead."

CONDENSED METHUSELAH.—The Rev. Dr. Chapin says that a man living amidst the activities of the nineteenth century is a condensed Methuselah.

WANTED.—A pair of spectacles to suit the eyes of potatoes. The club with which an idea struck the poet. A stick to measure narrow escapes. The identical hook and line with which an angler caught a cold. An umbrella used in the reign of tyrants. A knot from the board a man paid fifty dollars a week for.

QUESTIONABLE GRATITUDE.—A gentleman on leaving an hotel, where he had been stopping several days, rewarded the attention of an obliging servant with a gratuity. "Ah!" said the grateful Pat, "long may your Honor live, and may I make your fires hereafter!"

AGRICULTURAL NOTE.—A friend of ours who is devoted to his plants tells us that he is convinced that certain flowers of his acquaintance are called "Sinners" because they are such sinners in the matter of bringing green-fly into the conservatory.

LEAP-YEAR LAW.—In the ancient Saxon law it is enacted: "Albeit, as often as leape yearre dothe occurre, the woman holdeth prerogative over the manne in matter of courtshippe, love, and matrimonie; so that when the ladye proposeth it shall not be lawful for the manne to say her nae, but shall entertaine her proposall in all gude courtesie." That law is supposed to be still in force.

A half-witted fellow recently joined the "army of the Lord," at the solicitation of an eloquent basist, and then coolly asked for his bounty.

THE OLDEST LADY OF TITLE—Old Lady Day.

WHAT TO STUDY WHEN WRITING A SEA SONG—The Mariners' Compass.

System is a great thing; but the advertiser who deemed it essential to preserve an alphabetical order overdid the matter, thus: "Bibles, black-ball, and butter; testaments, tar, and treacle; Godly books and gimlets, for sale here."

"THIS LITTLE PIG WENT TO MARKET."

THE scene which our artist has so charmingly depicted in the accompanying illustration we feel sure will be recognized as a familiar one by every mother in the land; for what child has not been inducted by his maternal parent into the history of the various fates of sundry young members of the porcine race? In the picture before us the beautiful young mother, who is bending with a thoughtful face over the baby, has evidently got no further than the adventures of the first little pig who went to market, to which the chubby child is listening with an equally intent expression. In due time will come the story of his brother who staid at home; of the next little pig who got roast-beef, and of the other who got none; until, finally, the last little pig is reached, and at his cry of Wee! Wee! where the orthodox laugh comes in, the features of mother and child will expand in unison in a burst of merriment very hard to be accounted for on logical principles, but quite natural to all who are familiar with that wonder-book, "Mother Goose's Melodies," so dear to the hearts of children, and so full of wisdom, withal, to all who know how to translate the somewhat involved oracles of the good old lady. We have heard it averred, indeed, that a quotation to suit most mundane events can be found, in case of need, in the pages of Mother Goose almost as well as in those of the great bard of Avon.

A VEXED QUESTION.

VERY few women have been taught, or are intuitively gifted with the knowledge of what they should exact or expect from men in the matter of social expenses. Most women seem to think that any man, from a transient acquaintance to a valued friend, should bear any and every expense where ladies are concerned. If a lady meets an acquaintance at the dépot when she is about purchasing her ticket, he volunteers to get it for her, which she rightly permits him to do, but either neglects to reimburse him—because, perhaps, he refuses to receive it, from a mistaken notion of gallantry—or else she forgets it altogether. She might always find some way to inclose it to him, firmly and gently insisting on her right to do so—thus avoiding constant oblations. These small expenses may be trifling in themselves, but they assume gigantic proportions from frequent repetition, and prove of serious inconvenience to many a young man who is obliged to limit his expenses. Young ladies should be taught by their mothers to bear their share of the accidental expenses that occur to them in society, and prevent taxing so heavily their male acquaintances in the matter of carriages, particularly, that are often called in case of rain or accident, the fair recipients giving not a thought to an expenditure on their account that may inconvenience a worthy young man for a time, and perhaps prevent his paying his poor washer-woman for another week. Indeed, if the inciting causes of many of the defalcations of the day were thoroughly probed, it would often be found that the urgent necessity for large sums of ready money needed by those who frequent ladies' society, in order to gratify their tastes or whims, was a moving cause of dishonesty in our cities.

There are many cases, of course, where it is the certain right of a man to bear all the expenses—for instance, when he invites a lady to go to the opera, or a ball and supper; if the lady accepts his invitation all responsibility of the cost rests upon him. But if a lady invites a gentleman to escort her to a party or place of amusement, she should procure the carriage and the tickets, because she asked him for his escort only, and had no right to put him to any expense on her invitation.

Most women seem to be possessed with the mistaken idea that it is not feminine or lady-like to bear a share of the expenses unexpectedly entailed upon a man: but it is really the only dignified and womanly course to pursue, refusing to be placed under obligations of a pecuniary nature, unless it is to a friend of long standing and of ample means whom we know can not be embarrassed by the expenditure. Many a desirable young man, who has his own way to make, and perhaps is obliged to assist the loved ones at home, is compelled to withdraw himself from the pleasure and protection of ladies' society in these days, solely from the reasons described.—He never knows how the expenses of the week will be magnified if he allows himself the luxury of disporting himself among the dear creatures he so much admires. Lest, therefore, an extra demand on his purse should prevent him from sending some necessary article to mother or sister, he withdraws from all danger of being carried off proper soundings, and associates with his male acquaintance, or else becomes, unhappily for him, a recluse, if not a misanthrope.

Circumstances alter cases in these affairs as well as in the other events of life, and both men and women should have the moral courage to gauge correctly the proper liabilities of each; but when we see mothers who have known their own sons to be desperately in need of five dollars, thoughtlessly allowing young men to purchase their tickets for traveling or amusements, how can it be expected that their daughters will show more consideration for the rights of men not to be involuntarily and unexpectedly taxed by them on every side?

"THIS LITTLE PIG WENT TO MARKET."—[DRAWN BY L. W. ATWATER.]

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1868.

We shall shortly begin the publication in HARPER'S BAZAR of a New Serial, of intense interest, by FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, Esq., which will be sure to command the admiration and eager attention of our readers.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A COLD.

WE have all suffered from what is called a cold in the head, and are familiar with its obvious causes and effects. A more intimate knowledge of an ailment which, though not dangerous, is, from its frequency and inconvenience, very annoying, may be of advantage in aiding us to avoid its attacks.

The chief seat of a cold in the head or catarrh is the delicate membrane which lines the nose. This, when first affected, becomes so swollen from the distension of its blood-vessels as to obstruct the passages through the nostrils, and produces the disagreeable sense of stuffiness, so familiar to us all. Subsequently the watery part of the blood is forced out from the distended veins and arteries, and, washing away the thin layer of membrane which covers them, flows forth in that continued stream of fluid which is not the least annoying symptom of the ordinary cold in the head. As the nose communicates directly by open passages with the eyes, ears, and mouth, and the same membrane lines them, they all become more or less disordered simultaneously. Thus, with the stuffing and running of the nose, there is irritation and weeping of the eyes, dryness of the mouth, huskiness of the throat, and ringing and deafness of the ears.

The usual exciting cause of a catarrh is the application of cold to the body. The mucous membrane which lines the interior of the whole human frame is continuous with, and similar in structure to, the skin which covers the exterior; and so intimate is the sympathy between the two that what affects the one is sure to affect the other. Thus, when cold is applied to the skin its vessels shrink, and their blood is driven back upon the mucous membrane, whose veins and arteries, being easily distensible, receive this additional supply until, swollen and overflooded, inflammation and its consequences are produced. Cold, however partially applied, not only reduces the temperature of the particular part it touches, but that of all the body. Thus a wet foot will chill the whole skin, and inflame, in consequence, the entire mucous membrane.

There is little to be done by medical art for the cure of an ordinary cold in the head. An entire abstinence from fluids of all kinds, or a full dose of morphia, will, it is said, cure an attack of catarrh in less than twenty-four hours. But these remedies are worse than the disease. The best means of treatment are the domestic gruel and hot water, with careful home nursing.

Much can be done, however, in preventing this disorder, and diminishing the liability to it. The blood-vessels of the skin can be so strengthened as to be made proof against the effects produced by ordinary exposure to cold. Benjamin Franklin's plan was to take what he called an air-bath, which he did by sitting for some time without his clothes, on getting up in the morning. A safer plan, however, is to sponge the whole body daily with cold water. This practice should be universally adopted, and it will be found not only a preventive of colds, but of more serious ailments. It will be more prudent for those who have hitherto neglected this universal cold washing not to begin it until the summer, or if they do so in the winter, to commence with water with its chill taken off. The brisk rubbing with a rough towel is an indispensable part of the process.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Friend upon her Engagement to a Clergyman.

MY DEAR LUCINDA,—I offer you my congratulations upon your engagement with all my heart, and I delight equally in your love and heroism. Perhaps you are conscious only of the love, and do not understand what I mean by heroism. Indeed, you may be somewhat inclined to resent the use of the word, and challenge me to explain in what consists the heroism of marrying the Reverend Lucas Merriweather. I hasten to excuse myself, and to explain. I am an old observer of life, as you know, dear Lucinda, and you will not deny that I have a tolerably intimate if not accurate knowledge of you and your career. Now then, let us look at it, and tell me whether I ought to apologize to you for speaking of heroism. Well, as I raise my eyes, and look out of the window this soft spring morning, and resolve that before dinner I will stroll in the ramble of the Central Park, and mark the gold of the willow green, and the tender shoots of the lilacs, and the swelling blossom-buds of the cherries, ready to open in a night into perfect flower; as I feel the warm blood again quickened in my veins by the eternal old magic, and sit holding my pen and dreaming of "the light that never was on land or sea," and all that it has revealed, and all that it shines upon no more forever—why, bless me, Lucinda! I forget all about heroines, and heroes, and heroism, and I can think only of youth, and spring, and love—of tenderness, and beauty, and flowers.

But when I resolve to be myself heroic, and to think of such things no longer, but of the business I now have in hand, then I perceive that you, dear girl, are something of a heroine, and I will tell you why. You are young: you are—I said it only yesterday to Mr. Peter Paul Pry—you are a rose-bud, and your papa and mamma, and all your family connection, are very ambitious. That is the phrase we use. It means that, thinking you worthy to marry a prince, a prince you should marry. Now it is true that we don't have princes in New York; at least technical princes; although I doubt if Prince Alfred, or Prince Arthur, or the Prince of Wales feels a more princely elation, and—if I may say so—high-steppingness, than my young friends Tom Ruby, Jack Pearly, and Ned Turquoise. Their grandfathers, indeed, I remember. Their majesties were in various respectable callings. They sold tape and pork, and they cobbled shoes and made clothes; most worthy potentates, all of them. But their royal splendor is a little posthumous. They were—if their royal highnesses Tom, and Jack, and Ned will pardon it to a leveling old bachelor—they were toiling, scraping, hard-fisted old fellows, who made handsome fortunes which they shrewdly invested, and left to their descendants. Tom's hereditary principality is below the Park, Ned's up Broadway, Jack's on Murray Hill. And these princes are Asiatic; they are lavish scatterers. Old King Matthew Ruby, and Jacob Pearly, and Timothy Turquoise must groan sometimes upon their celestial thrones, as they see how the princes, their serene descendants, make the mare go.

However, I am digressing. You see it is so pleasant to talk familiarly of royalty! And if pleasant to talk of it, think what it must be—to marry royalty! Have you not read in the late morning papers the telegram that throbbed all over the world—the transcendent fact—that "the marriage of Prince Humbert, the heir-presumptive of the King of Italy, with the Princess Margaret, his cousin, took place to-day at the Chapel Royal in Turin? King Victor Emanuel, the Crown Prince Frederick William of Prussia, Prince Napoleon, and the Princess Marie Clotilde, and a great many Italian notables were present." I should like to know what well-regulated mouth does not water over that paragraph? How many girls do you not know, your friends and companions, the Tilburys, the Stanhopes, the Pounds, the Hundredweights, who would willingly, gladly, "unsight, unseen," as the boys say in swapping, have exchanged places with the Princess Margaret, his cousin! We know nothing of these good people, except their rank; and very probably we never shall. But we agree that they have drawn prizes. They are princes and princesses, and that is enough for any reasonable human creature. Ask Mrs. Tilbury. What happiness illuminated the American house of Stanhope when Miss Serena was betrothed to the fascinating Count de Jambé-Noire, a son of one of the oldest houses in Europe!

Now, my dear Lucinda, your parents have carefully educated you in this royal society. They have not indeed shown you, from the back-window, Tilbury in his stable-yard zealously, by practical example, teaching his footman how to mount and dismount from the carriage; but they have shown you how highly they esteem the honor of his acquaintance, and how fine a thing they think it to be invited to his suppers and breakfasts, his—that is to say—and Mrs. Tilbury's. Your world has been the Tilbury world, for which thousands and thousands of dear little Lucy Jessamines in the country so pitifully sigh. Your social standards have been the Pound and the Hundredweight standards. The ideal of love around you—out of novels—has been "a brilliant match." For love, as well as all other things, has been measured about you by money. You have been to the fashionable church, clad in fashionable clothes. You have been surrounded by the marvelous web of sophistry and helplessness, in which so many a clever woman is entangled: and Mrs. Grundy has been raised before your eyes as the goddess whom all truly sensible people ought to worship.

What was so natural as that your papa and mamma should have cherished the brightest hopes for such an only daughter as my dear Lucinda? All that money and skill and devotion could do to make you the most accomplished and charming young person in society has been done. My dear, you waltz as Violet May used to dance, as many of the girls of my time danced, before waltzing was universal. In my time we danced quadrilles. We stepped about in a bashful way, and looked as unconcerned and unconscious as we could. Pigeon-wings had passed—except in the case of my brother-in-law's great-uncle, Methuselah Smith. Great Heavens! how he cut pigeon-wings! I say, you waltz perfectly, you speak French—to ravish, as the French would say. You speak German and Italian. My dear, you read the literature of those languages. You are skilled in all plain and ornamental work. You could take this very Number of the Bazar and cut and trim and make these various lovely garments; and they would not only be correctly done, but they would be done with what Mr. Peter Paul Pry calls perfect chique: a word which he picked up in Paris, and which he insists is old Montaigne's que-sais-je? applied to the effect of dress. And you can cook. You can prepare a beef-steak to a turn; your bread is positively aerated; and I sincerely believe that you could toss an omelette with Monsieur Blot. How shall I continue? To describe your capacities is as delightful as writing a poem. And, with all this, you have the traditional manner of a high-bred lady, blended of dignity, grace, and sweetness. Your toilette is the envy, it is the despair, of Mesdames Tilbury and Stanhope, of Mademoiselles Pound and Hundredweight. Even the Wasps do not molest you. Lucinda, why were you not named Helen?

I am not surprised that your parents of course long ago married you in their minds—not to Tom Ruby or Jack Pearly or Ned Turquoise; no, no, I should hope not, but to his Imperial and Royal Highness, Prince Henry Diamond. Unquestionably he is "the most brilliant match" which Providence has lately vouchsafed to the Tilbury circles of human society. He is the heir of all the Diamonds: a pleasant, irreproachable fellow. What could be so natural, so becoming? It was Heaven-appointed, and Mrs. Grundy would bless the bans. The whole world expected it. It was Capulet and Montague. It was as good as concluded in the minds of your worthy parents. And suddenly society was struck with the desolating news of your engagement to the Reverend Lucas Merriweather. "It isn't possible—it isn't conceivable," exclaimed the Tilbury chorus, "that Lucinda Knickerbocker is going to marry a Methodist minister!" As for Tom, and Jack, and Ned, they could only say, "Well, that is jolly!" As for H. I. and R. H., he looked as unconscious as he could. As for your most humble servant, he returned to his tranquil lodgings, and, ascending to his room and carefully closing the door, he gave three times three and one more for his good friend Lucinda.

I congratulate you with all my heart for helping to restore traditions of humanity and common-sense to the social world in which you live. What does a woman or a man live for? Having settled that, how can they so worthily, truly, helpfully live as with the one whom they worthily, truly, and helpfully love? Lucas is a minister; an earnest, devoted, refined, educated man. He happens to be so; but suppose he were merely an earnest, honorable, devoted man whom you loved with your whole heart—isn't that enough? He must travel, perhaps; it is the rule of his order. Very well; so must a soldier, and when your cousin Agnes married Colonel Trotaway, every body thought it was a highly distinguished match. Isn't a spiritual soldier as good as the other kind? If it is a fine thing to marry a man whose business is to kill people's bodies, is it a bad thing to marry one whose business is to save their souls? Come, I make no comparisons. I do not say, for I do not think, that soldiers are but another name for murderers. But I know many a minister who is a hero and a saint. Throw in the poor ones too. The profession is not exceptional, and, perhaps, fares no better than Law or Medicine. But the story of this particular class of them, from John and Charles Wesley down, is hardly less striking a chapter of religious history than that of the Jesuits, of whom so much is said, and of whom so many cherish a profound admiration.

You have chosen one of them. Lucky Lucas! Yet see how exquisitely all your accomplishments will come into play. If you had been content to be merely a doll, to be clothed from Paris, and trundled upon soft carriage cushions, to have smattered French, and wondered what a kitchen is; if you had spent your whole soul upon the last style, and bought your bonnets instead of making them; if you were not familiar with the best books and with current literature, and had really no interest beyond the Tilbury and Stanhope rut; and if, under such circumstances, you had happened to hear the Reverend Lucas and to fall in love with him, what a miserable fate matrimony would have been for both of you! And, Lucinda, although there are many personal allusions in this letter, and certain compliments to you which you may not care to disclose—although I say they are not mere compliments but truths—yet I wish you would nevertheless show it to a select number of your young friends for one moral observation which I am now about to make—and it begins here. Dear young ladies, companions of Lucinda, the great fact of life is, that we know not with whom we may fall in love. Yet with whomsoever it may be, that is the person whom we naturally wish to marry. Now there may be impediments in him; but is it not the very flower of wisdom to take care that there shall be none in us? Yet if we cultivate expensive habits, if we make a certain display essential to our happiness, if we suffer our hands to be paralyzed so that they can really do nothing, if we allow our minds to rust, if we expect to do nothing but marry an Imperial and Royal Highness of any of the great houses of Diamond, Ruby, or Turquoise, and then to have every thing done for us—do you not see that we wall ourselves in, that we build a hundred barriers between ourselves and our possible happiness, which may one day abruptly appear in the form of some Reverend Lucas Merriweather. If you are determined to marry a Diamond—very well! I'm sorry for you. If you are resolved to marry a man, learn from our dear Lucinda how to prepare for your marriage day!

What a hopeless old preacher it is, my dear Lucinda, who turns a bride into a text! Give my love to Lucas, happy fellow!

Your (innocent) adorer,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

STYLES FOR CHILDREN.

THE simplicity of attire once considered necessary and becoming to children is fast being lost sight of. The tiny garments worn by the infant in the cradle attract attention by their richness, and elaborate costumes are copied in all their intricate details for the wee young folks who have arrived at the dignity of short clothes. The Watteau over-skirt festooned at the sides, the Pompadour waist, the Marie Antoinette fichu, and other distinguishing features of the styles now prevalent are adopted by juvenile costumers.

INFANTS' CLOTHING.

In infants' robes there is nothing new to relate. French Nansook muslin and sheer Victoria lawn are the soft materials preferred. For very handsome robes Valenciennes lace with appliqué needle-work medallions and insertions are appropriate trimmings, and are capable of being arranged in various ways. An elegant christening-robe just completed is of sheer muslin a yard and a quarter long. The entire front is formed of Valenciennes medallions, on which is a rose-bud and leaves. Around the lace is a narrow band of insertion bordered with fluted Valenciennes edging. The large medallions formed in this way are placed in diagonal rows, alternating with small appliqué hexagons. Valenciennes a finger's length wide surrounds the skirt. The sleeves and waist are entirely of lace. Blue satin, placed under the lace to show the design, can be removed at pleasure.

Narrow box-pleated ruffles needle-worked at the edge in scallops form a pretty trimming for plainer robes. The scalloped edge is the simplest button-hole stitch, and may be embroidered at home in moments of leisure with but little expense. It is much prettier when put on in box-pleats instead of gathers, and is more easily ironed. The Hamburg embroidery, which is done by machinery, is used for infants' petticoats. It is scarcely dainty enough for outside wear. Shell-like ruffles, narrow puffs, diamonds, and medallions of tiny tucks, feather stitching and braiding, with fine needle-work, describe the whole range of trimmings suitable for robes.

For night slips and ordinary day dresses two straight widths of muslin a yard long are gathered into a rounded yoke without a seam on the shoulder. This yoke forms a kind of epaulet over the long sleeve, and fits the neck smoothly. Hamburg insertion and narrow thread edging are substantial trimmings for slips. Soft-finished percale is pleasant for infants' wear, and physicians have advised that it be used instead of linen. Flannel skirts are embroidered above a wide hem, or are slightly scalloped or vandyked at the edge. Hems and tucks are wrought in feather stitch. Piqué and Marseilles cloaks are worn for summer. They are made with two large capes and small collar. Embroidery is the most suitable trimming. One shown us at $30 was of corded piqué. The upper cape was almost covered with embroidery. Babies' bonnets are quite as large as those worn by their mammams, and are prettiest when made of Valenciennes lace with shell rosettes, or leaves of silk, forming small coronets.

SHORT CLOTHES.

The muslin and lawn short clothes donned at five or six months are frequently fashioned out of the long robes then to be discarded. After this comes the piqué, a favorite material, because it both washes and wears well. The white is preferred, but it comes in light, delicate shades of fawn color and gray. The corded pattern so much sought after is sold at seventy-five cents a yard. Piqués are shown as low as fifty cents and as high as $2. Colored braids, white braid dotted with a color, white fringes, and embroidery are the trimmings. Dresses for girls are gored to fit tight at the waist in the Princesses style. For boys they should be gored loosely and worn with a belt. They are lapped on the breast or buttoned down the front in a bias line. A pretty walking coat for a child that has just learned to walk is of white Marseilles. The waist is plain and loose and buttoned in front. The skirt is slightly gored. A drawing-string in the belt adjusts it to the waist. A large round cape with collar is worn over this. The cape, skirt, and sleeves are embroidered. Price $24. A piqué suit for a boy of four years has a gored skirt trimmed with blue and white braids in loops, and a cut-away jacket with lappets at the back. A loose blouse, also of piqué, is belted in. The skirt is cut at the edge in sharp points, like saw-teeth, and bound with black.

For larger girls French poplin and summer silks are selected for dress occasions. Street suits with redingote and belt are made of blue, gray, and green poplins. Fancy dresses of check silks are trimmed with narrow frills of solid-colored silk to match the deepest shade in the check.

An imported suit for a girl of six years is marked $25. It is of steel-gray poplin. There are two gored skirts; the upper one is festooned at the sides in the Watteau style. Each skirt is trimmed with a narrow frill of steel-colored silk edged with fringe. The body is low and square with short sleeves, and is to be worn over a chemise Russe, or habit-shirt of tucked muslin, trimmed with embroidery and lace. A tiny fichu scarcely three inches wide in the back is ruffled like the skirts and worn over the dress, crossed in front and hanging down behind. Percales, brilliants, and calicoes for everyday wear are made into Gabrielles, and corded up each seam. If yoke waists are preferred the yoke reaches almost to the belt in a point in front, and is finished with a narrow ruffle. A plain gored dress of Marseilles, marked $7, has an economical but effective trimming. It is bordered by a black worsted braid, such as is used for skirt binding, with a row of scarlet serpentine braid on each edge of the black.

The chemise Russe, or blouse waist, not so loose as the Garibaldi, is serviceable and pretty. The trimming should pass over the shoulders down to the belt, both back and front. When made of Nansook muslin and simply trimmed with a box-pleat of Irish linen stitched on in the centre, the edges loose, it is inexpensive and becoming for school wear, and renders available the skirts of dresses that have outworn the waists originally made with them.

For dress occasions lace and embroidery are lavished upon the chemise Russe. Fancy bretelles of black velvet, or of blue and scarlet, edged with lace, are graceful additions to a girl's toilette. These should always be basted on to the corsage, as they are apt to slip off the shoulders if left loose. Little sleeveless jackets of Irish linen give variety to children's attire. They are trimmed with a narrow fluted ruffle of linen cambric, and are worn over solid colored organ-dies and brilliants. Linen and cambric aprons are fancifully made with bibs and gored skirts, with long strings at the waist forming sashes.

The round hats most in favor are turned up on one side and faced with velvet or satin. Another style is the flat Japanese shape, with the rim trimmed with narrow velvet, like rays diverging from the centre. Straw turbans and a regular cap with visor of knots of ribbon, are ornamented with tulle sashes or grenadine, put around the crown in loose puffs, and hanging down as a veil. A water-proof hat, resembling white chip, is useful for school wear, as it is not defaced by the weather.

BOYS' SUITS.

Spring suits for boys are made of the fancy cassimeres, of Canada gray, and blue Melton, and of black and Bismarck velveteen. For summer suits there are black and white checked velveteens, and the light opera flannels, white grounds with a diamond pattern of black and blue stripes. Scotch tweed of open texture, yet very durable, is brought out in fancy colors in suits for very small boys.

The clothing-houses show five distinct styles of suits for boys of from three to nine years. The "Bismarck" we have already described. The "Young America" is simply a Garibaldi waist with a pointed belt on the Zouave trousers, and is intended for everyday use. The "Ben Franklin," plain and Quakerish, has a round-about, with a separate vest made high at the throat without a collar. The "Boulevard," more fanciful, has a rolling collar to display the shirt front; and the dressy "Prince Imperial" has wide revers at the neck and small vest buttoned to the jacket. Zouave trousers, with elastic or buckles at the knee, are worn with jackets of every style. The trimming extends up the outer seam, and is usually a band of bias velvet studded with steel buttons, or a pattern of machine embroidery, or two rows of silk binding braid. Of all the suits mentioned the Bismarck is the most popular. The loose outside belt, fastened at the back by a steel pin, is considered advantageous, as it can be easily altered to any size. The spring Bismarcks are cut with double-breasted fronts, lapping toward the right, yet forming a centre line of buttons. The collar is pointed in the Shakespeare style.

A Prince Imperial suit of black velveteen is trimmed over the shoulders and at the sides of the trousers with a fold of piece velvet, a rich brown shade, studded with steel buttons. The price ready-made is $24. A Bismarck suit of dark blue Melton, is cut double-breasted, and trimmed with a black silk braid, and gilt buttons with a blue star enameled in the centre. The pin at the back of the belt is made to match the buttons. Price $18. An imported Highland costume attracted attention by the richness of its material. The jacket and Glengarry cap were of black Lyons velvet, and the skirt and scarf, of silk poplin, a gay Highland plaid. The belt and pouch and the plaid stockings are also shown. The price is $60.

For older boys there are neat suits of gray cassimere and of black broadcloth, made with short cut-away jackets, vests with plain fronts or with rolling collars, and regular close-fitting pantaloon. Negligée shirts are made of lawn and cambric with hair-line stripes of purple, black, and pink, the lines wide apart. These are more stylish than the small dots and diamond patterns. Irish linen doubled with a row of embroidery down the front, or of hem-stitching and tiny tucks, is preferred to diagonal tucks and ruffles for dress shirts.

SUMMER BONNETS.

An opening of summer millinery at a leading house discloses to us bonnets of new shapes entirely different from those displayed at the early openings. One style is simply a flat crown, differing from the Metternich of the spring in that it is shaped to the head, and fits over the chignon. A quilling of lace, ribbon, and flowers forms a tiara that projects like the vizor of a cap. Another shape has a fanchon front and sides with deep Marie Stuart point on the forehead, but fits squarely over the chignon. This is exceedingly stylish when made in chip, which promises to be in high favor this summer. Still another style is the Watteau, an illustration of which we gave in last week's Bazar. It is intended to accompany street suits, and is made of the material of the suit, or of silk and ribbon of one color. It is a regular bonnet, with every thing that appertains thereto except a curtain. The lace drapery given in our illustration is only used with very dressy suits.

A French model from which the Watteaus are copied is silk of pale Mexican blue, a shade very fashionable in Paris. The foundation is concealed by ruches of silk, notched at the edges. The coronet is flat, and made of loops of ribbon caught up to form shells. A bandeau of gilt, studded with steel in a Greek pattern, is over the coronet. An aigrette of black and white feathers is directly in the centre. This bonnet is worn very far forward, and with a high chignon. The strings are covered with ruches and held together low down on the breast by a half-moon bow. The price is $30; but it is imitated precisely in steel-colored silk of as good quality, and ornamented with a purple velvet pansy instead of feathers, and sold for $18.

A lovely chip bonnet all black and white is flat and round. Loops of thick white satin form a visor, with a band of cut jet between. Tufts of black and white ostrich feathers are on the left side. A fold of white satin as thick as piping is covered with black lace, which forms a drapery at the back, falling into strings in front. A rosette bow of satin with fringed ends holds the strings. An elastic cord under the chignon keeps the bonnet secure. This stylish coiffure is worn with colors, but is also suitable for light mourning. It is imported, and the price is $50.

Another chip bonnet, also suitable for half mourning, is of the fanchon and Marie Stuart shape described above. Large violets of the deepest purple shade in which that flower is seen are massed together in front on the deep point over the forehead. The drapery at the back is of the finest Chantilly lace, and is in one piece with the long barbes that form strings. A cluster of violets at the throat. This is also French, and $50.

Carriage bonnets of transparent Malines and frosted crape, so aerial and light that they are scarcely tangible enough for description, are made for midsummer and watering-place wear. One that met with special admiration is of white Malines with a trimming of delicate pearl leaves on a gilt stem. The tiara and lace strings are covered with a slender vine of these fragile ornaments. Another is of white crape flecked with tiny specks that glitter like diamonds. The material is laid on the foundation in narrow folds or tucks from the back to the front. The diadem is of blonde lace arranged in shells, over which are branches of white hyacinth made of wax, and a marvelous imitation of nature. The blonde lace fall at the back is brought forward to form strings.

On bridal bonnets the clematis and spirae are heaped in masses on the front; apple and cherry blossoms, sparkling with moisture as if just washed by a shower, nestle amidst snowy flakes of downy marabouts; and tiny stalks of the lily of the valley droop gracefully over the lace coronet.

The French bonnet, after which the new round shapes are modeled, is of chip with a quilling of corn-colored satin in front. A fall of satin covered with black lace six inches deep drapes the chignon, is brought forward for strings, crossed over on the breast like a fichu, and is knotted behind below the waist, where it falls into long sash ends.

A butter-cup colored crape is almost covered on top with long thin grasses of a Metternich green color, while scarlet poppies droop over the back hair. That this may not look gaudy the whole bonnet is covered with a coiffure of black lace of very thin Chantilly, which softens the bright colors that it half conceals, half discloses. Small ornaments of cut steel and gilt are pendent from every point of the lace. Innumerable loops of ribbon form a tiara, in the centre of which is a butterfly of steel and gilt. The lace barbes of the coiffure form strings.

A blue illusion for a young girl has a three-cornered fall at the back, bordered with quilling. The whole frame is covered with quilled illusion. In front is a cluster of moss-rose buds. Price $15.

An attractive bonnet from the Maison Laure, Paris, is a Marie Antoinette of English straw. The face trimming is a quilling of thick black silk, above a Metternich green silk band, on which is a Greek border of gilt. On the outside, along the rim, are branches of metallic leaves of a light yellow-green that look very frail, but will bend without breaking. A large crimson rose, with buds and tendrils, droops from the left side. The peculiarity of this stylish bonnet consists in a bag crown of black tulle, in which the chignon is to be placed. Below this crown is wide lace drapery, open in the centre. Price $45.

Simplicity and plainness are studied for mourning bonnets. For fresh mourning we were shown English crape fitted plainly over the frame, with narrow folds or quilling for a tiara. Two wider folds fall from the back and extend along the sides, forming strings. A kind of bag for the waterfall that entirely conceals the hair is made for those who desire it. Veils are made double of the crape a yard and a quarter long, and gathered with a string at one end. If long veils are preferred they are pinned on at the sides with jet ornaments, and each end is finished with a hem three-eighths of a yard deep. When selecting crape for a veil it is best to get the crape that comes in rolls. That folded in boxes has a crease formed in the middle which comes directly in the centre of the face. Widows' caps do not surround the whole face, but form a tiara over the forehead.

PERSONAL.

THE Rt. Rev. CICERO S. HAWKS, recently deceased at the age of 55, was one of the oldest bishops in the American P. E. Church, having been consecrated Oct. 24, 1844. He was the youngest person ever advanced to the Episcopate in this country, and probably younger than any one ever consecrated in the Church of England, having barely reached the age prescribed by the canon. So young, indeed, was he and inexperienced, that several bishops declined on that account to sign his testimonials—among them the late Bishop DE LANCEY. At the time of his death there were only nine who stood above him on the roll of bishops; and in the course of nature there was every probability that he would become, at no distant day, presiding bishop of the P. E. Church in the United States. While rector of Trinity Church, Buffalo, he, in connection with his brother, the late Dr. F. L. HAWKS, wrote the story-books entitled "Uncle Philip's Histories," published by HARPER & BROTHERS.

To state, deliberately, that Chicago editors are devoid of reason or wit, would be a—we will not say a "lie," but would be, in politer phrase, "conspicuously inexact"—for one of these people recently wrote and published in a paper which he keeps, that one-half of the musical people who attend Opera in that city "don't know the difference between a symphony and a sardine."

Purchasers of the various publications daily issued from the establishment of HARPER & BROTHERS will not forget what was said by POPP in his old age: "As much company as I have kept, and as much as I love it, I love reading better; I would rather be employed in reading than in the most agreeable conversation."

Mr. C. F. CHICKERING (we suppose he must have the prefix of "Sir," or "Chevalier," or some such aristocratic title) has just returned from France, and may at certain hours of the day be contemplated in his lordly halls in Broadway, just above Bleecker. He bears his "Cross" with becoming humility and resignation.

After Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS had responded for the "Weeklies" at the Dickens dinner, Mr. DICKENS remarked: "He is one of the best, if not the best speaker I ever heard."

The rumor so unjustly originated by a Chicago paper, that the widow of Mr. CHARLES DICKENS's brother was living in indigent circumstances in Chicago, has been summarily disposed of by the London correspondent of a Boston paper, who says that the lady in question "is in England, in feeble health, and without the use of her sight; but in her many misfortunes she has found every aid that practical sympathy can afford at the hands of her eminent relative."

The Rev. Dr. McNEILE is one of the leading members of the "Church Association" in England, which has already raised £37,000 toward a guarantee fund of £50,000 to defray legal expenses in defending the position of the Established Church against the Ritualists.

THOMAS D'ARCY M'GEE's memory should be held in grateful remembrance by every wife for the exquisite lines he wrote to his "Irish wife," of which the following is the concluding verse:

My Irish wife has clear blue eyes,
My heaven by day, my stars by night,
And twin-like truth and fondness lie
Within her swelling bosom white;
My Irish wife has golden hair—
Apollo's harp had once such strings—
Apollo's self might pause to hear
Her bird-like carol when she sings.

That bad Lord WILLOUGHBY D'ERESBY has been made to pay roundly for his scandalous proceedings toward Madame D'ALTEYRAC, who lived with him many years as his wife, and whom he attempted to cast off. The arbitrator, Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, has awarded to her an annuity of £100 a month for life, and a sum of £5000 down; and the point of it is that there is no appeal from the award. The naughty nobleman is good for the amount.

Avarice is becoming a "good old gentlemanly" vice, as well as a disreputable one in the other gender. What are we to say about Mrs. CLARISSA MILLS, who recently died, at 57, in Concord? Her effects, sold at auction, consisted of 360 pairs of stockings, 110 towels, 65 bedquilts, all pieced by herself, 26 night-caps, 535 pieces of glass and crockery, 17 dozen of side and back combs of every conceivable old fashion, and some 50 dresses, among them her wedding-dress of thirty years ago, and in a tin pail, wrapped in innumerable folds of paper, some of her wedding-cake. She was a hard-working, very saving creature, hence so many night-caps and things.

An admirer of the intellectual ability and culture of FREDERICK DOUGLASS says "his style is very perfect—no boisterousness and surcharged vehemence, but calm, clear, logical, and persuasive; luminous in statement, just in discrimination, fair in argumentation, all properly arranged and handsomely expressed, uniting that grace, simplicity, and power so much admired in the present good taste of British oratory." That is about as much as could be said of FREDERICK, or any other individual.

Aren't people living to a greater age than they used to? The writer of this received a note from an octogenarian yesterday, in which it is mentioned that "Col. LEMAN BRADLEY and his wife, each aged eighty, died last week in Pavilion, N. Y., and were buried in one grave. His father is still alive and in health, and if he lives until August next, will be one hundred years old."

The Hon. Mr. STANBURY, one of the President's counsel, is described as a tall, slim man, large nose, high forehead, iron-gray hair, and military side whiskers. He wears a standing collar, old-fashioned enough for the last century, with an immense roll of black silk under it for a cravat. His coat is a loose sack, hanging slouchily from his bony shoulders, and too short in the sleeves, so that his thin hands protrude with fingers like those of a skeleton, dangling down his sides, unseemly and without grace.

Among the names of gentlemen mentioned as likely to be chosen President of the National Convention to be held in Chicago to nominate a President for the next Presidential term, is that of General SICKLES, who is one of the delegates at large from this State.

If what the papers state is true, Miss FANNY HASKELL, of Batavia, New York, must be a wonderful girl. She plays two airs on the piano with her right hand, one with the left, and sings a fourth, all at the same time.

The name of the charming creature is not given who is pronounced to be the belle of Portland, and who (just for the pleasure of the thing, of course) does the cooking for her father and mother, and in the afternoon takes the ribbons and drives out with the finest span of horses in the town, deeming it an honor to be able to go through the little culinary performance.

Since the accession of Mr. DISRAELI to the Premiership, the interest in, and demand for, his novels has so much revived that the library and shilling editions, published by WARNE & Co., London, can not be produced fast enough to supply the public. Mr. DISRAELI is advertised to preside at the 79th anniversary dinner of that excellent and useful charitable society, the Literary Fund.

The Hon. ROBERT LYTTON BULWER, better known by his nom de plume of "Owen Meredith," has been promoted to be Secretary of Legation at Madrid. Nineteen years ago he was at Washington as attaché and private Secretary to his uncle, Sir HENRY BULWER, then British Minister. In due time the young man will probably become a Minister.

A "personal" of Mr. CYRUS W. FIELD, which, if true, is as creditable to him as it was lucky to the other party: In the darkest days of the Atlantic Telegraph enterprise a friend of Mr. F. bought ten thousand dollars' worth of stock for a ten-dollar bill. This investor came to Mr. Field to ask him whether his purchase was worth anything. Mr. FIELD offered to take the stock at a considerable advance. "Well, but what do you advise me to do, Mr. FIELD?" "Take your stock home," was the reply; "look it up in your safe, and never look at it, nor think of it, till you come to me for your dividends on it." That man is now receiving on his investment of ten dollars eight hundred dollars per annum in gold.

Mr. WHITWORTH, the well-known gun manufacturer, has just presented to the British nation £100,000 sterling as a free gift. He proposes to found thirty Scholarships, at a cost of £3000 each, to be held for some years by workmen who will go through a thorough course of scientific and artistic training. He, in fact, proposes to establish thirty Industrial Fellowships, to be obtained by competition in applied science. The gift is a most munificent one, and the Duke of Marlborough has acknowledged it on behalf of the state with sufficient grace. In point of munificence Mr. WHITWORTH comes nearest to Mr. PEABODY of any living millionaire, and his name is already on the lips of the reading people of Christendom.

The Rev. WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON, one of the most eminent Methodist clergymen of England, whose portrait was given in Harper's Weekly of April 4, arrived in New York in the steamer Scotia on the 22d of April. He was present at a meeting held in St. Paul's (M. E.) Church on the evening of the same day, and made a few remarks that evinced the high order of ability for which he is celebrated. On the evening of the 23d he preached a dedicatory sermon in St. John's Church, Brooklyn, and left for Montreal next morning. He is expected to return in a few days, when opportunity will be afforded to listen to his powers as a pulpit orator.

The "woman question" commands more and more of popular attention in England. The prejudice against "lovely woman's" taking responsible positions in public affairs is steadily diminishing. A Mrs. SARAH WOOSTER has just been appointed by the Aylesbury magistrates to the office of overseer of the poor and surveyor of highways for the parish of Ilimire. Last year four women filled similar offices in the Aylesbury district. Mrs. CADY STANTON and her co-laborers may make a note of this.

The last English papers speak of a party of the name of JOACHIM as the first living master of the violin. One enthusiastic writer goes so far as to say that "it is much to be doubted whether so great a violinist ever lived before, most certainly never in the memory of living man. It is not his executive power that excites our astonishment, although in that he is unrivaled; but it is the passion, the poetry, the dramatic force, and intellectual power, the thorough development of his subject, that takes his auditors by storm, and evokes the tempest of applause that always follows his wonderful performances."

Mr. Chief Justice CHASE is thus pleasantly photographed by the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune: "The Chief Justice never gets out of patience, is always pleasant and always wide-awake, and there is nobody connected with the trial that watches it as closely as he does. He is an admirable presiding officer, the only objection to him being the inadequacy of his voice, which has not yet got the compass of the Chamber, but even this is improving. His service on the Supreme Court bench has taught him patience and forbearance. He is never in doubt about a question, is always up with the very last development, and never misunderstands the slightest point in it or omits it. Those who expect to recognize him from the fine picture on the dollar greenbacks will be disappointed. CHASE is still fine-looking—the most imposing personage in the Chamber. Some blockhead doctor, on account of a throat affection, last fall advised the Chief Justice to allow his beard to grow under his chin, and a thick clump of white hair in that region is the result. The friends of the Chief Justice have been looking for that doctor ever since. If he is found, you will hear of another impeachment trial. Whiskers helped LINCOLN's appearance, but they spoil, as much as such trifles can, the face of Mr. CHASE."

The next dramatic celebrity England proposes to export to us is Mrs. SCOTT SIDDONS, a descendant of the great SARAH. She is pronounced to be the cleverest woman on the British boards.

Some enthusiastic person who has been to ROBERT BROWNING's says, "he is the most magnificent specimen of a man I ever saw. His hair is nearly white, and his beard, which is full, is quite so. His step is springy, and his eyes keen as an eagle's."

"SPRING."—[SEE PAGE 453.]

DIAMOND AND EMERALD BRACELET.

SPRING.

THERE are beauties of the spring season which belong to no other period of the year; a wondrous stirring into life—a marvelous indication first, and then a tender development of form and color. The uncertain days and cold, biting nights, the hours of plashing rain and mist, the threatenings of renewed winter, and the half-doubtful gleams that seem but faint illusions of summer, forbid that life in the green-wood which is so lauded in drawing-room ballads. But the hope is never withdrawn; the morning's light dawns tenderly, the sun goes up like a strong man to run a race, and after nightfall, when "the stars rush out," and the moon sails white and ghostly in the clear blue, there are hours for lovers' walks in the broad wooded glades and along the sweet slopes of the country. The time has long passed, it may be feared, when youths and maidens gathered spring posies for each other in the woods and lanes, or pulled off the bright petals to see whether their love would come true—a method scarcely less sure than many others which fashion may have ordained, and, probably, as little to be relied on for securing peace of heart.

Whatever may be the case with lovers, however, they have given up their old spring customs, and we must look to their ancient friends, the birds and the flowers, if we would read the vernal signs. The storks in the northerly countries of Europe do the work of spring's heralds, their great white wings bearing them, who can tell what weary miles, over sea and land, to the nests of twigs, the great wooden boxes, the queer contrivances balanced on old gable-end houses and quaint church steeples. Here the martins and swallows usher in the new-born spring, and build their nests in the kindred homes provided for them, or under the eaves; while other spring birds nestle among the tree-boughs, in the happy confidence that winter is over in good earnest. The bees, too, have a share in the great universal resurrection to life, and add their busy note to the gathering orchestra of praise. It is only in towns that spring seems to have no voice; in the midst of streets where men go on working and hoarding, striving and toiling all the year round and never see a flower. Yet even here, in the heart of busy Gotham, the flower-girls are seen about the street offering bouquets of violets to the passers-by; and even in the shops gay colors creep into the windows, and there is already a humming under-tone of summer coats, light scarfs, and lavender gloves whenever a periodical burst of sunshine reminds us that the young year is growing strong.

DIAMOND AND EMERALD JEWELRY.

THE paragon gem is so fast becoming a general attribute of American fashion that occasional illustrations of the most recent and pleasing styles of displaying its beauties in setting will not be unacceptable to the very large proportion of its wearers who read the Bazar. Our Jenkinses, to be sure, are not yet used to making an item out of "the family diamonds," nor has the American dowager thus far, like her British antetype, been made to suffer the terrible but matter-of-course pang of seeing the brilliant accumulation of generations reset for the fiancée of the house. Society this side the water is not old enough, nor is permanence so far with us a characteristic of family fortunes, as to admit of great individual diamond wealth. Doubtless a larger amount of diamonds is owned in New York than in all the rest of the Union; yet we are quite sure there are not more than three persons resident in the metropolis possessing them to the value of $100,000. The obstacles to such accumulation in the United States are characteristic and quite consistent with the social history of the country. Our system of dividing estates and properties personal is, at the outset, a mortal blow to the "family diamonds" formality. Aside from the want of permanence of individual wealth above suggested, it is likewise notable that the relations between the gem and its social admirer have changed very materially in degree since the accumulation began in the Old World. Most of the splendid diamond collections represented in royal and imperial salons upon state occasions were purchased when the gem was obtainable at from one-half to one-third of the rate our nouveaux riches have to pay for it. Perhaps in the history of appreciation of values there is no instance more conspicuous than that afforded by the diamond. When Mr. Emanuel, the London jeweler, published his pleasant and useful little treatise upon "Diamonds and Precious Stones" in 1865, he stated the market rate of a fine stone of one carat at £8. A second edition of the work, just issued, gives £21 as the price of a similar gem. Emanuel's literary and business predecessor, David Jeffries, in his scale of prices for the year 1750, names £8 as the price of a carat stone. It is needless to point the moral of a tale so plain and matter-of-fact. The circumstance that while the discovery of diamonds is now statistically insignificant, the Asiatic mines long since having been exhausted, and Brazil furnishing few stones of superior quality, the demand for the gem is daily increasing, as well for purposes of investment as of display, is also probably too generally recognized to need more than a suggestion. It is doubtful if the world will ever again have a chance to admire as the possession of one person a diamond property equal in cost and magnificence to that exhibited in the recent French Exposition by the Marchioness of Dudley. Of course we are not heartless enough to enlarge upon truths so narrowing. It is, however, consoling to reflect that, despite this tremendous rise in the bed of the stream, its brilliant current still tends this way. A rather clever sketch in one of the evening dailies a few weeks since, gave the customs returns of diamond importation at New York for 1866 and 1867—for the former year $1,455,460, and for the latter $856,815. Without having the means of immediate reference we should not fear to assume that the returns for 1864 and 1865 were considerably in excess of these amounts, those being the years in which contracts and shoddy were most demonstrative.

The designs which we introduce are not only the most recent conceptions of the diamond-setter's art, but illustrate strikingly another fact—which might have been properly mentioned above—that the number of stones of considerable size now purchasable is daily growing more limited. The production of the Brazilian mines, upon which the always increasing consumption of diamonds now depends alone, develops very few stones over two carats in weight, and of these the quality is generally so inferior that but a small proportion are available for ornament. The Duke of Brunswick's catalogue, issued some years since, and an authority with business people as well as connoisseurs, made the assertion that in all Europe there were not known to be then possessed more than twenty-four diamonds of thirty-six carats weight. When it is considered that out of the twenty-four gems suggested more than half are royal and imperial properties, the probability of their changing ownership under any other circumstances than the results of a general political revolution does not appear very flattering.

Luckily the skill and taste of the diamond-setter are now arraying the gem in such a manner that stones, however diminutive, are made to emit a brilliancy before unanticipated. The design of the pendent brooch admirably illustrates this assertion. It will be seen by a study of its construction that the individual stones are all so set as to give no appearance of intervening metal; that the pendent connections of the drops, instead of being the clumsy flat links of the old time, show simply to the eye gleaming lines, which in no way detract from the brilliancy of the gems, and that the whole setting is as delicate and unobtrusive in effect as a proper regard to durability will permit it to be. No enamel, it should be remarked, is used. The gold is in some instances of the rich red color years ago so popular, and frequently silver is used in immediate juxtaposition to the stones.

The jeweled birds are designs not as yet ordinarily known in this country, but for a year past favorite conceits in foreign society. The Empress, last summer, was often the wearer of what may have been the first instance of the style—a humming-bird, exquisitely formed of diamonds and colored gems. As fabrications of the artist they are wonderfully beautiful; but their especial merit is the field they afford for the use of small or mêlée stones. The smaller jewel is arranged either to be worn as brooch or head ornament, while the latter is only adaptable as a brooch. Colored stones, ruby, emerald, and sapphire, though we are powerless to represent them in our cuts, will of course be understood as properly appearing in these beautiful fancies. We need hardly suggest that the workmanship developed in productions so delicate is of the highest merit. For these beautiful designs we are indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. Tiffany & Co., of New York.

Side by side with the diamond stands the emerald. This stone appears to have been known in the most remote ages, and was the third stone, according to Calmet's arrangement, on the high-priest's breast-plate of judgment, with the name of Zebulon engraved on it. In the time of Pliny this stone was held in high estimation. He speaks of seeing Lollia Paulina, the most beautiful woman of her time, and afterward the wife of Caligula, wearing emeralds and diamonds to the value of about two millions of our money. The ancient source of supply was probably Egypt, as Cailloud has in modern times succeeded in discovering the old emerald mines in the Theban deserts, on the Arabian Gulf, noticed by ancient authors, and in the traditions of the Arabs. After that period the finest were procured from Peru, although they have been found in many other countries. On the conquest of Peru, and in the ninth and tenth centuries, we find the emerald noticed among the treasures of the Church. Cortéz brought five of these beautiful stones as a gift to his youthful bride, cut by the marvelous skill of the Aztecs—the first as a rose, the second a horn, the third a fish with golden eyes, the fourth a bell with a tongue of pearl, and the fifth a cup with a golden pedestal. The Spanish queen coveted these treasures, the refusal of which lost Cortéz the royal favor. It was held in superstitious veneration as a preventive of epilepsy and other diseases. Since then the old Peruvian mines were unproductive and became exhausted, and of later years the finest have been procured from Siberia, equal in quality and in every respect to the old Peruvian. Those reach the world of commerce through Russia, and are mainly cut and shaped by Armenians in Constantinople. On account of its agreeable green color the emerald has always been a favorite ornament, its value, of course, depending not merely on its size and weight, but on its purity and depth of color. There are many remarkable specimens of this stone known to the virtuoso. Among the crown jewels of England is one the size of a hen's egg, presented by the King of Oude. Russia also has in its collection one of the same size. In the collection of the East India Company there existed about fifty the size of pigeons' eggs, all transparent and of fine color; originally the ornaments of harness, bridles, etc., for full-dress display; besides a girdle thickly studded with them. The finest known, however, is in the imperial cabinet in St. Petersburg, being 30 carats, and in every respect perfect in shape, color, and freedom from defect.

We give illustrations herewith of an exquisite set of diamond and emerald jewelry, furnished us by the kindness of Messrs. Browne & Spaulding, of New York, which is now in process of manufacture, and which being designed for a private individual will never be exhibited to the public elsewhere than in the columns of Harper's Bazar.

The brooch is composed of emeralds and diamonds. The diamonds are pure old mine stones, seven weighing three carats each, and graduating down to one quarter. The emeralds are the principal feature in this brooch, all being pear-shaped except the centre one, which is of unusual size, $10\frac{1}{2}$ carats. The circles and pendants are intended to swing so as to secure constant motion. The ear-rings are also intended to swing from the cross-band of black enamel and gold. They have one large diamond in each, and the emeralds are pure and beautiful. The ring has a three-carat emerald of unusual purity and brilliancy. The bracelet is quite novel in design, the gold part encircling the arm being flexible, very rich in construction and material. The necklace is composed of twenty-two of the finest emeralds in this country, and one hundred and ten diamonds of various sizes and value. The whole set, comprising necklace, bracelet, brooch, ear-rings, and ring, is valued at \$50,000 in gold.

THE BASHFUL MAN.

I WAS born bashful.

I was not consulted in the matter. It was a proceeding for which I was not in the least to blame, and I had no opportunity of protesting against the arrangement. Even if this opportunity had been afforded me, I should not have possessed sufficient moral courage to enter the required protest. I can not account for it in any way. It will always be a problem to me, the solution of which is beyond my powers, why I was brought into the world, hopelessly, I may say, insanely bashful. At an early age, indeed, as far back as my memory takes me, the sight of a female threw me into spasms. I always regarded them as something terrible, put into the world for no other purpose than to be an object of loathing and fear on my part. I always made it a point to run away from them as soon as my powers of locomotion would allow me to do so. This was in the stage of short dresses and pinafores. But when I was sent to school for the first time, my tribulation began in good earnest.

I was what the ladies denominate a "pretty boy." I learned to my dismay that pretty boys must be kissed, and the idea was horrible to me. Many a time when I have seen "the girls" coming to our house, I have departed in hot haste, only to be pursued, dragged ignominiously from my place of concealment, and then and there kissed to the verge of distraction. It was useless to try to elude these female demons, for thus my distorted fancy always pictured them. However impossible the places in which I thought proper to hide, I was sure to be found sooner or later. It seemed to me that they took a diabolical delight in searching for me. In school, when we were playing those remarkable games so much affected by school-girls, I found to my dismay that I was singled out nearly every time. And when some pretty little damsel was bidden by the chorus to "Choose to the East—choose to the West, Choose the very one that you love best,"

I felt certain that Tom Raynor would be the one chosen. And too often for my peace of mind my fears were well founded.

It might be supposed that this feeling would wear off as I grew older. No such thing. At sixteen I was more bashful than ever. We lived in a house on a hill, from which a good view could be had of the neighboring roads. When at home I was always on the alert lest I should be surprised by the enemy. No matter what woman I might see coming, I took my departure for the swamp behind the house, in which I thought I could defy pursuit. In the very centre of this swamp was an island, difficult of access, and this was my city of refuge. Often, when driven to desperation, I have meditated seriously the plan of taking up my abode here permanently. I built a hut of tamarack boughs, so that even in rainy weather I had a shelter. I had conveyed to the place an old piece of tarpaulin, surreptitiously obtained, and spread it over the top of the hut. Many a time I have lain under this shelter, palpitating from a recent run, and felt truly thankful that such a refuge was afforded me.

Do not suppose this refuge was allowed me long. They found me out, of course. Let a woman alone for that. And when they found me they went into ecstasies over my hut, and declared it was the most beautiful retreat they had ever seen. And all I could do was to stand there, blinking like an idiot, and thinking in my heart how glad I would be if we could only have an earthquake to swallow up the island and its occupants, myself included. I took the first opportunity and searched for a new retreat. Here I set up my tent. But before a week had passed they found me out, and declared that this place was even more delightful than the other.

Although, as I grew older, I was not in so much danger of being kissed by force as heretofore, there were ways and means of accomplishing the same end, which I knew too well. The little parties then common I felt to be so many traps for my unwary feet. Those terrible games! When I think of them now cold shudders begin at the top of my head and gambol down into my boots. What was there at the bottom of those pretty games, which all the young ladies declared were "so easy," and "you could learn them in a minute?" Kissing! Imagine a young man of my temperament "going to Rome!" Perhaps you don't know what going to Rome is. If you don't, you are happy. I wish I did not. I'll explain. The person who goes to Rome, at a country party, is expected to take out a young lady, kiss her before every body, and then, in cold blood, walk the circuit of that room and kiss every girl there, while his partner kisses all the boys. Oh the blunders I have made! Making a dash to get done as soon as possible, and kissing a girl on the nose or eye. You can't expect a man to be quite himself in such a situation. I never was.

At last, through great tribulation, I came to man's estate. I was unfortunate enough to be what is termed in society "a good catch." It was very near causing me to commit suicide. My father lectured me on my inordinate shyness. He was sure "I never learned it from him." Of course not. A man that could have the courage to propose to my mother never had a bashful hair in his head. For my mother, in her day, was a belle and beauty. One who conquered all hearts. In spite of this he had the face to ask her to marry him; and what surprises me, she did it. I should have died on the spot of pure shame in trying to propose.

Of course you say "what a fool!" The very remark I have heard a dozen times in relation to my unfortunate infirmity. But in society the men all liked me. Every body said what a capital fellow Tom Raynor was, and what a jolly fellow, and all that. I was a prominent member of the Bachelors' Club, had been president, and was talked of for a second term. And, by-the-way, I'd rather be president of our Club than of the United States. You don't have any lot of fellows going round impeaching you there, and you don't have to give receptions and ask all the pretty women in the place.

My mother began to talk after a while that it was time I thought about marrying. The idea gave me such a turn that I went down to the Club and drank two glasses of something or other before I could even think. And when I did come to myself the idea sickened me again.

After that she lay in wait for me always. Think of that! My own mother! But then she was a woman after all. She couldn't help it, poor thing!

She used to bring all sorts of girls in my way. Tall girls and short girls; girls that could talk, and girls that couldn't. I hope it amused them. I give you my word that there was nothing amusing in it to me, though I liked the girls that couldn't talk better than the others. Some of them were handsome, I suppose. I never dared to look at them to see. But I took my mother's word for it. And if she did not know, I would be pleased to know who did.

Some of the girls were homely, but had plenty of money. They might have been hours for all I knew to the contrary, for I never looked at them any more than the others.

My mother don't like to be beaten. Perhaps I may say it was a part of her nature to be victorious. I sometimes think she married my father because somebody said she couldn't. She took it to heart that I would not look at the females she brought on the carpet, and made up her mind to get one I would look at. Of course I didn't know her plots. How should I?

"Tom," she said, one day, "I received a letter to-day from Margaret Newell. You remember her, do you not?"

How could I forget her? She was one of my earliest tormentors, in the days of pinafores, and a few years later. She was only a year or two younger than I. I answered in the affirmative.

"She is coming here," said my mother, in that easy way of hers, speaking of it as the simplest matter of fact. I looked at her in dismay.

"She—is—coming—here?" I repeated, slowly. "What the—dickens is she coming here for?"

"On a visit," said my mother. "I asked her."

"How long is she going to stay?"

"I can not say. She wants a little quiet, and there is a good chance for sketching about here. I told her so."

"Then I am going away. I'll go with Bill Frazier on that fishing trip he has talked about so long. I'll go and see him now."

"I don't see how you can," said she, as calmly as if she did not know that the statement would fill my soul with dismay. "I promised Maggie that you should drive over to Langford Station and bring her here. Mr. Frazier goes to-day, does he not?"

"Send father," I said, eagerly.

"Impossible. Your father has business which will occupy all his time for the next three days."

"Go yourself, then. Pete can drive you over, and she would be better pleased to meet you than me, a perfect stranger. Hang it, I can't go. I don't know her."

"You can't miss her," replied mother. "She will stop at Mr. Blanchard's, near the station, and all you have to do is to go there for her. As for my going, I am surprised to hear you suggest such a thing, when you know how much I have to do."

"Let Pete go alone."

"Pete can not drive. His arm is so lame that he can hardly lift it. I wonder if you would ask the poor fellow to drive those horses nine miles and back. Besides, I promised Maggie that you should go, and I am sure she will expect you."

Just see the duplicity of this female. She knew that a more dreadful thing could not be imagined than to drive a young lady nine miles all alone. And yet she spoke of it as a pleasure.

"I don't see what she wants to come here for," I grumbled.

"It need not trouble you, Tom. She is not coming here to see you, by any means, and when she is once here I will take care of her. Don't suppose Maggie Newell will be any trouble to you. I doubt if she will look at you half a dozen times during her stay."

"Won't she?" said I. After all, it was not so much to do. I had only to drive over to the station, and take her in and drive her home. I should have so much to do to attend to the horses that she could not ask me to talk, and when I had her here I would keep out of her way.

The next day I got out my team. If I must own it, I am proud of that team. I don't think you can find their match in New York. A pair of blacks, each with a white fore-foot. Skin like satin, feet as dainty as a lady's, and far more trusty, in my opinion.

The day was beautiful. Just the kind of a day for a drive, and my blood warmed as we spun along. What did I care for Maggie Newell? Pah! she had pulled my hair when neither of us was higher than a stool—I was not afraid of her. I wondered if she would like my team. She could not help it, if she had any taste at all. For the first half of the distance I was as bold as a lion. But when I passed the five-mile post the old feeling began to come back, and I felt that I was in deep water again, all through my mother and her friend, Miss Maggie Newell. How was I to address her? How pass the time in a nine-mile drive? I had brought out my new buggy, and I began to calculate how little room I could occupy on the seat, and how close she must be to me. The result of the calculation was frightful, and I began to realize the fact that I had been betrayed. The nearer I came to Langford Station the greater my fears became. I tugged at the spirited team, and forced them to walk the last two miles, while I wiped the perspiration from my brow. It is impossible for any one not afflicted as I am to imagine the agonies I endured as I came nearer and nearer to Langford Station. At length the little village appeared in sight, lying in a sequestered glen at the foot of a mighty hill. A train was just steaming away from the station, and I saw the omnibus, with a single passenger, going to Blanchard's. I felt that I was doomed.

Even at this late hour I meditated flight. And I am inclined to the belief that I should have carried the cowardly design into execution had not fate ordained it otherwise. A shrill voice hailed me:

"Hey, there! I say, Tom! Hold on! Give me a ride!"

I turned, and saw the youngest scion of the house of Blanchard, a boy about ten years old, hurrying toward me. I pulled up and let him get in.

"Going to our house?" demanded Billy. I said "Yes," rather faintly.

"You'd better. I guess there ain't a gay girl there! Oh no, perhaps not!"

This was intended to be highly sarcastical on Master Billy's part, and he went through a pantomime to impress me with the idea of the "gayness," if I may coin an expression, of the aforesaid girl.

"What is her name?" I faltered.

"Maggie," said Billy, with an unctuous smack of the lips. "Maggie Newell. She came just now, she did. And she kissed me, too, smack on the mouth."

And the little wretch seemed to like it. How different from myself at his age!

"Don't you want a longer ride, Billy?" I said, willing to put off the inevitable hour.

"No, I don't," said Billy. "Not now, any way. Don't I know what we are going to have for dinner? I ain't going to lose it for no ride, I ain't."

I felt that this boy was in league with my enemies, and that my shuffling was worse than useless. Billy had the reins, and drew up with a grand flourish and an unnecessary amount of hulloing in front of the house. Mrs. Blanchard came to the door, and I caught a glimpse of a face looking over her shoulder, which did my business effectually. I don't know how it was. I had not looked at her more than half a minute, and yet in that little time I knew her face by heart. I'll tell you how it looked to me in three words—a man-trap! As for the particulars, as I gathered them in that passing glance, she had a fair complexion, heavy brown hair rolled back from her forehead in a bewitching fashion, laughing brown eyes, and a bewildering way of glancing at a man sidewise that set me back a good way. I don't pretend to explain how it was that I managed to get that look at her. I only know that it was done somehow, and I felt more than ever that my mother and Maggie Newell had conspired to ruin me, and were likely to succeed.

The man took away my horses, and I stumbled into the house, conscious that my face was of the color of the inside of a piece of underdone roast, and that my feet were too large. I have always noticed that a bashful man is perpetually dreaming of doing two impossible things—namely, getting his feet into his vest pockets, and finding untold riches in the crown of his hat. I have yet to learn that any one has succeeded in either undertaking. I never did. And yet when I was in a strait I was sure to undertake one or the other impossible feat, always feeling the more sheepish when it failed.

In less than ten minutes I found myself seated at the table, vis-à-vis with Miss Maggie Newell. I was wholly at a loss to define my sensations. Before, when placed in a like position in regard to one of the feminine species, my desire had been to get away, to hide myself in some hole, to call on the rocks and mountains to cover me. My feeling in this case entirely changed. Not that I was less bashful than before, but I felt by an inspiration that my feet were too long and my hands too big, and even with the thought meditated putting my left foot into my right-hand waistcoat pocket, and was shamefaced at my signal failure. But the feature of my case which troubled me was this: I felt a sort of sheepish pleasure in stealing side-glances at the bright face of Maggie, and looking half a dozen ways at once if by any chance she caught my eye. The mistakes I made were many and a million. In handing her a cup of tea I managed to drop it just at the moment it touched her hand, and deluged the table with the contents. I salted my tea and put sugar on my egg. I told Mrs. Blanchard she ought to see Rita Sangalli dance, when I intended to tell her that it was a treat to hear Beecher. I committed so many nameless offenses that it was really a relief when I found myself on the road, bowling along at a five-minute gait, with Maggie by my side. And, if you will believe it, I felt pleased with the situation. Our conversation was interesting. Ecce signum.

Maggie was the speaker. I never could take the initiative with a woman, and always thought the way they do things in Leap-Year about the style for me.

"You must have been charmed with your drive over this morning, Mr. Raynor," she said, with a sly glance at me. "What do you think I did? Acted like a blockhead, and tried to get off a compliment, after seeking inspiration in the crown of my hat, which I took off for the purpose, and put on again before I attempted to speak."

"The drive over was pleasant," I managed to say—I, who had never essayed a compliment before in my life. "But the situation now, in point of fact, is, you know, what you know."

Giving the matter my careful consideration now, I am inclined to the opinion that I meant to say that the ride in the morning was very pleasant, but the ride back was doubly so, on account of her presence. Her astonished look at my inefficient speech, so far from helping me, only completed my overthrow.

"That is to say," I stammered, glaring reproachfully at the off-horse, as if he had something to do with my embarrassment—"that you—that I—that every body—What do you think of my team?"

At this strange finale to a strange address a disposition to laugh showed itself plainly in her face. But she replied with perfect composure, "I think they are beauties. Will you let me drive?"

"You can't drive," I said, proud to find something on which I could assert my superiority. "A woman don't know any thing about a team." "Will you let me try?" she said. "I have driven before."

She managed to touch my hand in taking the reins, and I was immediately thrown into a slow fever. I never got over it until—but I won't get before my story. She handled the reins like a female Jehu. I had to sit by her, and—I wanted to.

"I think you ought to call me by my name, Tom," she said. "We used to be great friends when we were such little things, and I have had enough of 'Miss Margaret' and 'Miss Newell.' Call me Maggie, please."

I couldn't have done it at the moment if it would have saved my life. And she referred to that period when she was foremost of my young tormentors. The one I was so often forced to kiss, and who laughed at me because I didn't like it!

We got home at last. I did not drive so fast on the last half of the way as the first, and my mother came smiling down the steps to meet us. Maggie and my mother kissed with extreme unction. I stood by, conscious that I looked mean, and trying to find that mine of gold in my hat.

"How did you and Tom get on together?" said my mother as we entered the parlor.

"We are the best of friends," said she. "Are we not, Tom?"

I don't know what I said. I never expect to remember it. I only know that it exasperated me to hear her talk in that way before my mother, and that the latter laughed heartily at my misanthropical face. I left them to their own devices, and went out to look after my horses. When I came back they had their heads very close together, hatching some kind of mischief I felt sure. I was at once seized upon to play cribbage with Maggie, while mother went away to see after some household duties. It was a plot on her part; but somehow I didn't feel so bad about it as I used to when she left me with Chrissy Downright or Nell Mason. But then I knew their "tricks and manners" quite too well.

I play a good game of cribbage, and I like any one who can do the same. And Maggie was my full match. I don't know how it was, but the tea-bell rang while we were still engaged in that mysterious "fifteen two, fifteen four, fifteen six, and three are nine, and one for his nob," so puzzling to a novice in the game of cribbage. Mother never came near us. She was too sharp for that, and too set on making mischief.

I'm not going to tell you all we did during the month Maggie staid with us. I only know that I was with her nearly all the time, and that after a week I was as keen after picnics and parties as any of them. After the first week, too, the boys and girls began to flock to our house as they had never done before. I noticed that the best young men of my acquaintance liked to talk and dance with Maggie. Of course it was nothing to me; but I didn't like it. I couldn't get a chance to talk with her, and she was the only one I dared to talk with. But her visit was nearly over, and, to my intense surprise, I was sorry for it. Actually sorry, because a woman, a man-trap, was going away. A month before I was ready to run away at her approach.

I went down to the Club the morning of the day preceding her departure. I was very glum, and Rodgers and Benton, two of the Club, began at me in this wise:

"Poor fellow! The rose forsakes his cheek," said Benton, stretching out his cigar in a melodramatic manner.

"She is gone, she is fled, and she will not return!" spouted Rodgers.

"Well, what's the matter with you?" I demanded, angrily.

"Here may you see Benedick the married man," replied Benton.

When he said that, the reason I was sorry Maggie was going away, and the way to stop her, came to me like a thunder-clap. "Thank you," said I. And I shook hands with him warmly. He stared at me as if he thought I had lost my senses. But I turned my back on him and left the Club. I went directly home. Maggie had gone out somewhere. Our estate lay just on the outskirts of the village, as you know. I went through all the rooms in the house, not knowing where to look for Maggie, and every where I went I found something of hers. A book, a guitar, a knot of faded violets, and the like. In my wanderings I went up to a room overlooking the farm, and from it I saw her. She had found my old place of refuge, the island in the swamp. The timber had been cut away from the place, and as it lay in a deep valley, it was in full sight. A corduroy bridge had been laid to it, by which she had crossed. And there she sat with her elbows on her knees, looking fixedly into space. I came down from my look-out, crossed the bridge, and came upon her unawares.

She had something in her lap as I came up, and peeping over her shoulder, I saw with a guilty sort of pleasure that they were little things I had given her at various times. She was turning them over in a vacant sort of manner, and did not see me as I came up. At that moment my timidity came back, and I stood like an idiot.

But in that moment I knew that she was the "one maid for me."

I don't think I moved. But that magnetic influence passing from mind to mind told her that some one was standing near. She looked up with a start, and the trinkets were scattered on the ground. A roseate flush stole into her cheek, which made her look more bewitching than ever. I stooped to pick up the scattered articles, and she did the same. We bumped our heads together. She looked up with a smile.

"Maggie," I said.

"Well, Tom?"

"Do you—don't you think that—that Dora Mead is a nice girl?"

I don't know what possessed me to say that. It was not what I meant to say at all. She drew up her shoulders in a pretty way.

"Certainly," she said.

"But Maggie, I am sorry you are going away."

"Thank you, Tom. You will get over it. Dora will comfort you."

"Perhaps she will," I said, "if she only gets the chance. What do I care for Dora Mead?"

"More than you do for any body else," she said. "And I don't blame you."

"Maggie!"

She looked at me this time in such a way that in a moment my timidity was gone. I think a man who had been used to the wiles of woman could not have done it better than I did. And she put her hands in mine and promised to be my wife.

When we came back looking very happy and at the same time very silly, my mother detected us on the spot. No need to tell her. For had she not sent for Maggie in order that I might fall in love with her?

What a thing it is to have a mother who understands human nature! The bashful man is cured.

HARP AND VOICE.

HUSHED is the voice and cold the hand,
That once, in far-gone years,
Could move with Music's sweet command
My heart to smiles or tears.
The harp, unstrung, no more shall wake
The haunted strains of yore,
Save as, unheard, their echoes break
On memory's silent shore!

No more the voice whose cadence soft
The tenderest feeling thrilled,
On silvery wings shall bear aloft
My soul entranced and stilled—
Until it falls on my rapt ear
When mortal bonds are riven;
And, as it breathed of heaven here,
Shall hallow earth in heaven!

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE. POLITICAL RECEPTIONS.

OF course we have all kinds of parties and entertainments in England—balls, dinner-parties, fête-champêtres, and croquet-parties, to say nothing of the eternal kettle-drums, those economical afternoon affairs, where tea, bread and butter, cakes, etc., are all that is necessary to provide—save ices, perhaps, in the very hot weather—whether people dance, listen to music, or are content with talking only. The early London season begins after Easter, and lasts until the end or middle of July; but before Easter, while Parliament is sitting, there are always plenty of people in the metropolis, and there are a few balls going on, but balls are the exception in Lent, and receptions—chiefly political ones—are the order of the day.

There are several houses in London where such receptions are held; but the most notable entertainments of the kind are those given by Mr. Disraeli, our present Tory Premier, and Mr. Gladstone, the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, now the leader of the Opposition.

The invitations are issued some week or ten days beforehand, as follows:

Mrs. DISRAELI [or Mrs. GLADSTONE, as the case may be],
At Home,
SATURDAY [or WEDNESDAY], — of —.
FOREIGN OFFICE, DOWNING STREET [or CARLTON HOUSE TERRACE].

No time is specified; people begin to assemble at about half past ten, and leave by twelve or thereabouts. They are usually held on Wednesdays or Saturdays, because on those nights the Houses of Parliament do not sit.

As a rule, no amusement of any kind is provided for the guests. The host and hostess receive you in the first drawing-room you enter; then you make your way through a brilliant suite of rooms crowded to suffocation, and by-and-by partake of a light refreshment of ices, tea, cake, fruit, etc., served on a long buffet in one of the further rooms, and that is all the actual programme of the evening. Sometimes—as when such entertainments were held at the old official residence in Downing Street—the suite of apartments were any thing but brilliant—rather dark and very dingy-looking in fact, with hardly any furniture about them; nothing but a few settees ranged against the wall, and only a row of fine marble pillars down the centre of the principal room redeemed their appearance at all. The entrance, too, was so bad that a long wooden corridor, as well as an awning-covered corridor, had to be built out pretty well every time the official residence was called into requisition for such a purpose. But whatever be the shortcomings of the place, the brilliancy of the assembly is quite sure to make up for them. All the great stars from both sides of the political hemisphere congregate here—celebrities of all kinds, both literary and social, and the most beautiful women of the day to boot.

Mrs. Gladstone's house, in Carlton House Terrace, is in itself a sight worth seeing. You ascend a small flight of steps, where powdered footmen and a sombre-dressed butler stand ready to receive you and marshal you the way that you should go. On entering you give your name, and at a table close by a list is kept of the guests as they arrive, to be published next day in all the morning papers. It is astonishing how anxious people are that their names should appear, and if by any chance they are omitted, what trouble they take to send a special notification to the press that they were present, though their names were not inserted.

All this, by-the-by, is in the outer hall. The inner hall is very large and lofty, and you have to cross this to deposit your cloaks in the dining-room before you make your way up stairs.

The grand staircase branches off on either side, and its walls are lined with pictures of various kinds, from Leech's sketches to some fine works of the Old Masters.

At the top of the staircase a few steps and a broad landing lead to the drawing-rooms, in the first of which Mrs. Gladstone receives you. These rooms are beautifully furnished and abound in works of art. Cabinets against the wall are full of the choicest china, for Ceramic ware is the great hobby of Mr. Gladstone's life. When the Budget proved more troublesome than usual he was wont to renew his wasted energies by a half hour devoted to his treasures in Majolica and Henri Deux. Easels, with choice prints and exquisite specimens of photography fill every corner, and statuary of all kinds abound. You breathe an atmosphere of art from the moment you enter the great man's home.

In time the crowd disperse themselves through the various rooms, gossip a little over a cup of tea or an iced, and are the lions, or lionize, as the case may be.

The head of the stairs, I notice—those few steps which lead to the first drawing-room—is where Mr. Gladstone, later in the evening, after the duty of receiving his guests is over, mostly takes up his stand, with a knot of the ruling spirits, male and female, round him.

All political chiefs seem to have a worn, weary look about them. Mr. Gladstone's is decidedly a fine intellectual face, with a great deal of fire in his speaking gray eye, but he is always pale and apparently exhausted, and pays but little attention to his dress. His hair is long and sprinkled with gray, and he still wears the large old-fashioned collars which nearly cover the chin—that shapely, well-defined chin of his which denotes so unmistakably the strong determination of his character.

Turn where you will you see some one who has made his mark in our country's history. Here Lord Clarendon's blanched face is busily discussing something with an old brother politician, which something we of course think must be the affairs of the nation. Near to him is the present Speaker of the House of Commons with his wife, a high-bred looking woman, who is leaning back in the centre ottoman, talking to the Count D'Azélie, one of the most polished members of our diplomatic corps, from which, alas! he is about to retire. By-and-by Tennyson passes, exchanging a word here and there. You recognize him in a moment from his exact resemblance to his photographs, which are in nearly every shop window—the long face and the long shaggy beard and whiskers are unmistakable; indeed there is altogether a rather unkempt appearance about our Poet Laureate, which you forget in a moment when you hear him talk, especially if you can induce him to touch upon his own little home in the Isle of Wight. He must be making quite a fortune now, for our periodicals are paying him fabulous prices for very short poems of only a few lines long.

Mr. Bright, too, has found his way to these receptions in Carlton House Terrace; and there is certainly nothing either weary or worn-looking about his appearance. Rumor says he will have a seat in the next Liberal Cabinet; but then rumor has a hundred tongues, more than fifty of them false.

If I stop to tell you further about Mrs. Gladstone's entertainments, I shall leave myself but little space for the wonderful receptions Mrs. Disraeli has been holding this year; and they surpass any thing of the kind we have ever had here.

In the first place, the New Foreign Office was placed at her disposal—a very splendid building, which is not even now quite complete. It forms part of the block to be devoted to those Government Offices, which are to replace the present very inconvenient ones. The new India House is part of the same plan, where the best of all the entertainments given to the Sultan of Turkey took place last year. We have never before or since had such a ball in England. The company were much the same as at a state ball, for the Queen's list was chiefly consulted when the invitations were issued.

All the gentlemen were obliged to appear in uniform or Court dress, and the ladies donned their newest and richest attire. Such brilliant lighting from wax-lights and gas combined! Such music, all as good as it could be. Scarlet and gold was the prevailing tone of color every where, relieved by the vivid green of huge tropical plants. The air was kept at a medium temperature by mountains of ice on gilt stands, and in retired nooks, every here and there, water trickled over beds of ferns and rock-work as if they had been there for a quarter of a century. All that earthly talent and earthly grandeur could do to make it perfect was done, and so far it was perfect; but amidst all this pomp, this busy life, the Angel of Death stepped in to claim its own, and poor Madame Musurus, the wife of the Turkish Ambassador, died, or, at all events, was taken away in a dying state from the Royal supper-table. I am, however, wandering from my subject; but the style of the two buildings—the New Foreign Office and the India Office—are so much alike that I can hardly describe the one without recalling the other.

Plenty of pure white stone, plenty of highly-decorated ceilings and walls make the New Foreign Office a very worthy abode for such an assembly. It is indeed far more like a monarch's palace than a mere official residence. The grand staircase is quite regal in its character; the balusters are of brown and white marble and alabaster, surmounted by a slab of dark serpentine rock. The corridors round are rich in marble pillars with gilt capitals, and the arches and arabesque work about them are as perfect as they could be. Moreover, the first reception was graced with the presence of Royalty, and we good folks here are very glad to see our reigning family among us.

The Queen herself, since her bereavement, has taken no part in such gayeties, but the natural loyalty expends itself now on the younger branches of her family; in fact, it is impossible to give a stranger a true notion of the great popularity of our Princess of Wales; the smallest atom of gossip about her is listened to with the warmest interest; she is mobbed wherever she goes, and, though she has been in England more than five years, the crowd is just as great round the gates in Hyde Park, when she is expected to drive, as when she came first among us as a bride. A prettier or more graceful or more gracious woman you could hardly see.

At Mrs. Disraeli's At Home she was accompanied by her husband, Prince and Princess Christian—the Queen's youngest married daughter—the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Teck, who married the Princess Mary of Cambridge.

In England people are always anxious to know what the Princess of Wales wears, for she dresses in admirable taste; perhaps the belles on the other side of the Atlantic may have a similar curiosity, so I will describe her toilette: The dress was a white and gold tarlatan, trimmed with gold braid and black bows edged with gold; over this was a tunic of white silk, also trimmed with gold braid. In her hair she wore a diamond tiara and a bow or two of cerise colored ribbons; and long cerise ends of ribbons tied the ten or twelve rows of pearls round her neck. She did not, as she often does, wear the blue ribbon of the garter across the body of her dress, but a cluster of glittering orders on the right shoulder was very effective and pretty, sparkling as she moved.

As usual, every body present seemed anxious to see the Royal group, and the principal reception-room, in which they remained for some time after their arrival, was thronged. Mr. and Mrs. Disraeli went down to the principal entrance to escort them thither, and remained with them during the greater part of the evening.

Mr. Disraeli shows the wear and tear of official life quite as much as the leader of the Opposition. "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown;" and uneasy, I fear, lies many a head on whom the coveted boon of power falls. As I looked at him I thought of him rather as a novelist than as a Premier; and I wondered whether, in very truth, he were proving in his own person the feelings of many of his heroes, who very nearly occupied a similar position. Lady St. John's words, in his famous Sibyl, would come into my head: "People get into Parliament"—he made her say, if you remember—"to get on; their aims are indefinite. If they have indulged in hallucinations about place before they enter the House they are soon freed from such dis-tempered fancies; they find they have no more talent than other people, and, if they had, they learn that power, patronage, and pay are reserved for us and our friends. Well, then, like practical men, they look to some result, and they get it. They are asked out to dinner more than they would be; they move rigmarole resolutions at nonsensical public meetings, and they get invited, with their women, to assemblies at their leaders, where they see stars and blue ribbons, and, above all, us, who they little think, in appearing on such occasions, make the greatest possible sacrifice."

Herein the Premier's own words, the very essence of the thing, is painted. These political "At Homes" are, there is no doubt, one of the strings by which the puppets on the political stage are pulled; and, as I wandered among the long, handsome corridors, through various rooms all more or less full, all more or less rich in their decorations—as I listened to the inspiring strain of the Coldstream Guards' band stationed in the hall below me, I longed to draw aside the veil that clouded the present and the future; and the beautiful women, the celebrities, the great and little men about here seemed only for a while so many actors in a drama.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

POLONAISE.—Nos. 24 and 26 of Harper's Bazar give the pattern of the polonaise or redingote.

Mrs. F. C. AND OTHERS.—We can not undertake to publish any special patterns in our Supplement, but will endeavor to make the variety great enough to suit the mass of our readers. In No. 24 of Harper's Bazar, under the title of Smoking Jacket, you will find the pattern you require.

AN INQUIRER.—We know of no distinctive style of street dress for brides. A Watteau suit of French gray silk, trimmed with satin of a deeper shade, has been made lately as part of a trousseau; also a chameleon silk of mingled gray and blue, with two skirts, trimmed with box-pleated ruffles, the upper skirt being fastened at the back and sides. A Marie Antoinette fichu forms the over-wrapping. This style is very becoming to slight figures and very youthful brides. The bonnet, gloves, and boots should match in color.

A SUBSCRIBER.—You will probably find the styles you want in our New York Fashion article, No. 29. Open the dress behind, but not to the bottom of the skirt. The sleeveless sack will be appropriate. The sash may be either of ribbon or of the material of the dress; this is a matter of choice and convenience. Flat surfaces are not so pretty for trimming children's dresses as raised, full ones. We would suggest narrow bias frills, of blue silk instead of velvet ribbon for trimming a blue and white plaid poplin.

Square in Netted Guipure.

THIS is a pretty square with a circular point d'esprit foundation, on which is embroidered a raised bouquet in point de reprise. It is worked in coarse or fine cotton or cord, according to the size of the covers for which it is designed. The effect is very good, if the foundation is netted in black silk and the guipure worked in colors. The form of the foundation may be made circular by working around the edge of the point d'esprit filling in button-hole stitch, having first run several threads around it to make it firm, and then cutting away the outside corners. To this may be sewed an edge of tatted or guipure lace. The manner of working the foundation, as well as the stitches point d'esprit and point de reprise, are probably familiar to our readers, as we have already described them several times in the Bazar. We will only mention that in working the foundation in point d'esprit four squares of the net are left free for the centre of each flower. These are afterward filled by little wheels, which are worked in loose button-hole stitch.

Cravat Bow.

THIS neat little bow, which may be worn instead of a brooch, is made of a double piece of satin two inches wide, lined with gauze. The ends are pointed, the strip is folded lengthwise, and sewed together so that the seam lies along the back of the strip. The bow is fastened on by means of a clasp-pin, as shown by the second illustration, which gives the under side of the bow.

illustration; and on these a round of loops, which finishes the edge and is worked as follows: First string a bead cord, then fasten the thread to one of the shells of the last round, run it through one bead of the cord, * string on five beads, run the thread through nineteen beads of the cord, thus forming a loop; run the thread through the next shell, then again through nineteen beads of the cord, and repeat from *. Having finished the rosettes, now sew them on a bag of violet silk, in the manner shown by the illustration.

Two Mats for Lamps, Vases, etc.

BOTH these mats are of brown carriage-leather, and are circular, being six inches in diameter. The trimming is easily made. For Fig. 1 prepare first a round piece of pasteboard six inches in diameter; cover this on one side with brown carriage-leather, fastening it to the pasteboard by means of gum-arabic, and border the edge with green coffee berries of different sizes. The berries are fastened on with gum-arabic and sewed over with black silk, the threads of which cross, as shown in the illustration. Cover the under side also with carriage-leather, cut the edge into small scallops, and finish with a row of black beads.

For Fig. 2 prepare two circular pieces of carriage-leather, sticking the backs together, and finish the edge with a border of opaque beads, sewed on as shown in the illustration. Put the needle through the double material close to the outer edge, sticking it from under; string twelve beads on the working thread, then put the needle again through the mat, three-eighths of an inch from the former point, run it back through the last three beads, and string on nine others. Proceed in this manner. Having finished this edge, prepare two additional circles—the one three-fourths of an inch, the other an inch and a half less in diameter than the first circles. These are edged with beads in the same man-snail shells (Venetian shells), white cord. This pretty bag is of violet silk, ornamented on both sides by a circular piece worked in crystal beads and shells. The accompanying illustration shows the bag of half the size. Each shell must be pierced with four small holes. Begin each piece in the centre and work in the round as follows: 1st round.—A shell, forming the centre, and on this four bead loops, the first of which counts ten beads and the remainder only eight, while the thread must always be run back through the last two of the preceding loop. 2d round.—Run the needle through the first two beads ner as the larger circle, except that alabaster beads are used for the larger and crystal for the smaller of the two. Finally, sew these two circles on each other, and then on the larger one.

The patterns in Figs. 3-5 may also be used for bordering. The border, Fig. 3, consists of small rosettes formed of cucumber seeds and black beads, and sewed on the scallops of the foundation. Fig. 4 is a border of jet beads and bugles. Fig. 5 is a border in imitation of a twisted cord. It is made of opaque, alabaster, crystal, and jet beads, which are arranged over a white cord.

Embroidery Pattern for Lambrequin.

See illustration, page 457.

A LAMBREQUIN executed in the colors given on page 457 has a very pretty effect. It may be worked either in wool and silk, or entirely in beads. The fineness of materials will depend on the use for which the lambrequin is designed. The outer edge is finished with a silk cord, or with a string of beads.

Four Squares for Covers.

See illustration, page 457.

THESE four squares set together give a portion of a cover. Two of the squares are of fine piqué, embroidered with fine crochet cord. The star in the centre of one of them is worked in satin stitch with knitting cotton. The square in netted guipure needs no further description, as we have already frequently given the instructions needed for the working of the several stitches. The crochet square, which is worked in backward and forward rounds, is as follows: 1st round.—Beginning on the under corner, a foundation of * 6 ch. (chain stitches); crochet then 1 dc. (double crochet) in the second of these ch.; but the dc., however, must be only so far completed as still to leave two loops on the needle. Next crochet 1 tc. (treble crochet) in the 1st of the 6 ch.—in doing this the last three loops on the needle are to be worked off with one thread—this completes a leaf. From * repeat twelve times; then turn the work and crochet 2d round—1 sc. (single crochet) in the stitch between the 4th and 5th leaves, counting from the end; work again two leaves, then 1 sc. between the 2d and 3d following leaves, etc. At the end of the round work three leaves, after which turn the work and crochet the 3d round back in the same manner.

Having worked eleven such rows of leaves, border the square by a round alternating 9 ch., 1 sc. in the stitch between each leaf. For the corners, work a sufficient number of stitches to make it square. The outer row of the border is formed of double crochet, 1 dc. being worked in each stitch of the last round, and 3 dc. in each corner stitch.

The mode of arranging these squares is a matter of taste. The cover may be composed only of the crochet and netted guipure squares, or of the embroidered squares with one or the other of those described. The cover is bordered with twisted fringe or crochet edging.

Two Borders in Point Russe.

FOR TRIMMING BASKETS, LAMBREQUINS, ETC.

THESE two borders are used as trimming for baskets, lambrequins, the outer edge of cushions, etc. Both are worked with colored silk twist on velvet, cloth, or silk. The fringe in the first figure, as well as the star figures, is fastened at the points by means of a short stitch. The fringe and figures in the second figure are worked in half-polka stitch. These designs are extremely simple and tasteful withal, and can be executed with great facility, even by any one not accustomed to embroidery.

TREATMENT OF THE HAIR.

THOUGH the hair be wholly devoid of feeling, it is not devoid of life, and soon reverts any discipline founded on the treatment of it as mere dead filaments. It can not be pinched with hot irons, or crinkled in and out in waves, without causing speedy deterioration, as many ladies have, when too late, discovered to their cost. No style of hair-dressing is so congenial to its well-being as that of arranging it in plain bands. Curling, in whatever way conducted, is injurious; curling by hot irons most injurious of all. Far more prejudicial, however, are some of these crinkling and waving operations which unfortunately have become fashionable. They are only second in evil to certain operations of dyeing, and, still worse, bleaching, which will be noticed further on.

Coming now to the discipline of the hair, the method or methods of keeping it in order, I believe the more it feels the touch of the atmospheric air the better for its condition. The magnificent masses of hair to be seen on the heads of foreign peasant-girls, who never wear bonnets or other head-covering, is a standing proof of the soundness of this doctrine. Conversely, again, who can have failed to remark the tendency to baldness which any persistent covering of the head induces? Is there any cure for baldness when it has become confirmed? Are those elixirs, those balms of Gilead, those rosemary essences, and other things of which hair-dressers talk to one about in such bland persuasive tones—are they a fact or a delusion? And what shall we say about bear's-grease, that was once held in such repute, and the hair-producing character of which still lingers, as did the odor of flowers to Tommy Moore's broken vase? Delusions all, I fear, or at any rate mostly. Consideration of the structure and anatomy of individual hairs will prompt to this conclusion, and experience, I think, confirm it. Each hair, as is generally known, springs from a bulb, and each hair-bulb is naturally bedded in its own socket. The arrangement is one very comparable to that of a tooth in its jaw-socket and membranous investiture. If a hair be broken off, or if, growing weak from one of many causes, it withers down, leaving the root behind, then doubtless much may be done to effect restoration by proper treatment; but if the bulb has wholly gone, and the skin once closed up, then one might as well expect to grow a new tooth from the gap whence a tooth had been extracted as to evolve from that particular bulb-socket a new hair. The only effectual way I know of whereby to impart a new head of hair to a pericranium upon which the blight of actual baldness has fallen, is that of transplantation.

It is a perfectly established fact that hairs can be transplanted from one head to another, and that when thus transplanted they will grow. I say nothing about the pain such an operation would cause—that is a matter to be reflected on by the patient. In like manner, feathers and teeth will grow if similarly transplanted. The experiment was tried, and succeeded, of transplanting a tooth to the comb of a cock. These physiological facts are suggestive of much cranial artistic beauty, whenever fashion may prompt individuals to incur the pain of its infliction. One can readily imagine the imposing beauty that would come of adorning human heads with birds' feathers. It would be some sort of a triumph for a lady to boast that she grew her own ostrich-plumes.

When hairs have withered away down to their respective bulbs their growth can be promoted by certain applications.

Among these cantharides, or Spanish flies, have acquired a celebrity which upon the whole may be pronounced merited. Cantharidin, however, in all its various states, is so powerful an agent that the employment of it should never be trusted to the discretion of a hair-dresser. Pernitrate of mercury is another agent that has grown into repute for the same purpose. This also, however, is dangerous when used too strong, and its degree of concentration can only be judged of in respect to each particular case. The repute required by bear's-grease for strengthening the hair, and even overcoming baldness, is wholly unfounded. Bear's-grease first came into vogue through application of what is called the doctrine of signatures, whereby it was, in one stage of medical belief, inferred that each particular agent used, or capable of being used, gave evidence by external sign of inward potentiality. Thus inasmuch as bears were seen to grow a strong coat of hair, the signature was adopted as foundation for the belief that any scalp to which bear's-grease might be applied should forthwith produce hair in true ursine fashion.

Very conducive to the well-being of hair is assiduous removal of the small cutaneous scales that invest every inch of the skin it grows upon. Brushing accomplishes this well, and the mild friction of the brush is also advantageous by stimulating a proper supply of blood toward the hair-roots. Let no one be led away by the notion that so-called magnetic brushes are of especial use. Magnetic brushes are like any ordinary brushes, in effect neither better nor worse. True, indeed, each of these magnetic brushes has a magnet fixed into its reverse; but any person acquainted with magnetism will feel assured that the conditions of arrangement are altogether incompatible with the exercise of any magnetic influence.

Beyond combing and brushing, what are the best expedients for hair-cleaning? In man there is nothing so good as soap-and-water lather; but the plan can not be recommended for ladies. The alkali of soap is not congenial to the gloss and beauty of human hair; moreover, to some extent, alkaline contact affects the coloring-matter, and changes its tint. Men are above or beside these considerations, but they should be taken heed of by ladies. Glycerine and lime-juice so called is not glycerine and lime-juice at all. It is merely scented oil and lime-water. Glycerine and rose-water is much better. The advantage of glycerine is, that it imparts to the hair a soft, silky brilliancy; the so-called brilliancy, in point of fact, which gentlemen—vain young ones—use for their whiskers and mustaches is only glycerine scented. For bandoline nothing is better—perhaps nothing so good—as a very small fragment of gum-tragacanth dissolved in water and perfumed. The fragment must be very small, otherwise the solution will turn the accroche-cœur into a veritable horn, as uncomfortable to wear as ungraceful to look at. People who use pomades should be very careful that they do not apply injurious coloring-matters to the hair. The fashion these some years past has come in of using yellow or straw-colored pomades. They are elegant to look at, and so long as the yellow tint is imparted by palm-oil, as it should be, they are, sanitarily considered, unobjectionable. I fear, however, that in many instances the peculiar tint of yellow so much desiderated is given by incorporation with some injurious metallic compound. Roseate pomades are never, on account of their coloring-matter, objectionable, the tint being always imparted by alkanet root, which is wholly innocuous. In respect to the oleaginous composition of pomades, that varies greatly. Spermaceti, and almost any animal oil or fat—except mutton-fat—may be employed in their composition. I believe the very best oleaginous hair application consists of a mixture of castor-oil and alcohol, two parts by measure of the former to one of the latter, the whole perfumed according to taste. The circumstance should here be mentioned that castor-oil is the only oil admitting of this treatment; if, for example, it were attempted to combine olive-oil with alcohol, the operator would soon find he had taken trouble in vain. Between the two no union would ensue; and the same remark applies to every oil, with the exception of castor-oil.

The hair of human beings, as well as of animals, holds sulphur in its composition, and retains this element obstinately. Thus, if a scrap of flannel, a thousand times or even ten thousand times washed, be taken and analyzed for sulphur, this element will invariably be found. It is a property of sulphur—and more especially of a certain sulphur containing gas—to turn several metallic combinations black. Lead is one of the metals in this category, and accordingly lead has formed the basis of more than one hair-dye. Bismuth is another of these metals, and silver another; the blackening function of silver salts, however, when used as hair-dyes, is not wholly referable to this sulphurous reaction.

THORNS IN THE FLESH OF A MARRIED MAN.

MY DEAR BAZAR,—The spring has come. The spring with its glory of birds and flowers, its singing brooks and humming bees, its house-cleaning and dress-makers. It is upon these last two subjects that I wish more particularly to address you, for I have been credibly informed that you, more than any other paper, appeal to the hearts of the ladies. Those tender organs I also would touch to-day in behalf of my unfortunate brethren similarly situated with myself. The dear creatures have unbounded respect for any thing they see in print; and, between you and me, it is very possible my own wife may read these remarks and never dream they proceed from her husband. For I am a timid man; and when she bears down upon me in the magnificence of her new spring suit my tongue cleaves to the roof of my mouth, and I can only admire.

But, as I was saying, it is May with its perfect weather, its unfolding trees and flowers, and yet; with all the outdoor attractions, and my own cordial invitations, I see no more of this wife of mine than if she was an evening acquaintance. Do you ask me why? She is house-cleaning and dress-making. Ever since the middle of March buckets of water have been traveling up stairs, carpets have promenade down to be shaken, walls have been whitewashed, closets emptied, and a general state of confusion has prevailed. I sometimes pinch myself by way of making sure of my personal identity, for it is really difficult to discover my own clothes, and the new set of shirts I bought only last fall are scattered no one knows whither.

It is a terrible condition of things. And to crown it all, my wife assures me that it is an absolute necessity which must be undergone every spring and fall, or she will lose her reputation as a housekeeper. As I am a young married man I don't venture to contradict her, for I suppose I know nothing about it. When I was a bachelor and had my suite of rooms there never seemed to be any house-cleaning, and I knew where to find every thing. But bless you, nowadays I shudder at the thought of the missing books and papers, and long in vain for the snug library-table which formerly held all my treasures undisturbed. And when I consider that thousands of men all through the length and breadth of the land are in the same bewildered state of mind at this very same time I lose myself in the vastness of the conception, and my only relief is to write you.

But the worst is yet to be told. Shortly after the commencement of the house-cleaning raid appeared a tall angular female with a round plump assistant, and took possession of our spare room. My wife informed me very decidedly that as times were hard she had concluded to economize by having her dresses made and altered at home, and she hoped I would do my best to make it pleasant to the artiste. I endeavored feebly to commend her course, but my heart misgave me as I noted the comfortable installation of the treasure, and feared the quarters might be too attractive. So it has proved. The April days have lengthened into May; the robes, and sacques, and walking-suits, are heaped up around her;

"And that female still is sitting,
Still is sitting, still is sitting,
On the pleasant chair with rockers just within the chamber door."

I will not finish the quotation for fear I might be tempted to be too severe.

Every fine day my wife goes shopping, and returns laden with "the cheapest things—real bargains," not to mention the variety of brown paper parcels, which make their appearance in the course of the afternoon and evening. When I occasionally suggest that she may be accumulating more than one woman can well carry on her back, she silences me with an estimate of the amount she is saving by having her dresses made at home, and wonders how I can be so hard-hearted, when Madame considers these things indispensable to her position in society. Of course, I do not say another word, but submit it to you as a critic of discretion whether the trimmings and fandangos with which Madame sees fit to decorate the garments may not be almost as costly sometimes as the foundation.

In this pleasant spring weather our friends are liable to drop in upon us to spend the night, for I am a man of hospitable inclinations, and like to have my spare room occupied. But, for that matter, it is tenanted already; and as the dress-maker must not be disturbed, my wife and I give up our own snug apartment, and make ourselves uncomfortable in the attic, which, by reason of the house-cleaning hitherto adverted to, is not the most inviting place in the world.

Of course, the dress-maker comes to the table. My better half says it is the custom; that her feelings would be outraged by any other treatment; and so I am constrained twice a day to contemplate her angular features, as well as the plump, rounded ones of her assistant. No more cozy little talks with my wife on family topics. I really begin to feel almost like an interloper in my own house; for she never by any chance addresses me, and I am bound to do my duty in heaping up the dress-makers' plates. It is wonderful what appetites the creatures have. Before I have thought of my own dinner they are ready for a second helping, and their tastes are so very discriminating with regard to the best cuts. It seems to me if I devoured fashion-plates all day long, and bit off my thread in the same manner they do, I shouldn't care for much else; but they are a singular race of beings, and I am having a fine opportunity to study them up.

Then the materials of the trade. Every time I go up stairs I must navigate carefully amidst waves of muslins, and baréges, and poplins, and repeat the skipping-rope of my very juvenile days in frantic capers over braids and trimmings. It is really wonderful that one female's wardrobe can consume so much; but my lady assures me she doesn't begin to compare with most of her sex, and wishes I could only see the dresses of some of her friends. I do not wish it at all; indeed I have quite enough to see as it is, and would willingly shut out some of the contemplation.

Moreover, I fully and firmly believe that these doings will be the death of me yet. From my earliest days I have been impressed with a great horror of lock-jaw, more immediately that produced by running a needle into one's flesh. And although I have never had any experience of the disease I am convinced it will be my fate, and at present it seems to be approaching. Wherever I go there are needles. I have picked up a score at least in our own room; I encounter them in the chairs, in the table-cover, in my wife's dress, when for the sake of Auld Lang Syne I incautiously put my arm around her.

What is to be done? To prohibit the introduction of these feminine weapons of warfare would never do, yet by their continued importation I am daily in greater danger. My life hangs, not on a thread, but a needle. I no longer dare to change my boots for slippers when I come home in the evening, and am now seriously meditating the propriety of sleeping in them, as it is altogether possible there may be needles in the bed. Were it not for my dread of finding a needle in a haystack I should certainly encamp on one during this reign of terror; but I haven't a doubt I should be pursued even there.

And my wife actually has the hard-heartedness to laugh at me—to tell me there is no occasion for my fears. Nay, more. I am convinced she has confidentially informed the dress-maker of them, for that individual looks at me more savagely than ever, and I have detected a piercing glance which suggested danger. What if the infuriated female should stick me with a needle, and pretend she mistook me for a pin-cushion. It is terrible to contemplate.

Several times I have been on the point of making my will, but have desisted in the hope that things would improve and the dress-maker vacate. But there are no signs. The ruffling and stitching still go on in one part of the house, and the scrubbing and cleaning in another, while the harvest of needles is unabated. I was even forced the other day to take refuge in a closet merely for the sake of peace and quietness.

How long this state of affairs will continue I am not prepared to say. I have always been a great advocate of matrimony; but I ask you, my dear Bazar, in all honesty and earnestness, can I conscientiously recommend it to my bachelor friends any longer? Am I justified in advising them to take upon themselves the martyrdom to which I am to be subjected every six months for the rest of my natural life? It seems to me a terrible responsibility.

I have heard traditions of times when the young women did not require such multitudinous costumes, when one or two afternoon dresses sufficed them, instead of one or two dozen; when they thought themselves well-dressed in neat calicoes, and did not trouble their heads about the many fashions. But then those days were very long ago. I have always considered my wife a pattern of good sense, but if in the matter of wardrobe I must keep pace with her, may a needle stick into me and end my miseries!

What would you think of establishing Retreats for Married Men during the semi-annual periods of house-cleaning and dress-making? I have an idea of getting up a company, a sort of Life Insurance affair, you know, and am convinced the stock would be taken in less than no time.

They might be arranged somewhat on the plan of asylums for nervous patients, where the parties could compare their respective experiences, and perhaps suggest a project for the alleviation of this constantly-increasing and distressing evil. To be sure, they might be detrimental to the young men who have an idea of getting married, and who, seeing such arrangements, might be induced to withdraw into their bachelor shells again.

But something must be done. The future of the country imperatively demands it. Are men much longer to be slaves to scrubbing-brushes and needles? to go about in terror of their lives on account of these domestic invasions? If the ladies will not take the matter in hand we must do it ourselves. The consequences will be tremendous in the enormous increase of bachelors, but the blame will rest with the fair perpetrators of the mischief.

We have heard of Women's Rights meetings long enough, and I have never encouraged them; but now I deem it my duty immediately to set about forming a Humane Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Married Men.

Then, when the fatal needle comes which shall sew me up finally, I shall feel that my jaws were not locked until they had given utterance to noble and enlightened sentiments in behalf of the suffering classes of mankind who are now patiently enduring the tortures of dress-making and house-cleaning.

A VICTIM.

AMERICANS ABROAD.

AMERICAN nature is essentially active and locomotive, and St. Aldegonde's device—repos ailleurs—might be the motto of the nation. The untiring energy which, regarding toil as a pleasure, has made Americans what they are, seems equally to make their pleasures a toil. If they staid quietly at home and stuck steadily to business, they would probably lead happier lives, as they would die richer men. But fashion, curiosity, and restlessness send them abroad. They may make the pursuit of the dollar the great aim of their lives, but, like all good sportsmen, it is the chase more than its object that fascinates them; and if they like making money, they think that spending it is the next pleasantest thing. They behave toward their neighbors with free-handed generosity, and the most hard-working citizen may well feel at times liberally disposed toward himself, and inclined to take a holiday. They love excitement, and it is far more congenial to their tastes to rush over the world, scattering their money, than to lounge their leisure away in the hotels of Newport or Saratoga, while they toss their dollars by handfuls out of the windows. But the habits and feelings of a life are not to be cast aside with its tasks. To flâner is an art not to be acquired at will; it is impossible all of a sudden to discharge the mind of its load of care and business, and to fill it with trifles, or with what may pass for such. Moreover, Americans, on landing in the Old World, find themselves with a boundless field before them to be explored, and with very inadequate time to give to it. While conscience bids them halt at one particular place, a thousand others with no less pressing claims beckon them onward. We may sympathize with the despondency with which a slightly-educated foreigner must start on a six months' tour among countless unfamiliar objects; and when he has cultivated his mind a little, and knows something of Europe and its associations, despondency must be apt to merge itself in blank despair. An American must start for Europe with an oppressive consciousness of the shortness of life. His best comfort during the enforced inactivity of the ten days' passage lies in the thought that the most powerful engines which imperfect science can construct are bearing him onward. Still, inaction is generating a propulsive force that shoots him forward on his journey the instant he sets foot on European soil. Americans abroad are a peculiar people who carry the unmistakable stamp of their nationality in their features, costume, and manners. You may know them at a glance, as easily as a Jew or a gipsy. And, disguise themselves as they may, they have but to open their mouths to be betrayed by their speech. The consciousness of mutual prejudices keeps them apart from the nations among whom they are traveling, even where difference of language does not interpose its barrier. They roll through Europe like so many erratic globules of mercury, refusing to blend with foreign substances, but with an irresistible natural affinity for each other.

Male tourists, having but little time to waste in sacrificing to the graces, generally carry valises so light as hardly to be classed as impedimenta. When accompanied by their families, things are very different. One can not easily forget those huge black leather packing-cases, numbered and made to a pattern, which, when raised by the combined strength of the railway staff, fall with a crash on the roof of the hotel omnibus that waits with its grumbling load. You read on their tops in fair white characters the names, the streets, the cities, and the native States of your fellow-travelers. At least they may give you a clew to the political proclivities of the owners, and save you the risk of outraging delicate sensibilities in the course of conversation. They contain the gorgeous toilettes with which, at tables d'hôte, the ladies of the party dazzle English and Teutonic guests, and outshine even French ones. With American birds of passage, one remarks, as an ornithological phenomenon, that while the male is severely sober in his attire, the female is gorgeous in her jeweled and golden plumage. She generally carries it off wonderfully well, although a sensitive taste might have suggested a more suitable apparel. Looking at the men, we may fancy that the Anglo-Saxon race deteriorates in the New World, but there can be no question that America is prolific of pretty women. Looking at the graceful figures, piquant features, and transparent complexions of the younger ladies, we can understand, if we can not excuse, Hawthorne's severe strictures on English beauty. But indolent habits and incommensurate appetites are a trying ordeal, and Europeans soothe their startled patriotism by remarking the faded roses around whom those fair buds are clustered. Ladies and their luggage must, of course, somewhat hinder locomotion, but still even large family parties get through a very creditable quantity of work. It says much for the energy of the head of the house that he can so well overcome the vis inertiae of his womankind. Ladies naturally care more than men do to study "the conventionalities of that amazing Europe," and, amidst all the hurry of their journey, the glitter of even petty Courts has irresistible attractions for them. American diplomatists are by no means suffered to eat the bread of idleness, and they see much more of their compatriots than would satisfy the most ardent home affections. Such distractions apart, the ladies show themselves helpmeets for their husbands or fathers when they come to dispatching Alps and lakes, and churches and picture-galleries. One can not help speculating on the mental results of their extraordinary industry. What a glare and blaze of color, like the bits of painted glass shaken up in a kaleidoscope, must be present to their minds' eye after racing round all the Titians, Tintoretts, and Pauls Veronese of Venice! What a nightmare of Christian saints and Pagan gods, dying cardinals and snakes wreathing themselves round Madonnas, after a rush through Rome from the Vatican to the Capitol! Cook's excursionists may feed equally quickly, but at least they swallow less at a time, and have a better chance of digesting it.

The very reverse of their traveling compatriots are the Americans who, settling in Europe, have generally made France the land of their adoption. They look on their wandering countrymen much as a colony of Romanized Goths might have regarded the incursions of their barbarian kinsfolk. They see in them, grotesquely caricatured, certain national peculiarities which, as they are too conscious, still taint themselves. The two classes have really very few feelings in common. French Americans are in many respects denationalized, and take little interest in the politics of their country, except in so far as its finance and taxation affect them. They have plenty of patriotism, but it lies dormant until roused by some such stimulus as a civil war. Like the Saxon courtiers at the Norman Court of the Confessor, with sound American hearts they affect the society, the manners, the dress and language of the foreigner. As to the language, the second generation takes to it so easily as to prove that it is merely want of opportunity that prevents the ordinary American from surpassing the boasted proficiency of the Russian. Foreign Americans must have large incomes. Paris is at best no place for a poor and idle man, and the brilliancy of their equipages, the splendor of the ladies' toilettes, outshine in the Bois de Boulogne the mass of Russians and Mexicans and French of the haute finance. But they are generally rather young men, many of them of old Dutch or English families, and most of them with fathers in the States, whose chief duty it seems to be to see that their sons' allowances are regularly paid. Their manners savor perhaps rather of the ease of the French school than of the rigid Puritanism of New England, but they are not the less pleasant companions that the angularities of national prejudices have smoothed themselves down. Whether at Paris in spring, at the sea-side in summer, or at Pau in winter, their hospitality is boundless, even under circumstances that might excuse them from offering any. You have time really to become acquainted with them, and they grow upon you day by day. Indeed, the more you know of Americans of every class, the more convinced do you become that there is generally sterling ore under the least prepossessing exterior. The worst of it is that, as they shoot rapidly by, people only catch a glimpse of the surface, and can but guess at what there is beneath. It would be unjust to dismiss Americans abroad without a reference to those whose books have done so much to add to the charms of travel. One can not forget how Washington Irving has peopled the Alhambra and Andalusia with figures that live and breathe; how Motley and Prescott have rummaged out of the dust-covered archives of Simancas a series of portraits of character scarcely less vivid than those of Titian or Velasquez, nor can one be ungrateful for such pleasant gossip as Story's Roba di Roma.

A CITY AT PLAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

"LES Anglais n'aiment pas s'amuser, n'est-ce pas, madame?"

This remark (which at once removed the pleasing delusion as to my own French, which her amiable politeness had caused) was made to me by a respectable, middle-aged Parisienne, of the bourgeois class, perhaps a little below it—for she wore no bonnet, but one of those snowy white caps, which no English laundress could hope to rival. She and I stood together, clinging to the railings of the high walk which bounds the Jardin des Tuileries, and looking down the Rue de Rivoli toward the Place de la Concorde, across which the procession of Le Bœuf Gras was to pass. For this was the second of the three days of Carnival, and though it was still grand matin—not much past nine A.M.—and the sharp east wind shook angrily the black trees behind us, and there was not a ray of sunshine even in sunshiny Paris—nevertheless all the Parisian world and his wife, and especially all their children, were abroad—"pour s'amuser."

Of course, business still went on down the Rue de Rivoli, at least in the centre of it. There were the usual heavy country carts drawn by white Norman horses, queerly caparisoned, driven by blue-bloused peasants, who looked as if they had never been in Paris before; the lumbering omnibuses, also with white horses (I think nine-tenths of the French horses are either white or gray); the incessant remises and fiacres, and the occasional carriages. But down each side the street flowed a continual stream of people, apparently idle people. At every convenient corner they gathered into groups, and all along the Tuileries railings they hung in a row, like pins stuck on a pin-paper, wedged as close as they could be.

I had tried to be polite to my right-hand neighbor, but she was grumpy—the only grumpy Frenchwoman I ever met. Perhaps she thought herself in too low company, for she was a shade higher in rank than my left-hand friend: she wore a bonnet, and a velvet one, too. My meek attempts at conversation she altogether snubbed, and when I dared to borrow a hand-bill she carried—a Promenade du Bœuf Gras with a description (my own had none)—and began copying it in pencil on my knee, she eyed me with exceeding distrust, as if I were plotting something against the State. With her imposing size—she was decidedly fat—she contrived to render my footing so insecure that I certainly should have slipped down from the railings, had it not been for my good-natured friend on the other side, the bourgeoise aforesaid.

Consequently, the good woman and I entered into sociable conversation about the Bœuf Gras, the coming procession, and the Carnival in general, which, I had heard, was expected to be particularly good this year.

My neighbor shook her head: "Ah, if madame had seen it, as I remember it, twenty years ago!" And she kept repeating the words—il y a vingt ans—with a lingering emphasis, then burst into a voluble description of what the Paris Carnival was then, in the midst suddenly making the remark with which I have begun this paper.

I quite agreed with her in her opinion concerning our nation, but said that some hereditary French blood in me made me an exception to the rule, and though I was an Englishwoman, I very much liked to—How shall I translate that quite untranslatable verb, s'amuser? It does not mean "to be amused," that is, by other people—the dreariest sort of amusement I know; still less does it imply "to amuse one's self," in a solitary, selfish spirit. I take it to express most nearly the occupation of children at play, not bent upon any special entertainment, but simply catching the humor of the moment, snatching the present as it flies, and looking neither behind nor before—a condition of mind not only harmless, but often excellently wise, and which my Parisienne was quite right in supposing was with us English only too rare.

Yes, as a nation we certainly do not care to amuse ourselves. Nothing would ever make any of our cities or towns wear the aspect of that "city at play," such as I saw it during the three days of Carnival. And, descending from the aggregate to the individual in that gay crowd, nothing certainly could have been further from the mind of any middle-aged British matron than to turn out from her home and her family, at nine o'clock on a bleak February morning, and spend an hour or so quite alone, perched like a bird upon a railing, waiting for the passing by of a rather childish show, and doing this, as my Parisienne did, simply pour s'amuser.

Yet I neither blame nor praise her: I merely give the fact. It is only on returning to this excellent, rich, hard-working, but just a little too solemn England, that the drop or two of French blood in me—the reference to which my Parisienne received with congratulatory approval—makes me linger with a certain pleasure over a few pictures left by this carnival city—wishing secretly, perhaps, that there was with us at home a little less work, a little more play—actual play.

It was on a Sunday, of course, that the fun began—a true February day, bright and bleak; the sunshine clear, as Paris sunshine always is; the cold biting, intense, as Paris cold well knows how to be, so that crossing the great square of the Louvre made one feel as if one were being kissed and killed in a breath. Now, there are elements in a Paris Sunday which will always make it repellent—I will not say repulsive—to the British mind. The streets looking just as upon a week-day; work going on as usual, without a sign of the day of rest; the shops universally open, save the very few who boldly mark on their closed shutters, "Fermée au Dimanche." No; we can not—I fervently trust we never shall—reconcile ourselves to this total ignoring of Sabbath repose, which, based merely upon human grounds, seems such a vital necessity.

But if the shops are open, so are the churches. Soon after eight A.M. I went in and joined a throng of worshippers, chiefly working-people, men and women, who in England would probably have been sleeping off the Saturday night's overeating or overdrinking in their beds. And, without being in the least inclined to Roman Catholicism, or that hybrid form of it, Ritualism, I say decidedly—I wish every one of our churches was open every day and all day long. Undoubtedly, before it began to play, the city said its prayers, and very earnest prayers too. Then, about noon, it turned out in all its best clothes—and the best clothes of a young or even old Parisienne are very different from those of a cockney—inundating the streets with pretty, suitable, tasteful toilettes. There were very few bonnets, or the apologies for bonnets that women wear now, the lower classes imitating the higher, ad nauseam, but in their stead the universal capuchon of violet, scarlet, black, and white, the most becoming head-dress any woman could wear. And the dresses were all decently short—no street-sweeping; while as to the petticoats, their variety was a sight to behold!

I can not say the women were pretty—not even in holiday clothes—but they all looked bright and gay as holiday-makers should. They came out in twos and threes, pairs of sweet-hearts, or knots of female companions. There were many domestic groups—the father, mother, and one child: a quiet triad—for children in Paris are not over-numerous, and grave as little old men and women. One misses the constant gush of child-life which overflows our London in park, street, alley, and square. Instead, comes another item of street-population, wholly unknown to us, those odd-looking Zouaves, with their queer, sharp, brown faces and dark, wistful eyes, almost like children's eyes, whom one meets every dozen yards or so, wandering vaguely about like strange creatures newly caught, and not quite naturalized yet.

Such were a few of the elements of this holiday crowd, which began to circulate about, hither and thither, after le Bœuf Gras, this foule immense (as it is called with a naïveté very foreign to our mural inscriptions, on the base of Cleopatra's Needle, at the Place de la Concorde), which is said to give its rulers so much trouble, because it will insist upon being amused. As a curious confirmation of this, and of the vital difference between the two races, English and French, I was informed by one who had had many years' opportunity of testing the fact, that the Paris Préfet's daily list of criminal accusations was always shorter after a fête-day than at any other time. I am afraid our police-sheet of any given 26th of December, or Easter-Tuesday, would not show the same.

Yet a London crowd is a fine sight. The "many-headed monster thing" is rather a noble beast than not. Courageous, self-reliant, well-behaved—generous too, with a rough sense of justice, and an admiration for "pluck"—a stanch stickler for its own rights, yet not encroaching on those of its neighbor; and having, in the main, that quick sympathy with the good, and contempt for the bad, which is found invariably in large masses of men, as if to prove, in spite of the doctrine of original sin, that the deepest stratum of human nature is not bad, but good. But on its "general holidays," the brightest of them, say a royal marriage or funeral—for both come alike to the too-rare holiday-makers—the British public is a somewhat sullen animal, who takes its pleasures with a solemn rapacity, knowing they are but few, and is rather hard to deal with, tenacious of affront, obnoxious to harsh rule, proud to grumble loudly at its voluntary hardships. Besides, a large proportion of it is not "on pleasure bent" at all, but pursuing its vocation, whether of pocket-picking, seat-letting, or orange and cake selling, with a business-like pertinacity, never turned aside by such a small thing as amusement.

Now, this Paris foule seems wholly bent on amusing itself. "Toujours gai" is its motto, written plainly on its face; and to this end every body is on the best possible terms with every body. No jostling, no scrambling. Its "looped and windowed raggedness" is as civil and even courteous as velvet and lace. "Monsieur" and "Madame" are heard on every side, and the vast multitude is on such excellent terms with itself and every body else, that it goes swaying on as easily as a mass of sea-waves.

All this with us is utterly unknown. In London I should no more have ventured to go about all day as I did in Paris than I would have penetrated into the monkeys' cage at the Zoological Gardens. Quite safe, no doubt, but exceedingly uncomfortable. Now, here, it was more than comfortable—agreeable. The studies of life were endless: whether we let ourselves be floated through the Palais Royal or Rue de Rivoli, or mingled in the thinner crowd which filled like an ever-moving kaleidoscope the Tuileries Gardens, feeding the swans, or looking—no, I fear very few looked—at the sunset. Yet what a sunset it was!—radiant with all the colors of spring; and how it gleamed on the white statues and lit up in wonderful clearness the long straight line—perhaps the finest straight line of street in any city—which extends from the palace of the Tuileries up to the Arc de Triomphe.

We left it there—this gay crowd—and caught it up again, as I stated, on the Monday morning, eager at its pleasures, and waiting with infantile delight for the passing of the celebrated procession of the Bœuf Gras.

And here, to show that there is another and a serious hard-working side to this city at play, I will make a divergence.

The show was a very fine show in its way. It was composed of about five hundred people, besides horses. It had six emblematic chars descriptive of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America; besides a Char d'Olympe filled with gods and goddesses, and a Char d'Agriculture, wherein rode the twelve months and the four seasons. All these were dressed in the most classic style, and with, I must say, remarkably good taste. Then there was a huge char full of costumed musicians, playing their very lives out, and a troop of cavaliers peaux rouges twenty or more, who sat their horses with a skill more belonging to the Hippodrome than to the backwoods of America; and in the midst journeyed the garlanded gilt-horned victims, the four bœufs gras—Mignon, le Lutteur masqué, Paul Forestier, and lastly Gulliver, a magnificent beast, who, with his huge head tied safely down, turned on the throng those large, patient, pathetic eyes that oxen have. All this procession, which traversed Paris street by street for three days, stopping at the principal public offices and private abodes, for royal or noble largesse, was under the arrangement and at the expense of a certain M. Duval, a bourgeois hero in his way.

In La Petite Presse of that day—one of those flaccid journals, so limp as to their paper, so florid and grandiose in their style—I found an account of him—which, in its dramatic form of putting things, almost rivaled the feuilleton which followed—a tale describing "la prison de Clark-enweld" [sic.], and the interior of Newgate, in a manner strikingly original. If I remember rightly the Governor, a Sir Somebody Something, is a gentleman of bland manners, always smiling, who, handling his own keys, escorts an amazed Frenchman through Newgate to the condemned cell, which they find fitted up as a mortuary chapel, the soul of the criminal having just departed in an exemplary manner, surrounded by lighted candles and all the last rites of the Catholic Church. This par parenthèse, though it strikes us with an alarming humility; lest our pictures of foreigners should unwittingly be as far from the truth as theirs of ourselves.

Scarcely less peculiar is the sketch of M. Duval, the "acquéreur des bœufs gras," as he terms himself. It is so funny, in its serio-comic sentiment, and its reckless trenching upon what we call in England "the sanctities of private life," that I can not resist translating it entire.

"Rue de Rome, numero 5. Behold us, standing opposite one of those grand mansions whose mere exterior implies wealth and commerce. There lives M. Duval, with his family. There also is his place of business, where he carries on the administration of his vast enterprises, his bouillons, laundries, bakers' and butchers' shops, his aquarium, etc., etc. M. Duval is a great capitalist, who loves to employ his capital in many different spheres of action. He possesses an Egeria; his wife, an admirable woman of business, clever alike in advising and in acting. He has a son and heir, twenty years old, now qualifying himself by the translating of Livy and Tacitus to preside at his father's slaughter-houses, who listens to the lowing of Virgil's kine, and studies under Pliny the habits of fish.

"Around Generalissimo Duval gravitates a whole army of employés; yearly some new battle-field is won. Now it is a wine and spirit shop, newly opened at Berry; again a washing and baking establishment, conducted on the same principle as the world-known bouillons, or else it is the great aquarium on the Boulevard Montmartre, which cost its projector 230,000 francs. 'Too much,' said the gossips.—M. Duval listened, smiling.—During the Exposition of 1867 250,000 persons visited his fish! This fact shows his success—another will prove how well he deserves it. He found out that his piscine flock would not thrive on shore sea-water; he immediately chartered a Dieppe steamer, and went out into deep-sea water, bringing back to Paris, not only quantities of fish, but oceans of their native element.

"M. Duval's best claim to public gratitude is the establishment of his bouillons économiques, the noble substitutes for those execrable gargotes, familiar to all who have known Paris for the last twenty years, as being the only place where one could get a dinner at from 19 to 25 sous. In their stead—from 1840 to 1845—the Dutch bouillons vainly tried to succeed. M. Duval caught the idea, improved upon it, and beginning at the Rue de la Monnaie, created the twelve establishments which now bear his name.

"At first he only supplied bouillon and beef, but soon the bill of fare was extended. The Parisian public fully appreciated these restaurants, where, for the same low price as heretofore, one was excellently served in airy rooms, on marble tables, with well-cooked food of first-rate quality, which one could eat without being poisoned. True, the portions were each rather small; but huge eaters might call for a second portion without ruining themselves. Twenty or thirty sous will procure a capital dinner at the Bouillons Duval.

"Besides, there are no waiters; but waitresses, which gives employment to a number of women. Undoubtedly, one might greatly desire with Michelet and other political economists, that the wages of the husband and father should always suffice for the family, while the wife sinks into her true place as mother and manager at home. The children's education, and the whole moral life of the household, would gain much thereby. But, alas! facts are against M. Michelet. His theory is but a beautiful dream. Practically, the husband's wages are not sufficient to maintain the family. The wife must work likewise; and those who help her to work—in a feminine way—do much good in their generation. The number of girls and women employed by M. Duval must have benefited many a household.

"Let us visit one of the bouillons; take, for instance, the one in the Rue de Rivoli" (where this present writer solemnly avers that she and a friend—neither of them huge eaters, but yet sufficiently and wholesomely hungry with Paris sight-seeing—lunched admirably off meat, potatoes, bread, and macaroni, for the large sum of a franc and a half—say seven-pence half-penny apiece).

"On entering we are presented with a printed bill of fare—meats and wines, the price of each plainly marked. We sit down at a table of white marble, adorned with the little equipage of pepper and salt, and the decanter containing clear, cool water, sparkling and fresh. Immediately there comes to us a young woman, neatly dressed in white apron and spotless muslin cap; she takes our orders, and writes upon our carte whatever we desire—potage, bouillon, meat, vegetables, wine. We are served accurately and rapidly. The plates, knives, and forks are clean and abundant. If we wish, an additional sous will procure us a table-napkin. We eat leisurely or fast, but we need be in no hurry, and may take time to notice the many respectable occupants of other tables, even single women, who look like governesses or ladies out shopping for the day, feeding as comfortably and decorously as ourselves. Our repast ended we lay our carte on the counter; it is added up in the twinkling of an eye by the clerk, usually a woman too, who sits there; we pay, and the thing is done. No fees to the waitresses—M. Duval reckons all that in their salaries. Their civility is genuine, and quite independent of a possible sous.

"If necessary, even a gourmand can dine at the Bouillons Duval. One may see figuring on the carte St. Julien at three francs, and Champagne at four francs fifty centimes the bottle. But these are beyond the usual requirements of M. Duval's customers.

"A word about the great man himself. He was born in 1811, at Monthéry. At twenty, he was a poor butcher-boy in Paris; at thirty, he found himself by his own industry on the high-road to fortune. He has had many failures, many disappointments, but has overcome them all. M. Duval is a man of middle stature, bright complexion, red-bearded, with brown hair. He speaks much, and with a natural and proud satisfaction of all he has done and all he means to do. Nothing is too fine for him—nothing too great. 'Still, take care of the money,' whispers gently Madame Duval.

"Ordinarily the husband follows the advice of the wife, as all good husbands should do; but in this case he has not done it. In the lavishly splendid procession of the Bœuf Gras M. Duval has listened to nobody, unless it be to his classically-educated son in describing to him the costumes of Greece and Rome."

Very grand the costumes were, and accurate likewise. And if under Minerva's helmet, or the flowery garland of May (who had hard work, poor soul, to quiet a hungry, thinly-clad, rather obstreperous baby), were faces not absolutely classical, which looked worn, sallow, and pinched in the sharp morning air—why, what could you expect? I only hope M. Duval gave each of his gods and goddesses a real good mortal dinner at one of his bouillons.

Besides these live personages, the mechanical appliances of the show were very good. I still recall with a childish satisfaction the big, calm (artificial) sphinx, sitting with her paws stretched out, and her eyes gazing right forward, as is the custom of sphinxes; the huge stuffed elephant, a little shaky on the legs, but majestic still; and above all, the gigantic bœuf, made of colored bladders, that floated airily over the last char, attached only by a slender string. This string was cut just in front of the balcony of the Tuileries, when the extraordinary animal soared at once skyward, balloon-fashion, to the ecstasy—the newspapers record—of the young Prince Imperial, and causing even the grim Emperor himself to break into a smile.

Whenever during the three days we met the procession, an eager crowd always followed, flattening itself against railings, filling street doorways, and raising itself in tiers of heads upon the steps of churches, just as our crowds do, only with twice as much merriment and good-humor. And when, though tracking it out of Paris proper to the suburban district of Les Terres, we still felt its results in having to sit for twenty minutes in the last of a row of six omnibuses all complet, but each waiting patiently the hour of starting, we could not help noticing its exceeding cheerfulness. All the passengers chattered away together in the shrillest and most joyous French, but nobody complained of the long delay—nobody scolded the conductor. I do not say the French are a better race than we, but they are certainly better-tempered, especially when out for a holiday.

Mardi-Gras, the last day of the festival, brought a sight I shall not soon forget. It was a lovely spring evening, and down the Champs Elysées the people swarmed like bees in the sunshine, all classes and ranks together. Some drove down the centre way in handsome carriages, mostly filled with children, whose happy faces peered brightly over the white fur or bear-skin rugs which enveloped them. Others, well-dressed and respectable folk, sat in groups on the chairs and benches, as if it were summer-time. While the "lower orders," as we call them, formed one smooth, settled line along the edge of the pavé, behind which was another line, continually in motion, until at the Place de la Concorde it coagulated into one compact mass.

There the people stood, the setting sun shining on their merry faces, on the very spot where, scarcely a generation ago, their fathers and mothers had seen the "son of Saint Louis" remorselessly executed; whence, afterward his queen and widow gave that last pathetic glance toward the Tuileries Gardens, and died silently, a queen to the end. Sad and strange, infinitely sad and strange! Almost incredible, one would think, watching the Paris of to-day. But as one traverses that wonderful modern city, yearly changing so fast: new streets, avenues, and faubourgs rising, until historical Paris is almost entirely obliterated—"It is not desirable for us to have a history," said a Parisian one day to me—one can not help wondering what will be the story of the future—what new events, what possible tragedies may still be enacted there.

But the only tragedy to-day was that of the bœuf gras, which, after his three days' triumph, was now borne relentlessly to the Palais de l'Industrie. All that crowd was waiting to see him enter there, never to emerge again except as beef. Yet he had had his day. Portraits of him were circulating about the streets—one of which, a splendid broadside, we bought. It contains, besides a gorgeous engraving of the procession, two poems, one of which has a curious thread of pathos running through its buffoonery. Here it is, done into English from its Nivernais patois:

LE DERNIER VOYAGE DE GULLIVER.

"Ha, ha! the fever of success
Burns in my veins. So fat—so fair!
Of all the oxen of Nièvre
I am the biggest and most rare;
All envy me, the beast of price—
And from my flank will have a slice:
Alas, to be too beautiful
Is dangerous both to man—and bull!"

"When in my village home I dwell
How happy was I all day long!
Now in a gilded car I ride
The glory of the Paris throng.
The Carnival—the Carnival
I am the centre of it all!
But ah! to be so much caressed
Is good for neither man nor beast.

"Once in my quiet country meads
I cropped the cool, delicious grass:
Beside my sweet companion cow
How cheerful, how content I was!
Now parted from my better-half
I moan and pine like any calf:
And torn from her, green fields, fresh air,
I weep my lot in being too fair!"

"Adieu, fat pastures that I loved!
Adieu, my innocent pleasures all,
My last, last journey now I take
To grace the Paris Carnival.
What fate is mine! I ride in state,
Descend, am killed, and cooked, and ate.
Alas, to be too beautiful
Is death alike to man—and bull!"

There is a second poem, "Causerie d'un Bœuf Masqué," but it is written in such queer patois, and so full of puns and references to the Paris slang of the day, that I should despair of making it intelligible either in French or English. But it is at least quite harmless, which is more than can be said of every thing Parisian.

Nevertheless, perfectly harmless, so far at least as we witnessed it—which was up to ten o'clock p.m.—on Mardi-Gras, seemed the fun of the Paris streets, carnival fun though it was. We quitted the thronged Place de la Concorde with the sun setting upon the poor bœuf's last hour of life, and very thankful to know the victim was only a bœuf; nor did we reappear again on the surface of the city till eight p.m., when its aspect had altogether changed.

At first, rather for the worse. Every shop was shut. The bright line of the Boulevards was now one long darkness. All those cheery boutiques where Madame la boutiquière may generally be seen composedly sitting at her evening work, or chatting with her friends, were closed and silent. Here and there only, in some of the paved alleys, there was a photographer's window or a cigar shop open, to illuminate the spot. But to various places of amusement—theatres, masked balls, and so on—there were endless directions, guiding stars, done in gold, and flaring gas inscriptions, to attract the crowd. It thickened and thickened, until it flowed down the pavement in three continuous streams, two downward and one upward, chiefly composed of the under-world, the working-world of Paris; but, so far as we could judge, entirely respectable. All were strictly decorous in their dress, manners, and behavior; and as they gathered round the few illuminated windows, the light showed their faces to be no worse than most holiday faces—perhaps better—for the universal white cap and neat capuchon gave to the women an air of decent grace which one rarely sees under the flaunting, shabby, flower-bedecked bonnets of the corresponding class in London. Most of them, whether young or elderly, were escorted by some male friend, husband, or sweet-heart—upon whose arm, or both his arms, they merrily hung, to the detriment of his invariable cigar. But I can not say the Paris men are either so attractive or so respectable-looking as the Paris women.

By-and-by, the night being fine, the spaces in front of the restaurants began to fill. The crowd settled down to take its café as usual in the open air. Soon there was a three-deep row of crowded tables, at which sociable family groups chatted and looked about them, and sipped various beverages of apparently innocuous kind. Drink is not the temptation of a Frenchman; not a single drunken man did we see during the whole three days. Would it be so if we had a London carnival?

Nor was there, in spite of the continually increasing crowd, any inconvenient pushing or crushing. That thoroughly French civility, nay courtesy, which I have so often referred to, never failed. Once only there was any thing approaching a rush—when a party of young men and women, dressed for the Opera-ball in fancy costumes, stopped to take their café, visible to all outsiders, at a restaurant. But even then the result was only a scramble and a good stare—the sole expression of feeling on the part of the crowd coming from a peasant lad, who lifted up his hands and eyes in admiration of the women, exclaiming, "C'est éblouissant!"

But soon the throng became almost impassable, especially round the costumiers' shops, where, surrounded by a blaze of satin dominos, white, black, pink, scarlet, and backed by queer masks of all sorts, seamstresses were seen still diligently stitching—hard at work while all Paris was at play—upon ball-costumes. And presently one saw now and then, threading the crowd in their masques and dominos, people who were going to "assist" at that final festivity, the grand masqued ball at the Opera-Comique—said to be the most splendid, attractive, and disgraceful recreation of the city in its holiday mood—at which, I need scarcely say, we were not present. But we caught floating fragments of it pushing through the streets, or humble imitations of it done by ragged lads squeaking in horrible cow's horns from under gigantic noses; while older and less innocent young fools, dressed up in women's clothes, shrieking in shrill treble, and waving broken parasols about their heads, occasionally darted through the crowd, which made way for them and greeted them with shouts of appreciative laughter.

We began to think we had seen enough, and turned our steps chez nous—I will not say home in that homeless city, which Paris must always be to the British heart and mind. But this was the very worst we saw. Into what further amusements—or orgies—the streets degenerated after that hour I can not say, and will not enter into. Every city that ever was built has tendencies and possibilities of being a Nineveh or a Sodom.

But whatever excesses were committed by that queer city at play, they could not have included the whole city, since at eight o'clock next morning, going, as was my wont, into the nearest church (a Roman Catholic church, of course; but I think all good Christians may, on occasion, pray beside Jew, Turk, or heretic—any thing except infidel—and be none the worse for it), I met crowds, actual crowds, of both men and women hurrying to its doors. All sorts of people they were—the working-class, the shop-keeping class—the same class exactly which had filled the streets up to two o'clock on the night before. Now, at that early hour in the morning they were beginning their day by going to basse-messe, or confession, or whatever it was. I never have understood the ins and outs of Roman Catholic services, which to us seem so childish and involved. But of one thing I am certain—the people pray. And it was a curious and startling contrast to all the mirth and revelry of the past three days to see them turn out thus, on a gloomy, damp morning, to commence with earnest worship—at least their countenances implied earnestness—the first day of Carême—what we call Ash-Wednesday.

Les Anglais n'aiment pas s'amuser. No. I am afraid we do not. Races, like individuals, have their special characteristics, which it is useless to fight against, and almost useless to try to alter. Best to leave them as they are, when they are mere "peculiarities," not degenerating into actual sins. Therefore, I am not going to add one word of moralizing—not certainly of condemnation—either of ourselves or our neighbors. Only, that if there are better things, there certainly may be worse things, than this sight which I have here recorded—the sight of a City at Play.

THE OLD SHEPHERD ON HIS PIPE.

WHEN I smoke I sees in my pipe
Sometimes of life a type,
And I think, as my lips I wipe,
A-talking as is my way,
"Here's the spirit, in this red coal,
That puts the life in the bowl;
In the fire I sees the soul
Imprisoned in the clay."

Mayhap I sits in my room,
In the winter evening's gloom,
And, as I think of man's doom,
My spirit a'most it dashes;
For I says, when I stops my breath,
And the pipe goes out, "That's death;
We're dust, as the parson saith"—
And then I knocks out the ashes.

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER LIV.

THE COTTAGE.

WHEN Despard had bound Clark he returned to look after Langhetti. He lay feebly and motionless upon the ground. Despard carefully examined his wounds. His injuries were very severe. His arms were lacerated, and his shoulder torn; blood also was issuing from a wound on the side of his neck. Despard bound these up as best he could, and then sat wondering what could be done next.

He judged that he might be four or five miles from Denton, and saw that this was the place to which he must go. Besides, Beatrice was there, and she could nurse Langhetti. But how could he get there?—that was the question. It was impossible for Langhetti to go on horseback. He tried to form some plan by which this might be done. He began to make a sort of litter to be hung between two horses, and had already cut down with his knife two small trees or rather bushes for this purpose, when the noise of wheels on the road before him attracted his attention.

It was a farmer's wagon, and it was coming from the direction of Denton. Despard stopped it, explained his situation, and offered to pay any thing if the farmer would turn back and convey his friend and his prisoner to Denton. It did not take long to strike a bargain; the farmer turned his horses, some soft shrubs and ferns were strewn on the bottom of the wagon, and on these Langhetti was deposited carefully. Clark, who by this time had come to himself, was put at one end, where he sat grimly and sulkily; the three horses were led behind, and Despard, riding on the wagon, supported the head of Langhetti on his knees.

Slowly and carefully they went to the village. Despard had no difficulty in finding the cottage. It was where the letter had described it. The village inn stood near on the opposite side of the road.

It was about nine o'clock in the evening when they reached the cottage. Lights were burning in the windows. Despard jumped out hastily and knocked. A servant came. Despard asked for the mistress, and Beatrice appeared. As she recognized him her face lighted up with joy. But Despard's face was sad and gloomy. He pressed her hand in silence and said:

"My dear adopted sister, I bring you our beloved Langhetti."

"Langhetti!" she exclaimed, fearfully. "He has met with an accident. Is there a doctor in the place? Send your servant at once."

Beatrice hurried in and returned with Asgeelo. "We will first lift him out," said Despard.

"Is there a bed ready?" "Oh yes! Bring him in!" cried Beatrice, who was now in an agony of suspense.

She hurried after them to the wagon. They lifted Langhetti out and took him into a room which Beatrice showed them. They tenderly laid him on the bed. Meanwhile Asgeelo had hurried off for a doctor, who soon appeared.

Beatrice sat by his bedside; she kissed the brow of the almost unconscious sufferer, and tried in every possible way to alleviate his pain. The doctor soon arrived, dressed his wounds, and left directions for his care, which consisted chiefly in constant watchfulness.

Leaving Langhetti under the charge of Beatrice, Despard went in search of a magistrate. He found one without any difficulty, and before an hour Clark was safe in jail. The information which Despard lodged against him was corroborated by the brands on his back, which showed him to be a man of desperate character, who had formerly been transported for crime.

Despard next wrote a letter to Mrs. Thornton. He told her about Langhetti, and urged her to come on immediately and bring Edith with her. Then he returned to the cottage and wished to sit up with Langhetti. Beatrice, however, would not let him. She said that no one should deprive her of the place by his bedside. Despard remained, however, and the two devoted equal attention to the sufferer. Langhetti spoke only once. He was so faint that his voice was scarce audible. Beatrice put her ear close to his mouth.

"What is it?" asked Despard. "He wants Edith," said Beatrice. "I have written for her," said Despard. Beatrice whispered this to Langhetti. An ecstatic smile passed over his face.

"It is well," he murmured.

CHAPTER LIV.

THE WORM TURNS.

POTTS departed from the Hall in deep dejection. The tremendous power of his enemy had been shown all along; and now that this enemy turned out to be Louis Brandon, he felt as though some supernatural being had taken up arms against him. Against that being a struggle seemed as hopeless as it would be against Fate. It was with some such feeling as this that he left Brandon Hall forever.

All of his grand projects had broken down, suddenly and utterly. He had not a ray of hope left of ever regaining the position which he had but recently occupied. He was thrust back to the obscurity from which he had emerged.

One thing troubled him. Would the power of his remorseless enemy be now stayed—would his vengeance end here? He could scarce hope for this. He judged that enemy by himself, and he knew that he would not stop in the search after vengeance, that nothing short of the fullest and direst ruin—nothing, in fact, short of death itself would satisfy him.

John was with him, and Vijal, who alone out of all the servants had followed his fortunes. These three walked down and passed through the gates together, and emerged into the outer world in silence. But when they had left the gates the silence ended.

"Well, dad!" said John, "what are you going to do now?"

"I don't know."

"Have you any money?"

"Four thousand pounds in the bank."

"Not much, dad," said John, slowly, "for a man who last month was worth millions. You're coming out at the little end of the horn."

Potts made no reply.

"At any rate there's one comfort," said John, "even about that."

"What comfort?"

"Why, you went in at the little end."

They walked on in silence.

"You must do something," said John at last.

"What can I do?"

"You won't let that fellow ride the high horse in this style, will you?"

"How can I help it?"

"You can't help it; but you can strike a blow yourself."

"How?"

"How? You've struck blows before to some purpose, I think."

"But I never yet knew any one with such tremendous power as this man has. And where did he get all his money? You said before that he was the devil, and I believe it. Where's Clark? Do you think he has succeeded?"

"No," said John.

"No more do I. This man has every body in his pay. Look at the servants! See how easily he did what he wished!"

"You've got one servant left."

"Ah, yes—that's a fact."

"That servant will do something for you."

"What do you mean?"

"Brandon is a man, after all—and can die," said John, with deep emphasis. "Vijal," he continued, in a whisper, "hates me, but he would lay down his life for you."

"I understand," said Potts, after a pause.

A long silence followed.

"You go on to the inn," said Potts, at last.

"I'll talk with Vijal."

"Shall I risk the policemen?"

"Yes, you run no risk. I'll sleep in the bank."

"All right," said John, and he walked away.

"Vijal," said Potts, dropping back so as to wait for the Malay. "You are faithful to me."

"Yes," answered Vijal.

"All the others betrayed me, but you did not?"

"Never."

"Do you know when you first saw me?"

"Yes."

"I saved your life."

"Yes."

"Your father was seized at Manila and killed for murder, but I protected you, and promised to take care of you. Haven't I done so?"

"Yes," said Vijal humbly, and in a reverent tone.

"Haven't I been another father?"

"You have."

"Didn't I promise to tell you some day who the man was that killed your father?"

"Yes," exclaimed Vijal, fiercely.

"Well, I'm going to tell you."

"Who?" cried Vijal, in excitement so strong that he could scarce speak.

"Did you see that man who drove me out of the Hall?"

"Yes."

"Well, that was the man. He killed your father. He has ruined me—your other father. What do you say to that?"

"He shall die," returned Vijal, solemnly. "He shall die."

"I am an old man," resumed Potts. "If I were as strong as I used to be I would not talk about this to you. I would do it all myself."

"I'll do it!" cried Vijal. "I'll do it!"

His eyes flashed, his nostrils dilated—all the savage within him was aroused. Potts saw this, and rejoiced.

"Do you know how to use this?" he asked, showing Vijal the cord which Brandon had given him.

Vijal's eyes dilated, and a wilder fire shone in them. He seized the cord, turned it round his hand for a moment, and then hurled it at Potts. It passed round and round his waist.

"Ah!" said Potts, with deep gratification. "You have not forgotten, then. You can throw it skillfully."

Vijal nodded, and said nothing.

"Keep the cord. Follow up that man. Avenge your father's death and my ruin."

"I will," said Vijal, sternly.

"It may take long. Follow him up. Do not come back to me till you come to tell me that he is dead."

Vijal nodded.

"Now I am going. I must fly and hide myself from this man. As long as he lives I am in danger. But you will always find John at the inn when you wish to see me."

"I will lay down my life for you," said Vijal.

"I don't want your life," returned Potts. "I want his."

"You shall have it," exclaimed Vijal.

Potts said no more. He handed Vijal his purse in silence. The latter took it without a word. Potts then went toward the bank, and Vijal stood alone in the road.

"VIJAL LOOKED EARNESTLY AT IT. HE SAW THESE WORDS: JOHN POTTS."

CHAPTER LV.

ON THE ROAD.

On the following morning Brandon started from the Hall at an early hour. He was on horseback. He rode down through the gates. Passing through the village he went by the inn and took the road to Denton.

He had not gone far before another horseman followed him. The latter rode at a rapid pace. Brandon did not pay any especial attention to him, and at length the latter overtook him. It was when they were nearly abreast that Brandon recognized the other. It was Vijal.

"Good-morning," said Vijal.

"Good-morning," replied Brandon.

"Are you going to Denton?"

"Yes."

"So am I," said Vijal.

Brandon was purposely courteous, although it was not exactly the thing for a gentleman to be thus addressed by a servant. He saw that this servant had overreached himself, and knew that he must have some motive for joining him and addressing him in so familiar a manner.

He suspected what might be Vijal's aim, and therefore kept a close watch on him. He saw that Vijal, while holding the reins in his left hand, kept his right hand concealed in his breast. A suspicion darted across his mind. He stroked his mustache with his own right hand, which he kept constantly upraised, and talked cheerfully and patronizingly with his companion. After a while he fell back a little and drew forth a knife, which he concealed in his hand, and then he rode forward as before abreast of the other, assuming the appearance of perfect calm and indifference.

"Have you left Potts?" said Brandon, after a short time.

"No," replied Vijal.

"Ah! Then you are on some business of his now?"

"Yes."

Brandon was silent.

"Would you like to know what it is?" asked Vijal.

"Not particularly," said Brandon, coldly.

"Shall I tell you?"

"If you choose."

Vijal raised his hand suddenly and gave a quick, short jerk. A cord flew forth—there was a weight at the end. The cord was flung straight at Brandon's neck.

But Brandon had been on his guard. At the movement of Vijal's arm he had raised his own; the cord passed around him but his arm was within its embrace. In his hand he held a knife concealed. In an instant he slashed his knife through the windings of the cord, severing them all; then dropping the knife he plunged his hand into the pocket of his coat, and before Vijal could recover from his surprise he drew forth a revolver and pointed it at him.

Vijal saw at once that he was lost. He nevertheless plunged his spurs into his horse and made a desperate effort to escape. As his horse bounded off Brandon fired. The animal gave a wild neigh, which sounded almost like a shriek, and fell upon the road, throwing Vijal over his head.

In an instant Brandon was up with him. He leaped from his horse before Vijal had disencumbered himself from his, and seizing the Malay by the collar held the pistol at his head.

"If you move," he cried, sternly, "I'll blow your brains out!"

Vijal lay motionless.

"Scoundrel!" exclaimed Brandon, as he held him with the revolver pressed against his head, "who sent you to do this?"

Vijal in sullen silence answered nothing.

"Tell me or I'll kill you. Was it Potts?"

Vijal made no reply.

"Speak out," cried Brandon. "Fool that you are, I don't want your life."

"You are the murderer of my father," said Vijal, fiercely, "and therefore I sought to kill you."

Brandon gave a low laugh.

"The murderer of your father?" he repeated. "Yes," cried Vijal, wildly; "and I sought your death."

Brandon laughed again.

"Do you know how old I am?"

Vijal looked up in amazement. He saw by that one look what he had not thought of before in his excitement, that Brandon was a younger man than himself by several years. He was silent.

"How many years is it since your father died?"

Vijal said nothing.

"Fool!" exclaimed Brandon. "It is twenty years. You are false to your father. You pretend to avenge his death, and you seek out a young man who had no connection with it. I was in England when he was killed. I was a child only seven years of age. Do you believe now that I am his murderer?"

Brandon, while speaking in this way, had relaxed his hold, though he still held his pistol pointed at the head of his prostrate enemy. Vijal gave a long, low sigh.

"You were too young," said he, at last. "You are younger than I am. I was only twelve."

"I could not have been his murderer, then?"

"No."

"Yet I know who his murderer was, for I have found out."

"Who?"

"The same man who killed my own father."

Vijal looked at Brandon with awful eyes.

"Your father had a brother?" said Brandon.

"Yes."

"Do you know his name?"

"Yes. Zangorri."

"Right. Well, do you know what Zangorri did to avenge his brother's death?"

"No; what?"

"For many years he vowed death to all Englishmen, since it was an Englishman who had caused the death of his brother. He had a ship; he got a crew and sailed through the Eastern seas, capturing English ships and killing the crews. This was his vengeance."

Vijal gave a groan.

"You see he has done more than you. He knew better than you who it was that had killed your father."

"Who was it?" cried Vijal, fiercely.

"I saw him twice," continued Brandon, without noticing the question of the other. "I saw him twice, and twice he told me the name of the man whose death he sought. For year after year he had sought after that man, but had not found him. Hundreds of Englishmen had fallen. He told me the name of the man whom he sought, and charged me to carry out his work of vengeance. I promised to do so, for I had a work of vengeance of my own to perform, and on the same man, too."

"Who was he?" repeated Vijal, with increased excitement.

"When I saw him last he gave me something which he said he had worn around his neck for years. I took it, and promised to wear it till the vengeance which he sought should be accomplished. I did so, for I too had a debt of vengeance stronger than his, and on the same man."

"Who was he?" cried Vijal again, with restless impetuosity.

Brandon unbuttoned his vest and drew forth a Malay creese, which was hung around his neck and worn under his coat.

"Do you know what this is?" he asked, solemnly.

Vijal took it and looked at it earnestly. His eyes dilated, his nostrils quivered.

"My father's!" he cried, in a tremulous voice.

"Can you read English letters?"

"Yes."

"Can you read the name that is cut upon it?"

And Brandon pointed to a place where some letters were carved.

Vijal looked earnestly at it. He saw these words:

JOHN POTTS.

"That," said Brandon, "is what your father's brother gave to me."

"It's a lie!" growled Vijal, fiercely.

"It's true," said Brandon, calmly, "and it was carved there by your father's own hand."

Vijal said nothing for a long time. Brandon arose, and put his pistol in his pocket. Vijal, disencumbering himself from his horse, arose also. The two stood together on the road.

For hours they remained there talking. At last Brandon remounted and rode on to Denton. But Vijal went back to the village of Brandon. He carried with him the creese which Brandon had given him.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago our markets were mostly supplied with paper-hangings by importations from France and England. Printing paper by the "hand process" was a long, slow, and expensive method; but now, by new mechanical methods, twenty thousand rolls can be produced where one thousand could be a quarter of a century ago. There is a manufactory in this city where seventeen hundred tons of paper were converted into finished paper-hangings last year. The facilities are such that blank paper as it comes from the mill can be converted in half an hour into printed wall paper, reeled and ready for market. In such establishments the first process is to cover the paper with a ground color preparatory to printing. The patterns are partly furnished by American designers, though many of them emanate from France. These are cut on blocks of wood, which are cylindrical in form for the ordinary kinds of paper. By special arrangements the cylinder machines will print a dozen colors at one operation. The finer grades of hangings are printed by hand presses. Polishing machines impart a satin surface before the figures are printed. Gold and velvet papers are made by first printing the pattern with glue-size and then with varnish or gold-size. Colored flock or ground wool sifted over it gives the effect of velvet plush, or by being passed through a bronzing machine the pattern is covered with bronze.

In the short farewell address made by Mr. Dickens at his last reading in Steinway Hall, he remarked: "The relations set up in this place between us have been to me of the most satisfactory character. There has been on my part the most earnest attention to the work of preparation to entertain you, and on your part the kindest sympathy, which can not be forgotten forever. I shall often recall you by the winter fire of my home, or in the pleasant summer of Old England—never as a public audience, but always as dear, personal friends, and ever with the tenderest sympathy and affection. In bidding you a final farewell, I pray—'God bless us, every one!' and God bless the land in which I leave you!"

A traveler through a country town in Maine where there are no hotels, obtained lodgings with a farmer. The next morning, when he inquired for his bill, the farmer said: "85 cents for meals and lodging, and 25 cents for squirting tobacco juice over the floor." Would it not have a good moral influence to assess a tax—say of five cents additional to the fare—upon those men who habitually pollute the city cars with tobacco juice? It must be a great deal of trouble and expense to "clean up" after them. Besides, their disagreeable habits are a grave offense to the more cleanly portion of the traveling public. Ladies don't care to ruin their pretty new Spring suits, as they are very likely to do, by riding in some of the cars.

The general purpose of the Smithsonian Institution at Washington—namely, "the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men"—is well known to the public. Yet there is probably no adequate conception of the extensive and important work steadily and quietly going forward through its instrumentality; what valuable scientific researches are yearly made, the results of which are widely disseminated through the world. Even a visit to the Institution, though exceedingly interesting in itself, does not ordinarily give one any just idea of the interior working system nor of the results thereof. The Museum—now that the Smithsonian library has been transferred to the library of Congress—is the chief attractive feature to the casual visitor; and enriched as it has been by contributions from governmental expeditions and individual explorers, it is a very valuable and complete collection for the illustration of natural science. But an examination of Annual Reports, or better still, some verbal information from the secretaries of the Institution, and a general survey of sundry rooms adjoining the Museum Hall, plainly show that the Museum is but an inadequate exponent of the real work accomplished by the Institution. Nor have we any purpose, in this brief paragraph, of attempting to specify the objects and methods of scientific investigation in meteorology, ethnology, natural history, etc., which have been so well devised and suggested by Professor Henry and his assistants. But in a recent visit, through the courtesy of Professor Henry and Professor Baird, many details were gathered; and among the most interesting, as explained by Professor Baird, were those relating to the extensive system of international scientific and literary exchanges.

At the present time this Institution receives any books of scientific, literary, or benevolent character, or specimens of natural history, which institutions or individuals in this country may wish to present to a correspondent elsewhere, subject only to the condition of being delivered in Washington free of cost, and being accompanied by a separate list of the parcels sent. Where any party has any special works to distribute, the Institution is prepared to furnish lists of societies or persons to whom they might be usefully sent. The articles and volumes, when received, are assorted, packed, and dispatched to the agents of the Institution in London, Leipsic, Paris, and Amsterdam. The boxes are there unpacked, and the contents distributed through the proper channels. Foreign transmissions of a similar kind are received by the same agents, packed and forwarded to Washington, from which point the parcels are sent to their proper destination. All the expenses of transfer between those four towns and Washington are borne by the Institution, the parties concerned only paying the local carriage to or from these great centres. In this interchange the Institution has obtained special facilities from railroad, steamboat, and express companies, many of which have generously transported all packages free of cost.

The number of addressed packages received by the Smithsonian Institution in 1866, from parties in America for foreign distribution, was over four thousand; and the packages received from Europe for distribution in this country numbered nearly three thousand, exclusive of those for the Institution. Every year duplicate specimens of natural history are distributed to other institutions; no less than 233,300 were distributed in 1866; and numerous others will be similarly disposed of when they have been properly examined and labeled—a work of no small magnitude. By this means natural history museums throughout the country are greatly assisted. The publications of the Smithsonian are exceedingly valuable to science; and by this system of exchange they are made accessible to students on both continents; while valuable works from other institutions are widely scattered for the general increase of knowledge. There is in England no institution which thus facilitates the interchange of books and specimens with the Continent; and the deficiency is often seriously felt by scientific men.

An English jury has decided that the exact value of a wife run over by a railroad train is $3750. It is well to have a definite decision on record.

A Philadelphia journal is of opinion that men, as a class, will never, if they can help it, acknowledge the equal right of women to stand side by side with them in the experiences and pleasures of life. However that may be, the following incident may have its moral:

The other day a gentleman spoke gravely, in the presence of a friend, of the education he intended to give his son; "but my daughter," said he, "she must be repressed!"

"Repressed! why?" asked the friend, in astonishment.

"Oh! because," said he, "she is smarter than the boy, and I don't believe in any woman's rights nonsense. I don't want her to do anything but take her proper place, as a wife, subject to her husband."

The listener contented himself with saying, "Well, you ought to have lived five hundred years ago."

Farmers say that the present season has been an almost unprecedented one for maple sugar. In many instances they have not been able to boil the saccharine fluid as fast as it flowed from the trees, and consequently hundreds of barrels of sap have been lost. When nights are cold, and days warm, the sap flows most freely.

Garments are often seriously injured by iron rust. The following process is said effectually to remove stains of iron rust from linen or cotton: Wash the cloth through one suds and rinse. When wet, rub ripe tomato juice on the spots. Expose it in the sunshine until nearly dry, and wash in another suds.

Some months ago a Boston lady—Miss Charlotte Harris—presented to the First Parish Church in Charlestown the sum of $3000 for purchasing a chime of bells to be placed in their church building. The first of the bells was cast in January last; and within sixty days from the first casting, the last of the sixteen bells forming the chiming apparatus was taken from the mould. Twenty-five bells have been cast in all to secure the sixteen required for the series, nine having been rejected as not capable of affording the required tone. Eight of the sixteen have been brought to their required pitch by the laborious process of chipping and filing, without injury, however, to their symmetry or strength. Each bell bears an inscription, and the name, "Harris Chime." The belfry of the church is 20 feet square by 20 feet in height, and by its peculiarly strong construction would almost seem to have been intended for the reception of this musical family, weighing in the aggregate 14,864 pounds.

A short time ago, the whole work of placing the chime of bells having been completed, some interesting exercises were held in the church, in connection with which many familiar airs were chimed to the entire satisfaction of the audience.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

The ladies are delighted with WARD's cloth-lined paper cuffs. They are so much like linen that it is almost impossible to tell one from the other, and they are retailed every where at fifty cents for ten pairs. The cloth lining makes them very strong. Can be had at WARD's, corner of Union Square and Broadway; also, wholesale and retail, at No. 387 Broadway.—Daily Times.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.
Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.
Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.
Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.
Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.
Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

Boots or Imitations.
We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.
Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND
CURES
Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.
Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

FACETIÆ.

DEAFNESS.—A gentleman who had a very deaf servant was advised by a friend to discharge her. "No, no," replied the gentleman, with much good feeling, "the poor creature could never hear of another situation."

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Corset.—Venus's house-keeper, who makes the chest go as far as possible with the least waist.

Court.—The surgery a married couple are sometimes driven to after upsetting the family coach.

Cuttle.—A nut-shell in which every boy appears a colonel to his mother.

Curious.—Next to gold, the most attractive metal.

Dear.—A word often cheap at any price.

Desk.—The tomb which is continually opening to receive fresh remains.

Diamond.—The carbon which feeds a fire in every female, great or small.

Doorg.—The gilt frame which sets off so many plain faces.

Dress.—The only habit which woman is always thinking of improving.

Duck.—A fond term used in foul play when a husband is wanted to make some sudden plunge.

Dye.—Giving up the ghost of every other chance.

Economy.—Spending five shillings to save sixpence.

Eden.—A garden where bonnets were unknown and scandal uninvented. Woman soon gave notice to quit.

Employment.—Something that must be found for the poor.

Engaged.—Occupied for a time in making a fool of a man.

Enough.—Obsolete.

Envy.—The echo of the first serpent's hiss.

Equal.—In woman's algebra, a term always signifying more or less.

Eve.—The only woman who never threatened to go and live with her mother.

LIFE'S PLAYTHINGS.

At the age of only eight, you'll forgive me if I state
That there never was a child like me;
I was not a bit inclined to devote my little mind
To the study of my A B C.
I could linger with delight over marbles or a kite,
And I left it for the humdrum boys
To be fagging all the day, for I fancied when at play
There was nothing in the world like Toys!

But my heart was in a flame, I remember, when I came To the period of soft sixteen;
She was young and very fair, in a frock and curly hair,
And the color of her eyes light green.
When I met her (at a dance) how she thrilled me with a glance,
And a pressure of her white kid glove;
In a minute I was caught, and in ecstasy I thought
There was nothing in the world like Love!

Then Ambition had a turn, and I felt my bosom burn
To be ranked among the earth's great men;
So I wrote a lot of rhyme—just a step from the sublime—
Though I reckoned it sublime just then.
Quite a year I threw away on a novel and a play
That were worthy of a first-rate name;
I was probably deceived, but I verily believed
There was nothing in the world like Fame!

I was doubtful and perplexed how to fix upon the next,
'Midst the treasures that the earth might hold:
Some were dearer than the rest, but the dearest and the best,
And the brightest of them all seemed Gold.
But it may be—after all—even toys begin to pall,
In the struggles of this long, long strife;
All my gods are overthrown, save the last—for I will own
There is nothing in the world like Life!

A waggish journalist, who is often merry over his personal plainness, tells this story of himself: "I went to a chemist the other day for a dose of morphine for a sick friend. The assistant objected to give it to me without a prescription, evidently fearing that I intended to commit suicide. 'Pshaw!' said I, 'do I look like a man who would kill himself?' Gazing steadily at me a moment, he replied, 'I don't know. It seems to me, if I looked like you, I should be greatly tempted to kill myself.'"

"Papa," said a little boy to his parent the other day, "are not sailors very, very small men?" "No, my dear," answered the father; "pray, what leads you to suppose that they are so small?" "Because," replied the young idea, smartly, "I read the other day of a sailor going to sleep in his watch."

HEM AND HAW.—A man about town was lately invited to a sewing party. The next day a friend asked him how the entertainment came off. "Oh, it was very amusing," he replied, "the ladies hemmed, and I hawed."

A youngster is congratulating himself that he has got the measles at last. He says he shall not any longer be kept from playing with the boys for fear he may catch it. That little chap is a philosopher, and understands the doctrine of compensation.

Complaisance is no longer confined to the polite circles. A captain of a vessel was lately called out of a coffee-house at Wapping by a waterman with the following address: "An't please your Honor, the tide is waiting for you."

An Irish monk once called on his congregation to thank God that he had placed death at the end of life instead of the middle.

YOUNG MISTRESS. "Jane, I'm surprised that none of you stood up when I went into the Kitchen just now!"
JANE. "Indeed, Mum! which we was su'prised ourselves at your a comin' into the Kitching while we was a 'aving our Luncheon!"

The following advertisement is too peculiar and modest not to merit a place in a literary journal: "Evening parties.—A young lady, who has written beautifully on the late Prince Consort, President Lincoln, and others (not yet published), is open to engagements to recite." Who would not like to hear the young lady recite "who has written beautifully" on the distinguished persons mentioned, and others not yet published?

Bishop Simpson, in a recent lecture, in Boston, predicted that in a very few years we would have Chinese servants in our houses. A gentleman referred to this at the breakfast-table one morning, when his little daughter came to his chair and whispered, "Oh, pa, won't it be nice? We shall have a Chinese servant, and she will eat all the rats, so we won't have to keep a cat!"

"Well, uncle, do you see any particular difference in neighbor P. since he joined the church?" "Oh yes," was the reply, "a great difference. Before, when he went out into his garden on Sunday, he carried his garden tools on his shoulder; now he carries them under his over-coat."

A LABOR OF LOVE.—The following epitaph may be seen in the cemetery of a parish in the environs of Paris: "Here lies Madame N., wife of M. N., master blacksmith. The railing around this tomb was manufactured by her husband."

A lady's husband being away from home, died while absent. One of the neighbors being requested to inform her of her husband's death, found her at dinner, and when he informed her of the death, she requested the neighbor to wait until she had finished her dinner, when he would hear some bawling.

THE AUDIENCE.—The manager of a country theatre looked into the house between the acts, and turned with a face of dismay to the prompter, with the question:

"Why, good gracious, where's the audience?"

"Sir," replied the prompter, without moving a muscle, "he is just now gone to get some beer."

The manager wiped the perspiration from his brow, and said, "Will he return, do you think?"

"Most certainly; he expressed himself highly satisfied with the play, and applauded as one man."

"Then let the business proceed," exclaimed the manager, proudly; and it did proceed.

MATRIMONIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

(For Particulars inquire over the Way.)

A Gentleman, heir to large property, but born blind, is in Want of a Wife. Beauty not requisite. She must be intelligent, amiable, and accomplished; but plainness will be no objection if any thing short of palpable disfigurement.

The Friends of a Young Lady wish to procure her a Suitable Husband. She is sensible, sweet-tempered, and pretty, her only defect being that she is unable to sound the letter H. A Deaf Gentleman would find this an excellent opportunity.

UGLY WOMEN! UGLY WOMEN! UGLY WOMEN!—A Young Man who has run through all his property, but now sees the Error of his Ways, and is a Reformed Character, wishes to Marry and Settle. He would wish to Settle any fortune that his wife might bring with her on herself, with Remainder in the hands of Trustees to the Survivor for Life. Any Lady of strictly moral and religious principles and an affectionate temperament, whose Inclination for Holy Matrimony has, notwithstanding pecuniary affluence (say from $150,000), been opposed by disadvantages of personal appearance, may Secure a Fond Husband, who is considered very Handsome, but, being himself indifferent to externals, regards only those qualities in a married partner that are truly valuable.

A gentleman, who had the curiosity to spend a dime in answering an advertisement which promised valuable advice for that amount, received by mail the following answer: "Friend, for ten cents postage, please find inclosed advice which may be of great value to you. As many persons are injured for weeks, months, and years, by the careless use of a knife, therefore, my advice is, when you use a knife, always whittle from you!"

PHYSIO.—One of our well-known physicians, while conversing with a friend one day, observed another physician driving past in his chaise accompanied by one of his patients, who was fast recovering. "Well," said Dr. B., "I never took a patient to ride in my life." "No," said our friend, "Mr. Pierce, the sexton, saves you the trouble."

Why have the United States Congress impeached President Johnson?—Perhaps because they think of making him President again, and don't want to elect an untired man.

"Which, my dear lady, do you think the merriest place in the world?" "That immediately above the atmosphere that surrounds the earth, I should think." "And why so?" "Because I am told that there all bodies lose their gravity."

Most kinds of roots and bark are now used for medicine, except the cube root and the bark of a dog.

Walking and Home Toilettes.

WE give in the present Number of Harper's Bazar patterns and illustrations of a number of walking suits, rendered timely by the beautiful spring weather, which is filling the streets with groups of gay promenaders. Moreover, as the summer is fast approaching, and it is time to prepare for the journeyings attendant thereupon, we furnish our readers with a variety of designs for traveling conveniences, such as necessaires, bags, shawl-straps, port-folios, glove-holders, umbrella-holders, etc., which they will find invaluable in their summer wanderings. We also give illustrations of several pretty home toilettes for spring.

The walking suits this year consist chiefly, as in the last, of a skirt and paletot of the same material. The skirts are not quite so short or so narrow as those of last season, but almost touch the ground, and are longer behind than in front. The front breadth is almost plain, with one large box-pleat; the back breadths are straight, and gathered, with a small pleat on each side of the gathers. The paletots are either close-fitting or sack-shaped. A belt with a bow or rosette and broad sash ends is worn over the paletot. This belt is made either of the same material as the paletot, with trimming to match, or of silk, satin, etc.; the ends do not fall below the bottom of the paletot itself. Fichus, crossing in front, are also worn either over the paletot or instead of it; these are very stylish and becoming to young girls. Walking dresses may be either of black silk, or of the many light-colored worsted or linen goods suitable for summer wear. Close sleeves are still in favor. The trimming consists of narrow or wide flounces, quillings, bias folds, and lappets of different shapes, either of the same stuff as the paletot, bound with silk or satin, or of the latter materials. Many suits have no other trimming than a broad hem, with one or more rows of stitching in silk twist of the same color as the dress. The buttons generally match the suit in color, and are covered with silk or satin, embroidered in point russe or satin stitch; these buttons may be made more durable by winding them over with silk twist. We proceed to give a description of the home and walking dresses in the accompanying illustration.

Fig. 1.—Dress with train of brown poult de soie, trimmed with bias folds of brown silk bound with brown satin.

Fig. 2.—Dress with train of mode Panama cloth, trimmed with bias folds of brown silk. Belt with lappets of brown silk, bound with brown satin. The bias folds are bound in a similar manner.

Fig. 3.—Walking dress of lavender gros grain, trimmed in the manner shown in the illustration with lavender silk flounces and bias folds. The belt and bow are trimmed to correspond with the dress. The paletot and fichu belonging to the Maria Theresa and Norderney dresses (see page 473), the patterns of which are given in the present Number of the Supplement, may either be worn with this dress.

Fig. 4.—Dress with train of pearl-gray silk, trimmed with satin, silk fringe, tassels, and buttons of a darker shade, in the manner shown in the illustration.

Fig. 5.—Dress with train of brown poplin, trimmed with brown satin piping, black lace, and brown buttons.

THE NEW AGE OF WOMANHOOD.

ALL observant persons agree that womanhood in certain respects has made a great advance in the present age. It would not be correct to say that we have any women superior in their particular class to the mothers of Doddridge and the Wesleys, or to Hannah More and Maria Edgeworth. But it is precisely true to affirm that the general idea of pure, cultivated, and noble womanhood has made large progress in the United States toward the ideal of excellence. Nor is it less true to aver that the ideal itself, borrowing somewhat from the splendor of the age, has grown more resplendent.

It is quite clear that the peculiar kind of advancement made in this age could not have been accomplished without womanhood sharing in the mighty impulse. The forward movement has not been coldly logical nor mechanical. It has not been of set intellectual purpose, nor on the demands of a frigid system, but instinctive and impulsive, alive with generous yearnings, stimulated as much by buoyant hope as by reasoning faith, and thoroughly founded in the possibilities of humanity as connected with that future which Christianity so divinely portrays. Women have advanced with the age because they are women. They are in literature, in art, in teaching, in varied forms of tasteful activity, for the same reason that they are honored, loved, revered in domestic life. Their sex has necessitated the position which they occupy, so that men have come to believe at last that they are no less essential to society as thinkers and actors than as wives. On this ground they now stand. On this ground they will continue to stand, exercising larger measures of beneficent influence, vindicating their worth of character by rarer worth of life, and winning for themselves a more exalted kind of admiration.

Throw aside every thing else, and this admiration—a new fact of the age—is alone an immense gain to each sex. Half the admiration lavished upon women is a misfortune to giver and receiver. It is a dazzling counterfeit, all the worse for being dazzling. Like all shams, it is a respectable way of being false and heartless. Few things are as hurtful as this current style of admiration. But it has had a wholesome check. It will be checked more and more as womanhood fulfills the high ideal of the age. And the result of the change will be seen in men quite as much as in women. The era of vivacious noodies will pass away. The nice young man will quietly disappear. Instead of sentimentality we shall have sentiment. Instead of theatrical courtships we shall have hearts finding kindred hearts. And as this truer admiration leads to a profounder love, it will extend itself to all the relations of daily life. The shallow affections which have unfortunately existed in some sorts of society between men and women, have not been confined in their disastrous consequences to the domestic circle. These are primary feelings of the human heart, and hence, if artificialized and enervated, integrity of character and honesty in business and manly dealing in active life are sure to pay the forfeit! The standard of all manhood and womanhood goes down with the mutual regards of the sexes; and we urge, therefore, that as the relations between man and woman are becoming more true and genuine, resting in a stronger faith in each other's capacity and in a warmer devotion to each other's character, the well-being of society in all its connections will be thereby augmented. Who can tell but that the tender and gracious forethought of Providence may be specially directing this impulse, which is quickening with such marvelous energy the brain and heart of womanhood? Who can tell but that this age, relaxing its hold upon God, idolizing self-culture and self-reliance, and substituting its dreary negations for the faith and reverence of the Gospel, may have finally to take refuge from its self-destructive insanity in the more intuitional and reliable beliefs and virtues of womanhood? There may be a deeper truth than we have yet read in the fact that the Redeemer announced his resurrection first to women.

HOME TOILETTES.

SWEET, MY SWEET.

Enn and flow, but as you go,
River, running to the sea,
For love's sake my message take
Down to where she waits for me.
Sweet, my sweet, about your feet
Shadows with the sunshine meet;
So our lives are made complete
By our bane and bliss, my sweet.

If my ship its anchor slip,
Riding out both storms and calms,
Touching sands of far-off lands
Where are tall and graceful palms—
Sweet, my sweet, low at your feet
Shall be laid the tribute meet
Till your triumph is complete
Over other love, my sweet.

Ebb and flow, but as you go,
River, running to the sea,
Late and long still sing the song
I am singing now to thee.
Sweet, my sweet, about your feet
Shadows must with sunshine meet
Till our lips with kisses greet,
For I love you, sweet, my sweet.

KEEP IN THE SUN.

EVERY one is familiar with the process of growing celery. A deep trench is dug, in which the seed are sown or the sprouts set, and with the growth of the plant the earth is carefully heaped up until the whole is nearly buried. By this means the light is excluded almost entirely, and the vegetable becomes the pale and tender esculent of our tables.

Paleness and tenderness are always the result of depriving an organized being, whether a plant or animal, of the light of the sun; but these qualities, however desirable in a sprig of celery, are indications of an artificial and unwholesome condition. The human being soon loses in obscurity his color and toughness, and, with them, all brightness of intelligence and vigor of body. Children brought up in mines and cellars are blanched, dwarfed, stupid, liable to diseases of all kinds, and short-lived; and grown-up people, however vigorous they may have been previously, will soon, when deprived of light, become pale and feeble.

There can not be a greater mistake than for our delicate dames, who pass so much of their lives indoors, to sit or lounge in dark rooms. They require all the sun's light they can get. It is true that whatever defects of toilette or complexion they may have will be better concealed from a chance visitor by obscurity; but this small gratification of vanity is too dearly purchased at the cost of health.

The sun's light is not only essential to the preservation of the natural vigor of the body, but acts very beneficially as a remedy in disease. The French make great use of it, particularly in their hospitals. To the windows of these there are attached inclined planes upon which the sick are laid, and exposed on every clear day to the sun's light. This has a more powerful tonic effect than all the iron, quinine, porter, wine, and spirits which are so much used with us.

Weak and sickly children are especially benefited by exposure to the sun's light, and mothers would do well to reverse their usual order to the nurse: "Keep in the shade." We say, and we have science and experience on our side: "Keep in the sun."

FAMILY FESTIVALS.

IT is quite clear that we Americans get far less enjoyment out of life than we might. We still suffer from the effects of our Puritanical origin, and although we may have abandoned the theory that pleasure is necessarily a sin, we still cling to the practice of eschewing it. We may not insist as we once did upon obedience to the eleventh commandment—"Thou shalt not eat mince-pie," added by the Praise-God Barebones to the Decalogue—but we touch the once forbidden pastry, or indulge in the innocent pleasure of which it is here taken as the symbol, too rarely, and seldom without fear and trembling.

Not content with crasing from the calendar all the saints' days and holy feasts and festivals which were so many pleasant and wholesome reminders that man was not made for work alone, we have reduced our national holidays to two or three in the year at the utmost. The late war, with its many days of glory, has not apparently left us a single one for a perpetual anniversary of celebration. As for family festivals they seem to be in a fair way of being abolished altogether. This we think an imprudent concession to the drudgery of life.

We might learn a useful and charming lesson from our foreign friends, and especially from the Germans. These contrive to make their homes constant scenes of cheerfulness. Every domestic event is turned by them into an occasion of joyous demonstration. The celebration of the baptisms and christenings, birthdays and silver and golden weddings, and other family events, makes life in Germany a perpetual holiday. This does not, as some might suspect, render the German an idle, devil-may-care person. His prominence in every country as a man of industry, enterprise, and thrift proves the contrary. This exuberance of domestic joy serves rather to lubricate his energies, and render him capable of bearing the rubs of life without wear and tear.

It is surprising also how much hearty enjoyment the Germans manage to get for a small expenditure of money. These family festivals are made up of very few articles purchased in shop or market, but of a great deal of sentiment of home production. A bouquet of flowers, a cake, a toy, or a trinket, is all that costs money, the rest is generously supplied by affection and good-nature. What time may be thought by our parsimonious calculators wasted in these home festivals should be rather estimated as gained. The strength given to the domestic affections, and the positive increase of social happiness by this practice of cultivating the innocent pleasures of home, are sufficient to commend it. Apart, however, from these, it has the further advantage of indirectly economizing time. The spirits are refreshed by these periodical intermissions from work, and the mind and body so invigorated that they more than make up, by increased willingness and capacity for labor, for all the time spent in these innocent and wholesome family festivals.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to the Reverend Lucas Merriweather.

MY DEAR SIR,—I wrote to my friend Lucinda last week to congratulate her upon a certain event upon which, with your permission, I beg also to congratulate you. And now I propose to make a suggestion to you which I know you will take in perfect good part whether you accede to it or not. You were so polite as to say, when I had the pleasure of meeting you at Lucinda's house, that you thought the subject of manners upon the road treated in a large and liberal manner as our general conduct upon the great highway of life, was a very suggestive topic; and you were so generous as to spare me a few hints that might serve as texts for some future little sermons upon the topic which I might wish to preach in the form of letters to various friends. My dear and reverend Sir, how can I do better than to begin by trying your neat prescription in your own case? For I know nobody who could help raise the general standard of manners upon his own road better than my friend the truly popular and beloved divine, or clergyman if you prefer, or minister, in the old Puritan phrase, the Reverend Lucas Merriweather.

When the Prince of Wales was married I remember reading in the London papers the most elaborate descriptions of the most magnificent presents which were given to the lovely Alexandra—poor child! I hope she does not repent that brilliant occasion and her uncommonly "good match." But I somehow forget what his Royal Highness gave her as his own peculiar gift. Perhaps a beautiful bouquetier holding a rather faded nosegay from the Jardin Mabille in Paris, or an illuminated copy of the lovely ballad of "The Rat-catcher's Daughter" from the London cider-cellars, or some other token of his Royal Highness's tastes and pursuits—something that would always pleasantly remind his invalid wife, as she lay at home unable to move, of the probable haunts and occupations of her young husband. And I am now patiently awaiting the foreign papers to read the details of Prince Humbert's marriage to his cousin Margaret, of which I wrote to Lucinda, and perhaps even to see in the illustrated papers pictures of the princely bridal gifts. But until they come I console myself by inspecting the presents of Miss Matilda Pound, who was married to Mr. Charles Hundredweight, under the head of "a distinguished event in the fashionable world" only last week. Her gifts were gorgeous. If the Princess Margaret, who has just married her cousin Humbert, had any thing more superb and elaborate, she is a very fortunate princess. The only thing wanting in Miss Pound's presents was a palace. She had all the equipment of a palace, and it is a pity that she should want the house itself. And when I think of the many German royal and princely ladies whom I have seen in other days living and entertaining in palaces, why, I assure you, my dear and reverend Sir, they could all of them learn from Mrs. Charles Hundredweight, and I am more than ever sorry that she has not a palace of her own in which to put herself and her wedding treasures, and teach royal personages how to behave. Perhaps you will suggest that the young husband's gift might have been a palace. Certainly, it might have been; but besides himself, which I assure you Mr. Charles Hundredweight does not think a gift of small potatoes, he presented his bride upon the wedding morning with a set of diamonds so complete and resplendent that I do not know whether any Queen's surpass them. Mr. Peter Paul Pry, who was with me—as he is sure to be at all such places—gravely saluted her as Madame Kohinoor when he made his bow to her at the reception after the ceremony; and she is now known by that name.

Now, as I contemplated all the beautiful and costly gifts that surrounded this pretty bride, I thought of another bride—or of a certain friend of ours who, I am glad to know, will very soon be one; and I naturally fell to thinking what kind of gift her lover upon the happy marriage morn would be likely to bring to her. Can you guess, my dear Mr. Lucas? It will not be a set of diamonds, I am sure, nor a pearl necklace, nor yards of miraculous old lace, nor a gold dinner-service; no, nor even a chaste silver tea-set. It may be a very neat writing-stand fully equipped—or a beautifully bound Shakespeare—or a massively bound Family Bible. Some of these, or all of them, it may be. But I can tell you of a gift that you—for of course I am speaking of Lucinda—may give to her, which shall be more royal than purple velvet and Venetian lace—more splendid than diamonds and gold. It has very possibly occurred to you already, for I know your generous nature; but you have not seen it at Tiffany's, nor at Stewart's, nor is it to be heard of in Maiden Lane.

It is simply this. Go to Lucinda on your marriage-day, and that that shall be soon I know two people who are fully resolved. Say to her as she comes to you, clad in white, perfuming the happy air as she moves, and much too fine a being for you or for any mortal—say to her, "Lucinda, I bring you my wedding gift—a resolution." I do not believe she will smile, I do not believe she will quote to you Mrs. Browning's exquisite "Swan's nest among the Reeds," nor will she look as if she thought what you and I would put into the vulgar phrase that fine words butter no parsnips. For she knows you, and she knows that a resolution of yours is like the morning brightness before the sun. The sun is sure to follow; and your deed does not lag behind your word. When she stands listening for you to continue, say: "I am so happy in my love for you, I know so deeply that love is the real law of life, I see so plainly the folly and the pain of the want of love among Christian brethren, that I am going to do what I can to break down the wicked walls of sectarian jealousy and hostility that divide the great church into little pens of hot and angry disputants; I am going to invite all my brethren to co-operate in the good work; to exhort them not to be satisfied with a denominational name to the exclusion of graver matters; to ask them if we are not all agreed upon the solid fundamental truths of a pure life, and put it to them whether we had not better save our ammunition and our hostile zeal for the Kingdom of Darkness and its emissaries instead of exploding each other with our petards of sectarian passion, and bombarding each other with our tremendous ecclesiastical canons? Why, I shall ask of them, why do we not lay hold of every good work all together? Why must every charity be labeled with the mark of a sect, and all humane and generous effort be poured into denominational moulds before it is considered shapely enough for sympathy? Is suffering of any sect—is necessity of any ecclesiastical limitation? And I will not let them say that each church must take care of its own, for I will tell them that there is but one church, the church of God, of which all earnest, striving, pious souls are members. I will try to show them that, when they build the pens of which I speak and keep them in perfect repair, they are but cherishing false views in the minds of their adherents; that just as the Italian peasant worships the figure of the Madonna, not as a symbol, but, I fear, rather as an idol, not discriminating, with the wiser priest, between the representation and the original, so the good people of his own flock may—yes, and do—come to regard the lines of their fold as the limits of the great, generous body of true believers, and to consider the duty of manning the walls of their sectarian Zion the chief duty of Christian soldiers. I mean to try to uproot and cut down and overthrow and smite hip and thigh all these vile, morbid, sectarian heresies, which do even more to retard the coming of the Kingdom of Light than all the powers of t'other kingdom themselves; and if any thing can hold me fast to the good work, and perpetually refresh and inspire me in doing it, it will be she who has taught me the meanness of any love less than the truly Catholic and universal, to whom I offer as a wedding gift this dedication of myself to this chief duty."

If you say this, I believe that Lucinda will be more wholly yours than ever. I can see in my imagination her eyes as she looks at you; I can understand how her heart will beat with something more than the expectation of the ceremony; and that when she whispers to you, "Come, I am ready," it will mean that she calls you to the work you propose, and that she consecrates herself to it with you. How do you think this compares with the diamond set? Would you rather give her the pearl necklace?

Or do you believe she had rather have it? Dear and reverend Sir, do you not agree with me that if every body who was to be married in this pleasant month of May should make such a gift to his bride as I have suggested to you, the whole year would be pleasanter for all of us, and the whole world the gainer? It would not abolish sects—no, certainly not, for they arise from irresistible causes; but it would tend to abolish the hostility of sects. And if you know any thing which more seriously impedes the journey which we are all making, if you know any thing which is more grossly inconsistent with true Christian manners upon the road of life—which manners I take to be universal charity—than this pestilent sectarianism, I wish you would apprise me by the City post to-morrow morning.

I have not observed whether you are to speak at any of the anniversary meetings this year. But if you are, you might certainly make a good beginning in the good work. My dear brother Lucas, smite this giant, this common enemy, this sower of tares in the garden, this divider of brethren. Especially if you go to the Congregational supper stir up the brethren with a true Catholicism, with the fire of the Church Universal, which does not ask a brother's name, but looks to see if he visit the widows and fatherless, and keeps himself unspotted from the world.

If I have mistaken your character, Sir, in addressing you this letter, Lucinda will explain to you that I am only

Your well-meaning friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

JAPANESE FOULARDS.

AMONG some novelties just arrived are the Japanese silks, or foulards, for suits. The over-dress and petticoat are of different colors, but are imported together in a wooden box, covered with Japanese letters. The design after which they are to be made is traced on colored paper with Japanese symbols, and altogether they present a decidedly Oriental appearance. They are all of solid colors, well selected. The handsomest shown us had the over-skirts of a clear shade of gray, with a petticoat of blue, brown, or violet. These were $35 for the suit. Cheaper patterns in two shades of brown were $30.

SATIN AND SERGE.

Another novelty is the linen-back satin for petticoats. It is in quarter-inch and inch-wide stripes of gold and black, or pink and gray, and green, scarlet, or purple, with white. It is sold by the yard at $3.

In another set of boxes are smoothly-folded patterns of summer serge, the dress and petticoat unlike. This fabric is all silk, thin and wiry, and is a kind of twilled foulard. A serge over-dress of the fashionable nankeen color accompanies a blue or green skirt. The price is $60 for each pattern. The petticoat of cuir-colored serge is striped satin, pink and white. A more quiet suit is of brown satin, under cream-colored foulard. A violet dress of soft Turk satin is over the same shade of repped silk. This is $45.

TURKISH SATIN.

We found in other boxes four beautiful costumes, each of which is marked $100. French plates accompany them, exhibiting the design. The lower skirt of one is Turk satin, of inch-wide stripes of purple and gold. The over-dress is purple satin. A long fringed sash has three broad stripes like those of the petticoat. Material like the over-dress is furnished for bonnet, gaiters, and parasol. The outside dresses of the other three patterns are steel gray. The petticoats are, first, gold and Mentana red stripes; second, pink and green, and third, bronze and gilt.

COUNTRY SUITS.

Spring toilettes having been brought to completion in time to display them on the promenade during the balmy May weather, our modistes are already devising costumes for summer. In anticipation of the usual hegira to the sea-side and watering-places country suits, as they are called, are in active preparation. The Parisian models imported for the coming season are in the Watteau or Pompadour style, or à la Marie Antoinette.

The Watteau is in imitation of the pastoral dress worn by court shepherdesses in the days of Louis XV., when they enacted idyls at Trianon and Fontainebleau. It is a close copy of the original costume, with its square Pompadour neck, its velvet necklace and cross, the merest atom of sleeve, a belt and sash looped with eg-lantine, and a festooned over-dress with striped petticoat, short enough to display clocked stockings and slippers with large rosettes. This fanciful attire is surmounted by a Louis Quinze hat turned up at the left side, and a cardinal pelerine with long pointed hood.

Differing from this is the Marie Antoinette, with its high-necked fichu folded over the breast, sleeves puffed to the elbow and frilled, slender waist and paniers, with skirts trimmed with innumerable ruffles and ruches. The broad-rimmed garden hat of chip is trimmed with field flowers, and completes a costume peculiarly becoming to youthful faces and slender figures. The Watteau is better suited to maturity and embonpoint; but like every thing else, they are worn indiscriminately.

DRESS MATERIALS.

Twilled mohair, soft light cashmere, Chambray gauze, alpaca, and the Japanese foulards are selected for summer suits, in delicate shades of buff, fawn-color, drab, and pea-green. Glossy white alpaca and mohair are trimmed with the clear light blue now so fashionable in Europe. Chambery gauze or goats'-hair, a thicker fabric than that worn for evening dresses, is in narrow stripes of any bright color, with white. Green, blue, and mauve are much admired. It is only found at a few houses, and is from $2 to $3 a yard. It is seven-eighths wide. Marseilles and piqué suits consist merely of the polonaise and gored skirt, without a tight-fitting corsage. They are braided in rich patterns, with medallions on each width and vines up the seams. The sleeves and collar are finished with narrow fringe. Cool and pretty costumes for midsummer are made of white organdy with two skirts, a low full waist, and wide fichu. These are worn without the fichu for short dancing dresses. Valenciennes lace, gaufered ruffles, and gay ribbons are the trimmings.

IMPORTED COSTUMES.

A simple suit for country wear is of buff serge. The lower skirt is gored plainly. The over-dress is short in the back, long and round in front, and trimmed with three rows of black velvet ribbon. A low square corsage without sleeves is to be worn over a chemise Russe. Short paletot with long mantilla fronts. Another for a very young girl is of striped blue and white goat's-hair over a blue poplin petticoat, trimmed with three folds of the striped goods cut bias. A Pompadour sash begins half-way down the upper skirt at the side seams. The waist of white muslin has a long scarf arranged over the shoulder and hanging loosely under the left arm. The mantle is a round talma, edged with white camel's-hair fringe. A tiny hat to be worn with this suit is of white Neapolitan straw, trimmed with blue crape and bouquets of forget-me-nots.

A Pompadour suit of black silk has the short skirt trimmed with three rows of black galloon embroidered with orange. Over this is a panier skirt with revers of orange silk turned back in front. The sash begins low down on each side under a large rosette. This over-skirt may be festooned with the sash or left to form a train. A short, tight-fitting basque has orange revers at the throat and deep facings on the wrist. A Louis XV. chapeau of fancy straw is turned up at the side and faced with orange.

A croquet dress of white piqué is a short Gabrielle with deep, leaf-like lappets extending from the waist to the knee, all around the skirt. These are braided with feather-edged soutache, and sprinkled with innumerable small linen buttons. Bretelles in front form a berth at the back. Hat of white muslin trimmed with violets. This costume may be made up at home at a very trifling expense.

An elaborate Watteau suit, marked $225, has a satin under-skirt of striped gold and maroon. It is cut off at the knee and finished with a deep flounce. The Watteau jacket forming the over-dress is of narrow repped silk. It is trimmed with a wide pinked ruche of the same and looped at the sides and back to form puffs. These puffs are lined with crinoline to make them project. The wide sash ribbon has three stripes like the petticoat. It is arranged in a fan-like quilling with butterfly bows on the ends. The hat, of yellow straw, is turned up at the side and trimmed with a striped ribbon.

A plain traveling dress has a gored petticoat of white alpaca trimmed with three ruches of brown cashmere notched at the edges. A long redingote worn over this is of brown sea-side poplin trimmed with folds of the same piped with brown cashmere. This is inexpensive, stylish, and serviceable.

An elegant carriage dress of black faille has a trained skirt with a deep flounce on all the widths but the front. A wide quilling, bound with satin, trims the front seams and heads the flounce. The whole front width is trimmed with a lattice work of thick satin piping. The tight-fitting basque is long and round behind, with square fronts and slashed sides. The lattice of piping covers the entire back of the basque, and forms epaulets and cuffs on the coat-sleeves.

A picturesque costume for a watering-place is of white alpaca, with two skirts and a fichu. On the lower skirt is a ten-inch flounce of blue silk, put on in shell quilling. The upper skirt, edged with folds of the alpaca, piped with blue silk, is open in front, and fastened around the plain waist with a belt. It is festooned at the sides by sashes. The Marie Antoinette fichu is trimmed to match the lower skirt. A white crinoline hat is turned up at the side and draped with a scarf of blue tulle that forms a veil. Pompon of feathers on the left. Blue ribbon is quilled inside the rim.

HINTS ABOUT DRESS-MAKING.

French dresses, when buttoned in front of the corsage, are no longer very high at the throat. The neck is disclosed as far down as the slope of the shoulders. Vandyked and scalloped bands are universally worn. They fit more neatly when cut bias, and should match the trimming in color. Another plan is to stitch a row of points on a narrow band. The points are formed by doubling small squares of silk, then folding toward the centre.

Under-skirts of imported costumes have a belt defined on the skirt, plain and smooth in front, but are gathered in the back with a drawing-string.

The best plan for finishing the edge of a skirt is to sew the material of the dress and facing together on the wrong side, making a broad seam, then turn over evenly, and press smoothly. The seam may be from a quarter of an inch to an inch wide, and if sewn without puckering, serves to make the edge of the skirt stand out firmly. The old practice of turning up the material of the dress on the facing is objectionable, as the skirt is apt to cut out at the edge. An excellent modiste advises us that skirt-braid for binding is no longer considered essential. The French, who finish their work in the most beautiful manner, doing almost every thing by hand, have entirely discarded braid. The material of the braid is so different from that of the dress that they will not shrink alike, and all worsted braids shrink slightly, even though dipped in scalding water before they are used.

THE CARDINAL PELERINE.

The most novel wrap of the season is called the Cardinal Pelerine. It is made either of black faille or of the silk of the dress. It is also shown in black cashmere. The shape is similar to the scarf burnous. It has a pointed hood folded in the back, long mantilla fronts, and is fitted into the waist by a concealed belt. A very handsome one of faille is trimmed with a corded passementerie with small tassels pendent every where, and a long tassel on the point of the hood. It is bordered with wide guipure lace over fringe.

SLEEVELESS JACKETS.

Sleeveless jackets have been worn for two seasons, but they still find favor. They are jaunty little garments that give a tone to the simplest toilette, and are equally suitable for morning and evening. A very stylish one, just imported, is of soft black cashmere, lined with white Florence silk. It is ornamented with a band of palm leaves and a patch-work border like those seen on India shawls. Another, to be worn over a white muslin dress, or with black silk, is of light blue silk, trimmed with an appliqué vine of black velvet, embroidered with cut turquoise beads and straw threads. The back and side-bodies are notched in small squares at the edge, from which are pendent heavy acorns of blue silk. Fine black lama lace jackets, with epaulets in the arm-holes, are worn over light dresses for afternoon toilettes. The Haidee jackets are of white lama, with Grecian gilt bands woven in the lace, and tinkling gilt drops on the border. In another cashmere stripes are interwoven, and a narrow fringe is made of varied colors. The most elaborate jacket shown us is hussar-shaped. It is of white faille, braided with gilt soutache. Coat-sleeves with deep cuffs. Tiny pockets are under the arm, and broad sashes hang down in the back. The price of this unique garment is $90.

LINGERIE.

Linen cambric collars and under-sleeves are displayed for afternoon toilettes. The collars are standing, fastened with a bow and ends of lace and cambric. The sheerest cambric is laid in tiny cord-like folds, held securely at each side, and vandyked at the top. The vandykes are felled out with Valenciennes and embroidery. On others Valenciennes insertion is laid in pleats and trimmed with appliqué needle-work. Again, there are sprays of flowers and leaves of real point d'Alençon inserted in cambric. Medallions of tucks rest amidst the filmiest laces, sewn in with seams so small that they are scarcely perceptible. Valenciennes and even point lace bows are attached to ribbon cravats to be worn with standing linen collars. Plain sets for morning are of linen, with three or four cords stitched in the pointed edges. Rows of pin-stitching separate the thick cords. These are all made in the neatest manner. Beautiful paper collars of all styles are made in lace patterns, so elaborate as to be mistaken at a little distance for needle-work or guipure, and especially convenient for traveling.

A paletot of white organdy is intended for a street wrapping. A pleated flounce edged with Valenciennes surrounds the bottom, and a similar trimming forms a berth. Needle-work insertion extends up the seams. Blue ribbon is quilled at the top of the flounce, and a belt is formed of folds of silk. Coat-sleeves with ruffled cuffs, ornamented with blue bows.

A Marie Antoinette fichu, suitable for mourning, is of white organdy, trimmed with a fluted ruffle and smooth folds. Price $15.

Necklaces of large silk balls strung together with gilt, with long pendants in front, are worn in colors matching the trimming of a suit. Butterfly bows of shell-like bits of silk and lace are worn beneath a brooch at the throat.

SPRING SHOES.

Walking boots for this season are lower on the ankle than those worn during the winter. The half-high, or three-quarter Polish boot, is cooler and looks better with short dresses. Kid is preferred to prunella or the satin Français. Grison's kid, imported by the best houses, is the least liable to crack and turn brown, but even this is not infallible. An excellent dressing is now prepared that restores the polish and does not soil the skirts when moist.

Half-high Polish gaiters with medium rounded toes without tips, and buttoned with jet are the favorite boots for walking. Heels are slightly lower, very little curved, and are much broader than the sloping heels lately in vogue. Fancy boots are stitched with white. A carriage or evening shoe is laced in front and trimmed over the instep with braiding and jet. A pretty light gaiter is made of prunella uppers finished with kid. Bronze boots are still seen on the street. All bronze is defaced by moisture. There is a bronze dressing that will restore the color, but not permanently.

The white satin of the wedding-dress is made into bridal slippers and gaiters. The ornaments are blonde lace and seed-pearl embroidery. The gaiters are buttoned with Roman pearls. Dancing boots, with slightly concave heels, are of colored kid, or of the material of the dress, with colored heels.

Bows for slippers are made of colored velvet cut bias, and of kid leaves bound with silk and held together by steel buckles. Bronze bows have gilt buckles. Large Pompadour rosettes that cover the entire instep are admired for morning use. They are put on ordinary black kid slippers, with curved heels, covered with cloth the color of the rosette. Toilette slippers without heels have kid facings a half inch deep around the top, and chain stitched with violet or blue silk.

Full Polish boots are selected for children. For school and for ordinary wear the pebbled goat is preferred to kid. Cuir-color, bronze, and fancy morocco is used for dress-gaiters. They are trimmed with rosettes, tassels, and the fancy stitching and appliqué ornaments that are not in good taste for ladies.

PERSONAL.

THE great people of Great Britain are becoming quite natural and affectionate before the public. Heretofore, among those boasting "blue blood," it has been regarded as part of "the eternal fitness of things" that wives should do their kissing in the deepest seclusion of home; but Mrs. GLADSTONE, at the conclusion of her husband's brilliant speech on the Irish Church, rushed to the lobby as he was going out, and kissed him heartily. With such a precedent, what may we not look for at the conclusion of every good speech, in Parliament or in Congress?—a simple inquiry, or suggestion, for the lady readers of the Bazar—not a conundrum.

Mrs. LORILLARD RONALDS, whose rare personal beauty and remarkable vocal and linguistic acquirements have been much admired by the haut ton of Paris, has had such disagreements, etc., with Mr. R. as to result in a separation. The Tribunal Civil de la Seine, Paris, has decreed in her favor, giving her charge of her four children, an allowance of 2000 francs a month from January last, 6000 francs for expenses of the suit, and 9000 francs on her arrival in the United States, where, within six months, she is to sue for a final separation.

Mrs. General BANKS is described as a lady of strong and vigorous intellect, whose rich and varied experience in life tenaciously clings to, or, rather, is incorporated into the vicissitudes, the successes, and the ambitions of her husband. She is kind-hearted, unostentatious, and maternally, peculiarly engaging in conversation; and, while she graces the drawing-room with an air of perfect ease and familiarity with conventional dicta, she exhibits her absolute greatness and depth of character in cooking daily the superlatively good breakfast which she and the General enjoy. Mrs. BANKS displays, also, an exquisite taste in dress and arrangement of her toilette. She does not wear gewgaws, or try to swindle Old Time out of the years he has bequeathed her with email de Paris or rouge.

When Miss EMILY GILMAN, of Chicago, was married, recently, to a Boston clergyman, she boldly emancipated herself from the feeble fashion of having groomsmen at the wedding, but made it up in bridesmaids—having eight of those fascinating Chicago belles to help her through the trying ceremonial. Thus doth Chicago inaugurate the proper thing to be done by young people who propose to be "conquered."

Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY, who has been living in England for several years, has a charming residence in West Brampton, a suburb of London, very near to his friend, Mr. FROUDE, the historian, and not distant from the house of THOMAS CARLYLE, with whom he is also upon intimate terms. At a few steps from his door he is able to take a swift river-boat, which carries him to Parliament House or to London Bridge, in the very heart of the city. Probably no other American since WASHINGTON IRVING has had greater social success in England, through purely intellectual exertions, than has Mr. CONWAY; and this success he has faithfully used to generate correct opinion concerning America. Mr. CONWAY is a very industrious literary man, contributing constantly to American and English magazines, and preaching twice every Sunday.

The long-vacant pulpit of Grace Church, in this city, was occupied on the 26th ult. by the Rev. HENRY C. POTTER, D.D., late Assistant-minister of Trinity Church, Boston (Bishop EASTBURN'S). Dr. P. is a son of the late Bishop POTTER of Pennsylvania. Man of talent.

If what is written by a London correspondent be true, Prince CHRISTIAN is not the most popular of grafts upon the royal tree of England. The writer says: "A night or two ago I observed, when in the House of Commons, a tall, middle-aged man, nearly bald, enter the gallery set apart for distinguished visitors, and move nervously to the end of the bench, until motioned by the attendant to take a better seat in the centre. It was Prince CHRISTIAN, whose marriage two or three years ago, to one of the Queen's children, gave some offense. To this day the Prince has to keep in the background. There is a prejudice against him. He is too old, it is thought, for his wife; and then there is a story of a family which he left for the union which the Church approves. Time must hang heavily on his hands, for he has eternally nothing to do. The Prince of Wales votes him 'slow,' and the two are rarely together." He is said to have made matrimonial overtures at first to VICTORIA herself, who declined on her own account, and handed him over to her daughter. The Queen's other suitor, THEODORUS, King of Abyssinia, has just fallen a victim to his royal inamorata.

An actor in St. Petersburg, named WORMS, after playing the part of Armand Duval in Camille, received a bouquet inclosing a ring, a pin, and a set of shirt-buttons, of the value of $4000, with a note saying only, "To Armand Duval, from his Margaret." The actor returned them by the bearer with the message, "I am not Armand Duval, I do not know Margaret, and I have a wife." Excellent Mr. WORMS! He knew the naughty sender, who is a lady of high rank.

Mr. WILLIAM WHEATLEY, having accumulated a sufficient fortune to render the Poor-House as beyond contingency as a future home, has determined to cut America, and take up his residence permanently in England. No American theatrical manager—probably no European—has made so large a fortune so rapidly as Mr. W.

—Mr. THOMAS LE CLEAR, a pupil of ELLIOTT, is described by a New York correspondent of the Chicagoan as a small man, with a hearty, robust physique, and one of the best portrait painters in New York. His studio is in the "Studio Building," Tenth Street, where you can see his portraits of PARKE GODWIN, EDWIN BOOTH, and others. The portrait of GODWIN is one of the finest heads ever painted by any body. The management of the shadows and half tints is perfectly marvelous, and could not be done except by a master hand; the modeling of the face, too, is exquisite. But LE CLEAR does not confine himself to portraits alone. We all remember his "Itinerant Musician," once on exhibition in the Crosby Gallery, the perfect naturalness of the scene, and the fine feeling in the story that was told. It is to be regretted that this artist does not give us more of these stories.

—The ups and downs of life were never more strikingly experienced than in the case of the late ELIAS HOWE, the famous sewing-machine man. At the time of his death his executors surprised the public by announcing that his estate was not worth over $600,000. On settling it up it turned out to be insolvent! The question is, what became of the money? For several years it is known that his income was from $400,000 to $500,000 per annum. Some say he paid so much to the Washington lobby that he was beggared; others that he gambled and bought lottery tickets for many years previous to his demise. As these rumors are probably false, the mystery is deeper than ever.

—The impertinent and awkward interrogatory, "What was your grandfather?" has been answered in reference to the grandpas of several distinguished French persons, in the following plain style: "ROSSINI is the son of strolling players; DUPREZ, the great vocalist, the son of a perfumer; Mlle. RACHIEL was the daughter of a hawker, and the father of SAMSON, her master, kept a common little café. Among the actors many have risen from the same class; the children of grocers and bakers seem much drawn toward the stage. COQUELIN, of the Théâtre Français, is the son of a baker, and the superlative-comic actor, LEVASSEUR, of a laborer. EDMUND ABOUT'S father, too, was a grocer. ARSENE HOUSSAYE was born in the floury atmosphere of a mill. M. DURUY, the Minister of Public Instruction, whose name has been so talked of lately in connection with the furtherance of women's education in France, is the son of a workman in the Gobelins tapestry manufactory; the Maréchal FOREY of a gendarme.

—The scheme of excellent Mr. MERCER, to colonize the Pacific coast with the superfluous maidens of New England, has thus far been a success. Of the two hundred damsels exported about two years ago to Washington Territory, all found comfortable homes within a fortnight after their arrival out, and all but three are now married. MERCER, himself, became an early victim to one of the collection; but has given up philanthropy and gone in for avarice, being now running a line of steamers to Oregon.

—The American citizen having been surfeited with Italian and French musical people, lecturers from England, etc., is soon to be favored with a new sensation in the form of a French lecturer—no less a personage than the celebrated ALEXANDRE DUMAS, who has been engaged for a two years' lecture tour through the States. ULLMAN is his lessee—the same little fellow who took CARLOTTA PATTI to Europe, after not making his fortune in Ital. Op.

A young gentleman, Mr. SANDSFIELD, who sang at a private concert given for charitable purposes, a few evenings since, at Dr. WARD'S, in Forty-seventh Street, is pronounced to be not only the finest amateur tenor in town, but as having a voice of unusual purity and power.

—The latest Paris papers are quite enthusiastic in their commendation of ADELINA PATTI'S last operatic triumph in VERDI'S "Giovanna d'Arco," in which "she again astounded her admirers by the versatility of her talents." The work itself has not hitherto been heard out of Italy; it was never regarded in VERDI'S own country as one of his best productions. It has, however, afforded PATTI the opportunity of achieving another triumph. The weight of the Opera falls on JOAN OF ARC, the two other principal parts—sustained by Signor NICOLINI (the tenor) and Signor STELLER (the barytone)—being but secondary.

—Mr. Envoy-Extraordinary BURLINGAME has ordered apartments to be taken, at the Westminster Hotel, for himself and ever-so-many Chinese princes, secretaries, and such. He is expected here in about a month. Has just been banqueting in the exalted California style at San Francisco.

—Mrs. PRENTICE, wife of the editor of the Louisville Journal, died on the 26th ult. She was a lady of fine mind and culture, and of a beautiful and commanding presence.

—Madame DORA D'ISTRIA, already a member of the Archaeological Society of Athens, and of the Geographical Society of France, has just been made a member of the Athenæum of Venice.

—We learn from various papers, which seem to have published the item with a sort of chuckle, that Mrs. PANCAKE, of Peoria, has obtained a divorce from her husband, Mr. G. H. PANCAKE, and that the legal manoeuvre seems to have flattened him.

—Mr. DAVID GRAY, a clever gentleman on the staff of the Buffalo Courier, has just returned from a three years' tour in Europe, and is about to produce a novel and a volume of poems. The Courier is one of the strongest of the country-city press.

—One of the belles of Washington is said to be Miss BLANCHE BUTLER, a daughter of the General of that name.

Traveling Umbrella and Parasol Holder.

This arrangement will be found very convenient in traveling. Two holders of brown enamel-cloth are fastened to a wooden cane; these serve as a covering for the parasol and umbrella, thus protecting the outside as well as preventing the frame from being broken. Of course three or four such holders may be fastened to the cane instead of two. For each of these cut of enameled cloth four strips, each twenty-four and a half inches long by one and a half inches wide, afterward sloping them at one end till it is only one inch wide. These four strips are joined by fastening together every two along the sides with brown woolen braid half an inch wide. This woolen braid, a section of which is shown in the accompanying illustration, is ornamented in point russe embroidery with light brown silk twist. On the upper border of the holder simulate a small lambrequin, formed of pointed flaps, three inches long, made of enameled cloth, and bound with braid, after which the points are finished by a little bell worked over with brown silk. Each holder is now bordered on the upper and under edge with braid, in which is laid a brass ring. Then fasten each holder to the cane at both ends and in the middle by means of several threads of twisted silk, which are sewed through the holes in the cane made for that purpose. Finally, fasten a brown silk cord to the cane, by means of which the umbrella and parasol are tied together, and finish it on the ends with tassels.

Netted Egg Boiler.

This arrangement will be found very convenient when it is desired to boil a large quantity of eggs together, so that they may be taken out at the same time equally hard or soft; and also guards against breaking them. The net is very simply made. It is netted of fine white cord, and is fastened on the upper edge to a tin rim of about six inches in diameter, which is provided with small holes. The rim is furnished with a handle, as shown in the illustration. For making the net cast on a foundation of thirty stitches and work

BOTH these squares may be set together for covers of any size desired. The foundation is of linen, of average fineness, which is either hemmed on the edge, worked in button-hole stitch, or bordered with a row of single crochet. The working of the design is done in medium fine cotton, and the narrow edge with which they are bordered in crochet cotton. In setting the squares together, the corresponding scallops are sewed together with the same cotton, or they may be fastened together each with a slip stitch.

For the design of the first square make next, for each of the cross lines, two rows in back stitch, separated by four threads of the stuff. Between every two opposite rows of back stitch sew over the four threads of the stuff with stitches directly crossing them. (See the illustration.) Then work seven knots in the centre of each of the squares thus formed. The lace on the outer edge consists of two rounds: 1st round.—Alternate 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch. (chain stitch), passing over one stitch, or a corresponding space. 2d round.—1 sc. (single crochet) in a dc. of the former round. * then 1 ch., 1 p. (picot) pointing outward, composed of 3 ch.; 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the first of these three stitches; 1 p. pointing inward—in making this also crochet 3 ch., take the needle out of the stitch, put it in the first of the three stitches, take the dropped stitch again on the needle, and crochet it, together with the stitch already on the nee-in the third round; the order of the beads in the figures of the design can be learned from the pattern. The steel beads, being the darkest shade, form the central point of each diamond. Having finished a strip of the requisite length (this depends on the length of the comb), point the end as shown in the illustration, and sew the long sides of this strip to a back with overcast stitches, stringing on alternately a steel and crystal bead with every stitch. The manner of doing this is shown by the illustration.

Bead Mosaic Case for Pocket Comb.

This case is so simply and easily made that even little girls can work it. The original is worked in bead mosaic. The foundation is blue; the design, which is in diamonds, is worked of steel, crystal, white, and opaque beads. The bead mosaic is worked crosswise, backward and forward. The case may be worked after the pattern here given, or after any other tapestry design in long cross stitch. Reckon one stitch in width and in breadth as one bead. In beginning the mosaic string on as many beads as the design counts stitches in width. According to our pattern, this is sixteen beads; on this work back the first round, in doing which take one bead on the needle, passing over the last of the beads which were strung on, and putting the needle through the bead before the last of these. Then take a bead again on the needle, again pass over the next bead, put the thread through the next following bead, and so on. The first figure of the design begins the threads lying loosely, so that these are fastened, and form a triangle. Now stick the needle again out from the first centre, and then close to the first cross stitch; work another cross stitch, etc., in the manner shown. The lace on the outer border consists also of two rounds, of which the first is composed of dc., each separated by a ch. 2d round.—* 6 dc., each separated by a ch. in Glove Case.

MATERIALS: Brown silk, corn-colored silk twist, brown silk ribbon, paste-board. The glove case, which is shown open and closed in the illustrations on page 468, is so arranged in different compartments that the gloves may be separated according to colors. The pattern consists of a double piece of silk twenty-three inches long by eleven inches wide. These double pieces of stuff are sewed together on both ends and one side, after which four pieces of pasteboard, each three inches in width, are shoved into the places prepared by cross seams, at the distance of two-thirds of an inch apart. The length of the pasteboard pieces must correspond to the width of the silk, and the first piece must lie close to one end. The double material is now sewed together on the side which was left open for the reception of the pasteboard, and the two outsides embroidered in point russe with corn-colored silk twist in such a manner as to mark the contour of the pieces of pasteboard. The illustration on page 468 shows the design in point russe. Make, first, a common button-hole stitch, lay the thread diagonally downward and make a second stitch as shown in the illustration. The end of the stuff which remains without pasteboard is worked on both sides in point russe as shown in the pattern. Then wind eled cloth, which forms the outside of the bag or the underside of the cover, an oval piece thirty-one inches in length by twenty in breadth; then of the gray enameled cloth a piece half an inch smaller in circumference than the other. To the gray enameled cloth glue on a brown strip one half inch in width, and cover the place where they are joined with brown silk braid, which is cross stitched on with silk of the same color. Border the brown piece at the distance of three-eighths of an inch from the edge with a row worked in herring-bone stitch with corn-colored silk twist, after which glue together the two pieces on the backs and scallop the edges. The middle part of the piece of double material which is thus formed—17 inches by 14—is now bordered by a line which is marked on the gray side. In this part cut cross slits at the distance of two-thirds of an inch apart, through which run four wooden rods, laid flat together, or one flat cane in such a manner that the rods lie alternately once over and once under the double cloth strips which were formed by the cutting. In the following row the order of taking up the strips with the canes or rods must alternate with the last, by means of which a draught-board design is formed. See illustration. The ends of the rods must be shoved between the double material and glued fast, after which the ends may be hidden on the brown side by means of a strip of brown enameled cloth half an inch in width, which must reach to the outer edge, and is first glued on and afterward fastened in cross stitch with twisted silk. Each cross stitch covers four of the wooden rods, or one cane, while between each cross stitch is a straight stitch. On the gray side the ends of the rods are covered by means of a gray strip of leather one inch in width, which is glued on. Then fasten on each Traveling Bag.

MATERIALS: Brown enameled cloth, gray enameled cloth, 112 thin round wooden rods, or 28 flat canes, each 18 inches in length; 12 small black japanned wire rings; 44 inches brown woolen, 84 inches brown silk braid; brown and gray sewing silk, corn-colored silk twist, a shawl-strap. This traveling bag is convertible at pleasure into a table-cloth or mat, and will be found especially useful on a journey or for picnics, as the lunch which is carried in it may be served on the table-cloth that is formed by unfolding it. The bag may also be used for marketing, etc., and the cover as a mat for putting under hot dishes, or as a protection for elegant table-covers. The accompanying illustrations show the bag circled by the straps and unrolled as a cover. The original is of brown and gray enameled cloth and slender round wooden rods, with which the oil-cloth is interlaced. As is shown in the accompanying illustration, flat canes may be used instead of the wooden rods. For making the bag, cut of the brown enamend of the cover, on the brown side, six of the rings mentioned under materials, and draw through them a woolen braid twenty-two inches in length, the ends of which are finished with small tassels, in order to prevent their drawing out. These are made of a strip of enameled cloth one and a half inches wide, in which are cut slits a hair's breadth apart, after which the strip is rolled together with tassels. This finishes the cover.

In order to form the bag tie the ends of the braid together, by means of which the ends of the cover are drawn up in pleats, thus forming the bag, which is fastened by means of an elastic loop and a button, which is fastened on as shown by the illustration.

Instead of a handle, which would be in the way when using it as a cover, encircle the bag with a shawl-strap.

Embroidered Port-Folio.

The elegant form and material of this port-folio renders it especially suitable for ladies, and any one can make it without assistance from a mechanic. The original is of silver gray and green silk; the gray, which forms the outside of the port-folio, being embroidered in half-polka stitch with black and white silk. The inner part of the port-folio, which serves as a writing-desk, is covered with green silk. The size of the pattern, which is given in Supplement No. XII., Figs. 42-44, is eleven inches in length by eight inches in breadth. Cut first, of the size given, two equal pieces of heavy pasteboard for the sides of the port-folio, and, as shown in the pattern, a piece to fold over as cover. These pieces are joined by means of two strips of thick linen, which are glued together. Next, cut for the outside a piece of gray silk twice the above size, allowing, also, for seams, and a similar piece of green silk for the inner covering. Having embroidered the gray silk with the assistance given by the illustrations and the designs (Figs. 42-44), join it over the pasteboard with the green silk first by means of overcasting it, and then by stitching it with black silk close to the pasteboard. The edge of the port-folio is bordered by a fine green silk cord.

For each of the pockets, which are brought on both the inner sides, cut two equal pieces of green silk, with a foundation of buckram, and sufficiently longer than the port-folio for a deep fold to be taken up on each end in order to form the sides of the pockets. These pocket-pieces are sewed to the port-folio on three sides, and then bordered with fine green silk cord.

Lastly, finish the port-folio with the part used as a writing-desk. For this cut two equal pieces of pasteboard, somewhat smaller than the sides, and fasten together with a back of double linen. Cover the part thus prepared on the outside with green silk, and on the inside with green cloth, and border it with the cord; after which fasten it to the port-folio in the manner shown by the illustration, which gives the port-folio open. A lock of chased steel finishes the port-folio.

Gentleman's Collar Box.

THIS box is designed for gentlemen's shirt-collars and cuffs, and is especially useful in traveling. The foundation is a round pasteboard box, six inches in width by two and a half inches in height, covered with black, gray, or brown silk, cashmere, reps, or other materials, embroidered to suit the taste. The original is covered with brown cashmere; the cover is embroidered with brown and white silk in back stitch, half polka, and herring-bone stitch. The illustration on page 469 gives one-fourth of the design. Another illustration gives a different design, which is worked in the same manner. The beads are put on by means of through and through stitches. The rim of the box may also be worked in a design corresponding to the lid. The illustrations show the box with and without the cover.

PAIRING.

It was the time of the hawthorns,
The time of flowers and of love,
The time for the pipe of the blackbird,
For the wooing notes of the dove;

The time of the cowslip bell-buds,
Of the honey-suckles sweet,
When with mutual shower of kisses
The Spring and the Summer meet.

Under the bloom of the lilacs,
Under the blue of the sky,
Arist dreams pursuing,
Wandered Linda and I.

She with her brown eyes glancing
Now and anon at my face,
Woman-like, arch yet bashful,
Mixture of wiles and of grace.

I with my thoughts all tender,
Half ashamed to be caught,
Loving, and yet defiant
I by a girl should be taught.

Sweet mysterious compound
Of love, of shame, and of pride;
Oh, I felt its thorns and its roses,
And so did she at my side.

But at last were the words low-spoken,
And heard with a smile and a sigh:
"Love, the whole of the world is pairing,
Then why not you and I?"

THE FIRST SUNDAY OF LENT. (IN PARIS.)

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

NOT at all the kind of Sunday that English visitors to Paris often spend—acting on the principle of doing at Rome as the Romans do—ignoring their decent, British, Sabbatical ways, to join, nothing loth, in the foreign fashion of keeping Sunday; and "assisting," since there is nobody there to see, at exhibitions, concerts, promenades, and even Sunday evening theatres. We did nothing of this, and yet I fear our Sunday was not a rest-day, but spent in a sort of religious dissipation. From eight A.M. to five P.M. we were constantly at church, or, more correctly speaking, at churches.

We wanted to see how the more seriously-minded half of Paris comport itself on a Sunday, supposing it has any strong feeling about the day at all; which, at first, one feels inclined to doubt; for unquestionably both Catholics and Protestants, however devout, do not regard the Sabbath in the strict Mosaic light which many of us do, and are far more latitudinarian—or liberal, which you will—in its observance. Above all, we wished thoroughly to see, and fairly to judge, those fine Roman Catholic services which our English ritualistic churches labor so feebly to imitate, believing—as I think they do believe in all sincerity—that if we could only revive dead outside forms, the sleeping spirit of religious faith would soon be reanimated into earnest life. Which visionary hope reminds one somewhat of those pathetic child-funerals—I think in South America—where it is the custom to dress the little corpse in its best attire, put a gilt crown over the sunken forehead, and garlands and playthings in the stiffened fingers, and so carry it in procession through the streets, as if alive—yet it is but a corpse after all. Alas! something more than gorgeous vestments, flower-decked altars, and picturesque churches is needed to rouse in any dead soul the true spirit of religious belief—the life "hid with Christ in God."

I do not say we found this; but we tried to seek for it, both in Catholic and Protestant worship; and I dare not say we could not find it, or that it was not there. Of the four services we attended, differing as they did, there was yet in each something with which any sincere Christian might honestly sympathize, if he went in the spirit of sympathy and not of opposition. I say this deliberately and fearlessly, because it seems to me that even good Christians do not feel half strongly enough that pure religious faith delights less in negatives than affirmatives: in agreeing with our brother in as many points as we can, and passing over the rest as matters solely between him and his God, instead of hunting out, with "flaw-seeking eyes like needle-points," the various subjects upon which we differ from him, and resolutely and fiercely ignoring those upon which we might possibly agree.

I confess I do not feel this delight in differing from, or dread of conforming to, other people's faith. Without wishing to offend a large body of sincerely pious people, I must own that I have no horror whatsoever of the Pope, and that "the beast" and "the woman in scarlet" never come into my head, even in the most obnoxious of Catholic churches. I can look on all their beautiful "idolatrics"—as Exeter Hall would say—as calmly as a man looks on a ball-room belle or a siren of the stage, recognizing her various claims to admiration, but without the slightest intention of marrying her. Nevertheless, speaking of idolatry, I think we somewhat misjudge our Catholic brethren on this head, even as on the opposite side we often greatly misstate the faith of Unitarians. In both cases we take for granted, not what they say they believe, but what we think they believe, and judge them less by their real creed than our own presumed interpretation of it. As a rule, intelligent, rational Catholics always protest that they do not "worship" their images, but merely hold them in reverence as helps to devotion—which, by-the-way, considering how puerile and almost ludicrous most of them are, is one of the oddest and most contradictory facts in the Catholic religion.

One of the few French churches in which one's taste—one's artistic taste, I mean—is not continually offended, is the ancient church of St. Roch, in the Rue St. Honoré. To pass out of the noisy, busy street—busy even at early morning, and on a Sunday morning—into its quiet, sombre shadow, gives a sense of indescribable peace. Then there is such a strange, weird light shed—I know not how, probably by concealed yellow glass—upon its high altar; its painted windows are all so wondrously beautiful, and the various religious pictures and sculptures with which it is adorned are of sufficiently high art to be, at all events, no actual hindrance to the feelings they were meant to excite. There are, for instance, in a chapel at the eastern end, two groups, somewhat above life-size, of the Crucifixion and the Entombment, startlingly vivid in their conception, and very fine in their execution—especially the first one. The Saviour lies prone—extended on the as yet unlifted cross—to which two soldiers are in the act of nailing, one a hand, the other a foot. Both pause, as if appealing to the centurion standing by—"Must we do this thing?"—but the Christ appeals not at all. Infinite submission is written on His face. And I think even a stanch Protestant—knowing how hard is this lesson, which we must all learn after Him—might stand and gaze at the figure, lying so still and white in the sacred silence of the early morning, and accept from it a mute sermon, as good as many an anti-papal thunder-bolt fulminated from some pulpits I could name.

St. Roch has numerous small chapels—nooks where any weary soul may go in and pray, almost unobserved. These, on that Sunday morning, were sprinkled with many of these solitary, motionless figures, chiefly women, which, to me, are the most touching point of Roman Catholic churches. They come for no external form of worship, putting on their best go-to-meeting bonnet, joining with or criticising their neighbor in a regular service; they just creep in quietly, kneel down and pray on their own account, and for some strong personal need. I can never pass one of them—so quiet, so absorbed—without wondering what blessing is to be implored, what sorrow to be averted—all the countless secrets that every human soul must have; and however blind I may deem the prayer, I dare not—I would not if I dared—look with other than reverent eye upon my brother or sister "that prayeth."

Besides these individual worshipers, I found at St. Roch, early as it was, not much past eight A.M., a considerable congregation—in fact, two distinct congregations, assembled before the two principal altars, at each of which was going on the basse messe, which every priest is bound to celebrate once a day. Those who attended it were chiefly the better order of working people, though there were some very poor—poorer than any of the folk who venture into our churches on Sunday; but here they are not afraid. There was also a large sprinkling of Sisters of Charity, paying their religious devotions before entering on their day's work of practical worship—how hard and how nobly done, probably none could judge except a Sister of Charity. I never can look without respect upon those rough black gowns, those frightful white poke caps or bonnets, which often hide such sweet, saintly, and even beautiful faces.

One of them, which happened to be close beside me, will rest on my memory for years. She was quite a girl, certainly not five-and-twenty, with features correct as a piece of statuary. I never saw a lovelier outline of mouth, cheek, and chin, melting rosy down into a throat that was absolutely perfect in color and form. And the expression—so still, so absorbed, as she knelt utterly unconscious of my gaze, counting her beads with fingers that in spite of the injury of hard work, were still finely shaped; purely aristocratic hands. Raffaele would have made her into a Madonna at once. One could not help thinking—who was she? What had been her history? Could any great anguish have awakened this religious ecstasy which had led her to resolve to be nobody's wife, nobody's mother—instead, to spend her life in the incessant, often repulsive labors of a Sister of Charity? Would the impulse last? Would no natural, human regrets ever arise causing her to repent of her vow?

These questions, of course, found no reply; and I left her kneeling there, utterly engrossed in her rapt devotion, and unconscious that she had been the object of such admiration, such earnest speculations. She goes down among the list of living pictures which a student of human nature is so constantly meeting, and which are as interesting as any fine-art galleries in the world.

This basse messe always seems to me the most expressionless and empty of all religious services, a mere mumbling and muttering, without audible words to dignify and make it comprehensible; while, on the other hand, it has none of the outside shows, the music especially, which appeal to the heart without need of words. But the congregation seemed quite satisfied, and knelt in their places with reverent air, sincerely convinced that they were serving God in their own way, which doubtless they were; but it was not my way—so I soon quietly departed.

In passing one of the old men who sit at the doors, offering to outgoers the funny little brush of holy water, he, no doubt recognizing a daily visitor to the church, held it out to me; but I shook my head with Protestant, though smiling, honesty; at which, good soul, he took no offense, but meekly drew back his brush, and answered with civil emprossement some questions about High Mass, which was to be celebrated that morning; nay, thinking he had not made it clear enough, the poor old fellow almost jumped out of his box to call after me:

"Madame! Madame! Onze heures, à onze heures précis. La grande messe avec la musique!" As much as to say, "Don't miss it upon any account, and you will see what will make you a good Catholic to the end of your days."

No, my friend, it didn't; and, moreover, I doubt if any thing ever would. Never could I resign my own plain, common-sense reason or faith, to be led blindfold by any man alive—not to speak of that conglomeration of men who call themselves "Holy Mother Church." Far better live orphaned for ever, or recognize only the one Father—God.

Nevertheless, I will confess I was deeply interested, strongly affected, by witnessing for the first time that splendid show—before which our best ritualistic imitations are tawdry—the regular Sunday High Mass in a fine Roman Catholic church. This being the First Sunday in Lent, the adornments of the church itself were much less than usual; indeed, if I recollect right, the altar was not decked out at all, and there was a general impression of blackness, black draperies, chairs, and so on, spreading a certain sombreness of effect. But the music—my poor old janitor might well urge it upon me—for it was divine.

When we entered they were singing the "Kyrie Eleison," out of one of Mozart's most noted masses. Wave upon wave it came, "Eleison! Eleison! Kyrie Eleison! Christe Eleison!" sometimes in boys' voices, clear, angelic—I am sure the angels must sing like little boys—sometimes in the deep roll of some voices which they have at this church of St. Roch, two or three of the grandest, solidest basses I ever heard. They used quite to overwhelm me with their majestic pathos, until, one chance morning service, I happened to sit near the owners of them, three very ugly and not too cleanly little Frenchmen, who looked exactly like, what I believe they were, decent, respectable "épiciers." Of course these are the "stage effects" common to most forms of worship, and especially to the Roman Catholic.

Nevertheless, High Mass possesses, in common with its opposite pole, the Quaker service, one great merit—it leaves one very much to one's self. How many a time, when in English or Scotch churches, has one not longed to go into a Friends' meeting-house, and sit there, dead silent, with every one else mercifully silent likewise, for the whole two hours! One is sometimes goaded into thinking that any kind of dumb worship—even that of the Indian Jaquir, who stands all day on his head in the sun—would be preferable to having to sit and listen to a man who goes talking on about things which he neither comprehends himself nor makes you comprehend; or if you did, you might wholly differ from him, yet can not rise and protest, telling him that his whole argument is based on premises taken for granted, but as yet entirely unproved; or that six verses out of the Bible would prove more, and be more acceptable, than all his discourse.

But silence, or very fine music, are devotional expressions in which all worshipers can meet upon equal footing; because, throughout, each man preaches to himself his own sermon. I believe it was no sacrilegious worship to sit an hour in St. Roch's, without either prayer-book or hymn-book, and drink in that glorious music—music with scarcely intelligible words—which carried one away in thought to the choir of saints and angels, and all the innumerable company of the happy dead, to which we trust we shall one day go. And, though not quite agreeing with a certain good man, who, at the close of a funeral sermon, assured his hearers that their life in heaven would be "singing hallelujahs for ever and ever" (which—I remember thinking—some of his congregation would, not like at all)—still, as all real music lovers feel, there is something in a body of harmonious sound more utterly spiritual, more approximating to what we ascribe to the nature of spirit, than any thing else in this world. All other sensuous delights can be touched, tasted, handled, or at least beheld; this one is wholly intangible and invisible, nothing in itself, and apparently evoked from nothing; when it ceases, it ceases as completely as if it never had been—at least to all our human senses. Yet while it lasts it is a real thing—an ecstatic sensation, as perfect as any sensation we know—and may be revived at will into the same vivid existence.

I once heard it said—by a musician who now comprehends it all—that his nearest conception of pure "spirit" was the sound of one of Handel's choruses. And I never hear fine music—finely executed—such as this Mass of Mozart's in St. Roch—without vividly feeling the same.

There was a pause in the service, first when the tall bedeau went round preceding an unctuous-looking priest, who, in the usual whining voice, presented his bag "pour l'entretien de l'église," or, briefly, "pour l'église." Again, when two sweet-faced altar boys, either of whom might have sat for a portrait of that celebrated young saint, decapitated by some Jews, when the pretty head kept singing "Ave Maria" by itself all day and all night long, went down the aisle, and came back in procession, accompanied by two other boys carrying gigantic and very tottering lighted candles, preceding a basket of bread. At least, not exactly bread, but a sort of broche, which they afterward distributed to the congregation. What was the meaning of it, or whether it was consecrated or not, I have not the least idea, but I thought in no case could it do me any harm, so I accepted and ate it. It tasted much like all other broches—which seems a favorite cake in Paris—and I do not find it has made me one whit more of a Catholic than heretofore.

Then the choir music began again—the mid-day sun came pouring in floods through the painted windows, and shone in a stream of glory on the high altar of the rock—from which the name of the church comes, though through what legend I do not know. Very little did we ever make out, or cared to make out, of these churches and services; they were just a dream of enjoyment, and I must say enjoyment of the keenest and most harmless kind. When the concluding strain died away—and High Mass was over—we rose and came away, feeling not the slightest desire to hear it every Sunday—or to exchange for it, or any imitation of it—our own pure, simple, earnest Church Service. Nevertheless we recognized fully that, in the wonderful beauty and perfectness of this service was a something that, appealing to imaginative minds, who bring with them half they behold, might prove most soothing, elevating, and consoling: even so far as to account partially for what ever seemed to me a great mystery—how any rational thinking being, of mature age, could ever be, still less become, a Roman Catholic.

As quickly as possible—one service ending and the other beginning at nearly the same hour—we drove to a very different place of worship, the French Protestant Church, in the Rue de Provence. And here we made, ignorantly, the same mistake that one is prone to make in Scotland between the Established "Church" and the English "chapel"—our cocher persisted in taking us to an "église"—Catholic of course—so that it was with great difficulty we arrived at the "chapelle" at all. One could not help smiling at these verbal distinctions, which are yet so natural and even right. Probably Ireland is the only country in the world where, by a curious and, I think, most unjust anomaly, the religious establishment of the minority enjoys the title and privileges of a "Church."

The chapelle in the Rue de Provence is not the original French Protestant Church, but a branch of it; which holds much the same relation to it that the Free or United Presbyterian churches do to the Established Church of Scotland. I believe the differences are merely on points of Church government. But there is a far wider breach now taking place: the secession headed by M. Coquerel the younger; which has caused as many heart-burnings and painful divisions of families against themselves as ever did the disruption in Scotland; raising a spirit of religious animosity that in so small a community must be painful in the extreme. Alas! when will people—good people—learn that the "sword" which Christ Himself declared He came to send upon earth must be only the sword of the spirit: pure, bright, and clean; strong and sharp, "to the dividing of joints and marrow"—as regards a man's own conscience, but never to be turned against the conscience of his brothers: never to be used in any human quarrel, never to be dulled by any fleshly taint of selfish vanity or personal wrong.

Nothing could be a greater contrast than the French Catholic church we had just left and the French Protestant one we now entered—where we found the service had just begun. It was plain, even to bareness: there was apparently a scrupulous avoidance of every charm of color and form. The building seemed all in straight lines, windows included; a mere room, simple as any Dissenting meeting-house, or one of those erections of the last generation, which one finds planted, oddly enough, in some of the most picturesque points of Scotch braes and hill-sides, as if Nature loved to worship God in beauty, and man in ugliness. But no; I can not say this church was absolutely ugly—only that it was simple even to severity.

It had neither altar nor pulpit, but the same sort of rostrum which one sees in Scotch Presbyterian churches, and on it stood the pastor—a mild, benevolent-looking man—in his ordinary dress—not unlike a Scotch Free Church minister. I noticed no precursor, but there must have been one, to lead the singing, which was going on at the time, the congregation sitting to sing, as they do in Scotland. And oh! the beauty of that hymn! What it was I know not: but just such a one might have arisen in the night-time from Waldensian valleys, or some of those lovely nooks of Southern France where the Huguenots had their main strong-hold—where they clung desperately to their faith, fought for it, died for it, with a tenacity of purpose that only the Scotch Covenanters have ever surpassed.

"We English have a scornful insular way
Of calling the French light."

So says Mrs. Browning in "Aurora Leigh," and proceeds to deny the "lightness"—in which I once thought she was mistaken. I do not now. No one could look round that congregation, with its faces of men and women—noble, simple, lofty: quite peculiarly so, I thought—without feeling that, Frenchmen and Frenchwomen though they were, "light" was the very last epithet which could be fairly applied to them. We are prone to judge France solely by Paris, which is about as just as if we were to judge England, that is to say, the whole of the British Islands, by London. Whether we recognize it or not, there is, in the various races which make up the aggregate of the French people, an element of strength, firmness, sincerity, faithfulness—as grand as any thing in our own nation. Probably it lurks deepest and comes out clearest amidst the old Huguenot blood, and in those relics of the ancienne noblesse and the cultivated middle-class of provincial propriétaires which have survived the terrible winnowing-flail of the Revolution—or, say rather, the Revolutions. But of this I can not judge—no foreigner could; only I am certain it is there; and never was I more certain than in watching that congregation in the Rue de Provence.

They were somewhat different from a Catholic congregation—there was little of that abandon of religious fervor that one sees in many faces at a Catholic church; they were less absorbed, more critical: but still grave, decorous, critical, receptive—like an English or Scotch, but more especially a Scotch congregation. And very like a Scotch sermon translated into French, but retaining its very forms of Calvinistic phrase, and its very tone of address to "mes chers frères," was the discourse into which, after a short prayer, and a still shorter—perhaps too short—reading of Holy Scripture, the good pastor plunged.

Of that sermon what can I say? There was nothing remarkably original in it; but the delivery was simple, dignified, sincere; and though it was extempore, the matter seemed well-considered, and the language—so far as one can judge in the rapid utterance of a foreign tongue—perspicuous, elegant, and good. But I think we should have preferred a little shorter sermon, and a little longer reading of le Saint Evangile, which he did read, very beautifully, in his musical, solemn, tender French—which at first seems impossible to that lively language, but, once familiarized with it, the gentle cadence of its "Vous, Seigneur" (the Deity is always addressed as "Vous"), its childlike grace and simplicity of phrase, especially in the New Testament, has a devotional charm which is quite peculiar, and never to be forgotten.

It was the same with the hymns. They were neither English nor Scotch psalm-tunes, nor German chorales: and, of course, they were utterly removed from any thing in the Roman Catholic service; but they had a beauty of their own, which was delicious even immediately after Mozart's grand mass. The last hymn especially, which was sung as the people were departing—for it was a communion Sunday, and a few of them, though not many, went out, the rest keeping their seats, just as in a Presbyterian church—and singing, sweetly and solemnly, that long-drawn-out and infinitely pathetic sacramental hymn, the music of which rings in my heart at this minute.

No doubt the Protestant Church of France has its weak points—what Church has not? and probably the weakest of them are its dawn-ing divisions, and the fierce rancor they excite—of bigotry on the one side, and fierce, youthful revolt against compelled belief on the other. But we thought we could better understand old historic France, and look forward more hopefully to the future of modern France, after having worshiped with that little congregation in the Rue de Provence.

We came out into the bleak sunshine—oh, how bitter-bleak Paris sunshine can be!—and took an hour or two's wandering through the bright streets, where the people were gradually thickening. The city had put off its devotional, and put on its holiday face for the rest of the day. It evidently agreed with the birds, who, as some good Scotchman once rather regretfully observed, "went on singing just as if it wasn't Sunday." These good French folks—chiefly of the bourgeoisie, their wives, and daughters—loitered about, looking in at all the shop-windows that were open—which included nearly every one in the Rue de Rivoli—and I own I should like to have gone with a gendarme down the whole length of the street and closed them all, saying, "Rest, perturbed spirits; rest, if you can do no more." Then they hung in clusters round the doors of country-bound omnibuses in the square of the Palais-Royal, or went in little bands to the noble galleries of the Louvre, with all its stores of centuried learning, that he who reads may read—a source of Sabbath instruction and amusement which I for one should be very sorry to deny them. For the rest, they went about their several ways and comported themselves much as Parisian Sunday-afternoon promenaders usually do. They harmed us not; and no comments shall be made upon them—we English have too many glass-houses of our own to afford to throw stones.

It was more by chance than design that we fell in for our next service, perhaps the most curious of all. Entering a church to rest—and, oh! the rest to tired soul and body that those dim, cool, silent churches are sometimes!—we found it was St. Germain l'Auxerrois, notable in history as being the one from whose tower had sounded the warning bell, the signal for the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The slaughter began there, and in the Palace of the Louvre, just opposite, continuing all throughout Paris, till by morning the Seine—this slow, quiet, muddy Seine, which we had stood calmly watching—ran red with blood.

A strange remembrance—and it all happened here, just here. No wonder at a certain firmness, nay hardness, in those grave Protestant faces worshipping in the Rue de Provence. One could imagine what their ancestors' and ancestors' faces must have been; one can understand the maddened despair, capable of any courage, any fury, of these husbandless wives and childless mothers, and how they would develop into those stern, rigid Puritan women, who have left their remembrances stamped vividly even upon the present generation. Solemn, strange, and yet grand beyond the grandeur of most human existences, would be a life of which the key-note was "My husband," or "My father, was murdered."

This is the difference between modern France and England. Our tragedies, political and religious, mostly lie far back in the past, dim as old romance; theirs are scarce a generation removed from the daily present. The veil between is so thin that they feel as if the past might at any time become the present.

St. Germain l'Auxerrois is a very beautiful church; brighter and younger looking, so to speak, than St. Roch, without having the unpleasant modernness and pseudo-classicality of the Madeleine. The painted glass is fine, and the high altar has less than the average of foolish frippery about it. There is the usual broad, circumferent walk, interspersed with the usual number of quaint little chapels; nooks where some may pray, and all may rest and meditate, not without advantage. In several of these was going on a sort of Sunday-school—different classes of boys and girls standing, with grave little faces, to be catechised by some priest, generally a young man, who seemed to take much pains with them, and to whom they were very attentive.

Suddenly, high up in the tower outside, began to sound—not the awful tocsin of St. Bartholomew, and yet it might have been the self-same bell—I know not. Now, however, it rung out innocently clear, a common church bell, with its steady monotone. I asked my neighbor, a decent-looking bonne, in charge of a young lady, who knelt absorbed before an altar of the Virgin, what it was ringing for. "Les Vêpres," said she, briefly and severely. Then, this was the immortal "vesper bell," though most unpoetically ringing at three in the afternoon. However, we thought we would remain and see what there was to be seen.

Gradually there collected in front of the high altar a moderate congregation, chiefly composed of women; and when the bell ceased, there came filing in a line of priests richly vested, and another line of little boys, whose dress, I think, was of scarlet and white, but I do not clearly remember. They and the priests began the service with the ever-beautiful harmony of boys' and men's voices singing alternately or together, which the Catholic Church so well knows how to use.

Vespers is, I conclude, a litany rather than a mass; for many of the congregation joined in it out of their prayer-book, and it seemed to be in French, not Latin. It was less fine than the service at St. Roch, and yet a beautiful service in its way, or would have been but for the ludicrous effect produced by two young priests, who kept marching slowly up and down, reading their breviaries, within the chancel, stopping at every third turn to seat themselves solemnly on two high stools, over and outside which they carefully disposed their robes, said a prayer or two, then got up again and renewed their walk. What it all meant I have not the slightest idea, but the result was comical to a degree—especially the feminine care in the arrangement of the violet velvet.

This, and the singing, went on for about an hour; then the priests marched in single file out of the chancel, and as they passed we noticed them sharply.

I must confess these magnificent robes are not surmounted by the noblest faces in the world. It is curious, if true—and I do think it is true—that certain phases of religious belief always result in certain types of face, or, more correctly, it is the personal idiosyncrasy as shown by the face, which causes a certain line of religious thinking. You will hardly ever find combined a narrow creed and a broad forehead; a fat, sensuous jowl and an ascetic faith. The Catholic priesthood do not, as a body, look like men of intellect or refinement. Here and there I have seen some fine, benevolent heads—quite apostle-like—but, in the main, they are coarse and common, evidently taken from the lower classes, and educated only to a certain point; the point beyond which a human being ceases to be a mere machine, thinks spontaneous thoughts, and indulges in original acts, which might be rather inconvenient in a system of such total self-repression as the Catholic Church. These men, principally old men, were not different from their brethren: they had all the air of devoutness; but it was a dull, stolid, not to say stupid, air, implying superstition rather than faith, and the lazy following of others' opinions rather than that daring, wide-eyed search after truth for truth's own sake, which is the only thing which makes a religious man a true priest.

After they had passed and settled themselves in a long row opposite the pulpit, the congregation also turned their chairs round so as to face the same way: more hearers gathered, until inside and outside of the middle inclosure there was hardly standing-room. We looked intently toward the pulpit, where suddenly appeared a man in a monk's dress. We had come in for one of those Lenten sermons, with which the Catholic Church, wiser than our own in distinguishing the vast difference between an ordinary priest and a really good preacher, is careful to provide her devotees during the Fast. That this was a very popular prédicateur, the eagerness of the crowded congregation plainly showed. Who he was we knew not, nor does it matter, but he was a man of about fifty years of age, with a keen, mobile face, rather roughly cut—a little "under-bred," one might have said, had one met him in ordinary life; but of his intelligence there could be no doubt.

He waited till the mass of people had settled and hushed itself into attention, then he rose, and with a few preliminary bowings and crossings, began his sermon in a low, measured voice, gradually advancing into distinctness, power, and passion, till it rung through the whole church, where, as the phrase is, "you might have heard a pin fall."

Alas! it is only too few sermons that one can remember; I shall long remember this one, Catholic though it was. But there was not a sentence in it to which a good Protestant might not have listened with advantage. Its subject was "La Parole de Dieu," "sharper than a two-edged sword" and so on—I can not call to mind the exact text; indeed, I rather think it began without any text, but this was the theme of it: la Parole de Dieu, as heard by man throughout life, whether consciously or not; heard in nature, in human affections, in religious devotions, in all the events and crises of existence. In short, the Voice of God to man, forever calling, calling.

The preacher began by a vivid picture of the earliest dawn of life—the child in the cradle, encircled by household love, la Parole de Dieu only speaking to it through the lips of parents. He described with a tender vividness, that was strange to hear from him—poor celibate!—the happiness of father and mother bending over their first-born, and all the after scenes of family bliss; then traced the boy through youth and manhood, la Parole de Dieu still speaking to him under all manner of forms, and in every conceivable circumstance; forcing him at last to hear: because God is his father, and the Father will not let go His child.

"But," continued the preacher, suddenly changing into the personal, and bursting into something very like eloquence—French eloquence, it must be remembered—with abundance of gesture, with an impetuosity of delivery, that in an English pulpit would be called theatrical; and yet it never passed the verge where the dramatic becomes the mere theatrical—it never degenerated into mere acting. "But, how am I to know that God is my Father? How can His infinite greatness care for my infinite littleness? I am an atom, less than an atom, in the sight of my Creator, and the Creator of the universe. When I gaze abroad on Nature"—here he burst into gorgeous descriptions of the wonders in the heavens and earth, and under the earth, asking how we can look at these, and yet know that the Maker of them all is our Father.

"Know it? I do not know it. I know nothing, and attempt to know nothing. But I feel it here"—and he touched his breast, nay, struck it, with a violence plainly audible, and that cynics would certainly have called clap-trap; but I can not think it was such—not entirely. I can not believe but that there was some reality in the passionate pathos of the man's voice, as he kept repeating over and over again, those words which, if we once doubt, all life becomes a dead, hopeless blank—"Dieu est mon Père—mon Père. Il m'aime, je crois qu'il m'aime. And why? Because I feel it here. I feel that I love Him, and I could not love Him unless He had loved me first. Il est mon Père—mon Père."

"And, once sure of that," he went on, "I am sure of every thing. He will give me every thing, because he is my Father. You count me unhappy? I am the happiest man alive! You pity me as lonely? I am forever in the sight and presence of my Father. You think me without guidance? He leads me continually by His hand. For, Dieu est mon Père; Dieu m'aime, il m'aime toujours."

This was the burden of the sermon throughout. It entered upon no doctrinal questions; scarcely even laid down any moral laws; it carried the hearers quite out of the region of controversial theology into that high mountain air of Truth—the Truth of truths—which is Love. From that clear height, if we could ever attain to it, many diverse creeds might look almost identical—God knows! But whatsoever one might doubt or differ on, the man had struck a key-note, sharp and strong, which there could be no doubt about: the Fatherhood of God once recognized, in the individual as well as universal sense, solves all perplexities, and makes the riddle of life clear and plain. It was good to hear it thus preached—even from a Roman Catholic pulpit.

Thus ended, with a peaceful, harmonious ending, our strange, contradictory, and yet, looked upon in its deepest sense, this our most solemn Paris Sunday. We never heard who the preacher was; indeed, we never inquired—good and true words being said, it matters little who says them. But these words of his made us come out of church, that terrible blood-stained church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, with a wonderfully calm and happy feeling; sure that, after all, la Parole de Dieu is "sharper than a two-edged sword;" the sharpest and strongest thing in all this world. Also, that if, indeed, Dieu est mon Père (and if not that, He is nothing, does not exist for us as God at all) he will eventually make every thing clear and straight; reconciling all things to Himself; all things and all men. And, over the whirl and noise of this twilight Paris—this wonderful, dreadful, and yet pathetic city, which seems to chatter about Him so much, and to understand and believe in Him so little—there seemed to sound, wild as Jonah's voice in Nineveh, and sweet as another and Diviner voice in the streets of Jerusalem, the preacher's cry, "Dieu est mon Père."

GAGES D'AMOUR.

AN OLD STORY.

'Tis over! Your portrait I wrench from my chain,
Tears unbidden are blinding my eyes;
'Tis over, and sadly I'm gazing in vain
On a blank that I once thought a prize!
They warned me that you were a terrible flirt,
And bade me beware of your wiles,
But rashly I thought to escape any hurt
Neath the charm of your treacherous smiles.

Take back these sweet violets, sent me in May,
For a faint perfume hangs to them still,
Like the thought of past love is e'en dear on a day
When one's heart has been broken at will:
The Tennyson, also, you gave me last year—
See the page we so often have read—
Read again, if you can, with trembling and fear,
Oh, false girl, of "a day that is dead!"

And here's the bright ribbon you twined in your hair,
With a rose-bud you wore in your breast;
The ballad you sent me, I've kept it with care,
And the ring you had marked with my crest:
A lace-bordered handkerchief, brodered with "J,"
With a well-worn, small Houbigant glove,
A bundle of letters—what tales they could tell!
And a packet that's marked, "For my love."

For your love, indeed! 'Tis more shattered and dead
Than the poor faded flowers now returned;
Another true heart on your altar has bled,
Just one more silly moth has been burned:
Nor doubt it is sport honest love to betray—
And I dare say it adds to your fame—
Some day you'll repent and find out that to play
With men's hearts is a dangerous game!

WOMAN'S WORK IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

THERE is a pretty tradition at Venice, handed down among the inhabitants of the Lagoons, which says that a sailor brought home to his betrothed a branch of the delicate coralline known as "mermaid's lace." The girl, a worker in points, attracted by the grace of the coral, imitated it with her needle, and after much toil produced the exquisite fabric which, as "Venice Point," soon became the mode in all Europe. Lace-making in Italy formed the occupation of many women of the higher classes who wished to add to their incomes. Each lady had a number of workers, to whom she supplied patterns, pricked by herself, paying her workwomen at the end of every week, each day being notched on a tally. In the convent of Gesu Bambino, at Rome, curious specimens of old Spanish conventual work—parchment patterns with lace in progress—have been found. They belonged to Spanish nuns, who long ago taught the art of lace-making to novices. Like all point lace, this appears to be executed in separate pieces, given out by the nuns, and then joined together by a skillful hand. We see the pattern traced, the work partly finished, and the very thread left, as when "Sister Felice Vittoria" laid down her work centuries ago.

FEMALE EXTRAVAGANCE.

THE London Review, in a well-written article on Extravagance in Men, says very pertinently concerning the accusations thereupon which it is the fashion to launch against Women at large:

"Women are accused very unfairly of being over-extravagant. As a rule men are far more so, and the account against them is principally due to those who fritter every thing they gain or sell in numberless and nameless trifles. A woman has a natural title to being well clad—to being indeed clad so as to make the most of her appearance. She has a sense for jewelry. To deny her ornaments is to stifle a genuine and reasonable instinct. But a man who parts with a considerable portion of his income in order to comply with every freak of his tailor, and who really seems to have only used his brains upon the patterns of neckties, is one of the most pitiable creatures alive."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. STANHOPE.—The stitch called point russe has been frequently described in detail in Harper's Bazar. You will find elaborate instructions for working it in Answers to Correspondents, No. 24.

BADGER GIRL.—Slope the front width and one each side of it. Leave the others full and gather to a belt. It is now fashionable to gore muslin skirts to the knee and to finish out the length with a ruffle. If the puffs go around the arm small cords from one band to the other will hold them in place; if puffed to the elbow and ruffled the puffs are made secure over net or tulle. Middle aged ladies can wear white waists, but black lace or Brussels net is more becoming. Fichus are worn as a street garment.

ELIZABETH.—For a little boy a year and a half old a pretty style of dress is a gored slip of white piqué, or of percale, braided with feather edge braid up the seams. Loose jacket, round in front and merely reaching to the waist. Coat-sleeves. As we have frequently said, we furnish no patterns save those in the Supplement.

NEEDLE-WORK.—In crochet or knitting work a * merely shows the point in the work at which you begin to repeat. The abbreviation sl. stands for slip stitch, as already explained in the article to which you refer. A slip stitch is worked as follows: Having already a loop on the needle, insert the hook in a stitch and draw the thread through both together. A picot in crochet is any very small scallop. In the description of a foot-stool it indicates the scallops of the leaves and rosettes, and is worked in chain and slip stitch.

Embroidered Cravat Ends.

THESE two cravat ends, which are shown of the full size in the illustration, are, the first of lavender and the second of brown silk ribbon, embroidered in satin stitch with white silk, after the pattern given. The ends are pointed and button-hole stitched with silk of the same color as the cravat, and then finished with silk tassels.

Traveling Costume.—Belt with Pocket and Strap for Shawl.

SHORT dress and tight-fitting paletot of gray silk serge. The skirt is trimmed with a wide bias fold of the same material, pleated and set on in waves, as shown in the illustration. The bottom of the paletot is scalloped, and bound with brown silk. The belt is furnished with two pockets, the pattern of which is given in Fig. 41 of the Supplement. For each pocket cut of brown silk, silk lining, and muslin, two pieces from the pattern beforementioned. Baste the outside on the lining, having first set a corded bias strip of brown silk, about three-fifths of an inch wide, on the outside piece, furnished with a heading of narrow black passementerie gimp. Run the outside and lining together along the top of each part of the pocket, and sew both parts together, leaving the flap loose. Trim the pocket with silk tassels and passementerie gimp, and fasten it to the belt with two silk cords, which are knotted together just above the pocket. Brown straw-hat, trimmed with leaves and full of lace. The traveling shawl or water-proof cloak, necessary for protection against rain, is buckled in a strap, which is shown in the illustration. This arrangement consists of a long strip of gray enameled cloth, lined with brown silk, with a linen interlining, and bound with brown worsted braid, and afterward ornamented with black string beads, sewed on crosswise in the manner shown in the accompanying full-sized illustration. This strap is slung over the shoulder, and affords an easy means of carrying a shawl or water-proof.

third of an inch apart, nine stitches, then fasten each stitch with a button-hole stitch, working from left to right, and always so that the point of the needle is directed toward the middle of the button. Continuing in this manner, work around the thread of the former round in each new round.

Fig. 6 is a button of gray alpaca. The star is formed of fine gray silk. First stretch, as in Fig. 7, eight threads across the button at regular intervals, and wind these in the manner shown by the illustration with gray silk, which must not be too fine. Having covered almost the entire upper part of the button with the silk, fasten the threads with threads of silk between every two of the eight stretched threads; these drawn close form the star-like figure shown by Fig. 6.

Fig. 8.—This button is very similar to the former. In this also eight threads are stretched over the button, which are covered in the manner shown by Fig. 9, so that the eight threads finally appear as raised ribs.

Traveling Sewing Case.

THIS sewing case is especially recommended for use in traveling, because it has places for almost all necessary sewing utensils, besides ribbons, buttons, hooks and eyes, etc. Moreover, a sewing case of this kind requires little space, as it can be rolled tightly together. The material for making it is simple and cheap. The original is of gray ticking and blue ribbon; the border of the outside, as well as of all the pockets, is formed of the ribbon. The outside consists of two strips of gray drilling each eight inches in width by twenty-two in length, of which the one serves as the lining and the other as the outside. On the end which forms the flap the strips are cut in two points, which are finished each with two pieces of blue ribbon that serve to fasten the case and are cut of the proper length for that purpose. On the inner side of the case, next the flap, and also next the other end, are arranged six pockets, which open in opposite directions. Every three of these pockets in a row consist of a piece of stuff thirteen inches in length by two and a half inches in breadth, which are fastened on one side with a border, and on the other side are laid in three broad box-pleats, separated from each other by three-eighths of an inch space, so that the width of the strip is reduced to eight inches. The folded strip is cross stitched to the outside so that each fold forms a pocket. The revers of every two opposite pockets consists of a piece of stuff two and a half inches square with the edges somewhat rounded, and the edge bordered like the outside. This is sewed on with a cross seam, and provided with a button-hole corresponding to the button on each pocket. These pockets serve to hold worsted, silk cord, hooks and eyes, buttons, ribbons, etc., as is denoted on each revers. The space between each pocket is provided with bands of stuff and ribbon, which serve for holding the scissors, thimble, wax, and darning cotton. Besides these several flannel leaves are fastened to one side for needles, pins, tape-needles, etc.

HOW TO GRAIN WOOD.

THIS beautiful art has generally been given up to the house-painters, as work which no lady need attempt to accomplish, and altogether unsuited to her sphere of operations. But why this should be the case it is difficult to understand, since taste and the kind of skill required is by no means beyond the limit of a woman's genius or ability.

If on first trial the new business seems strange, and the results unsatisfactory, we would encourage the amateur to try again; she must on no account be discouraged by one or two failures, but persevere in the work, which will certainly be crowned at last with entire success. We have seen whole rooms grained and finished in the most exquisite manner by ladies of taste, some in oak, others in walnut or maple, while the book-cases of a library or occasional shabby pieces of furniture were renovated and made to look like new articles by means of a few hours' labor, and a very trifling cost for materials.

Suits of cottage furniture, no matter in what solid color they were originally painted, may be grained so as to look even handsomer than when first purchased. But before commencing any thing large or important, it will be best to practice considerably on smooth pieces of board, taking as patterns the best specimens within reach of the wood you are to imitate.

TO GRAIN OAK.

First have the wood on which you are to practice made as smooth as possible, and then cover with three or four coats of paint ground in oil and turpentine, mixed in the proportion of two-thirds oil and one-third turpentine. If intended for light oak, the ground may be formed by mixing white lead or zinc with Oxford ochre until it becomes a light buff. If a medium shade is wanted add a little Venetian red, to make it rather darker, and for dark old wood add a little burned umber and orange chrome. When this is dry the graining color is to be put on evenly all over, but not too thick. For light oak this may be made of either Vandyke brown or burned umber, with a little burned sienna added, if you wish to give it a reddish tint, or raw sienna, if a yellow tint is preferred; these may be mixed into the paint that is left after putting on the ground, and the darker the shade of the graining color the darker and richer will be the work produced. A little beeswax melted and mixed into the paint will prevent the running of the color after the graining is done.

Having coated it with the dark color while the paint is fresh, take a long comb (and if the teeth are here and there missing it will be rather an advantage than otherwise, as it will produce a variety in the size of the veins or lines), and draw it straight, or in a slightly crooked line, across the board from end to end in the direction the grain of the wood is supposed to run. Do this over the whole surface.

Next take a rather finer comb, and go over it again in the same direction, giving the hand a waving or slightly crooked motion. This will remove the stiff look of the first combing. Now take a rag and wrap it around a blunt stick, and, with your pattern before you, try to make the outline figures to be seen in the centre of the wood. Sometimes it can be done more easily by wrapping the rag around the thumb, or some other contrivance may suggest itself to the operator.

After the combing and figuring is done, it is sometimes desirable to blend the graining more, and to give something of a mottled appearance to the work. This is easily done by going over it with a badger's-hair brush very softly. Another way, and one more likely to give satisfaction, is to over-grain it when dry with Vandyke brown mixed in sour ale, with a little blue-black added. Before applying this, it will be best to sponge it with a mixture of fuller's earth and water.

The mixture for over-graining is supplied by dipping in the brush and drawing it directly over the surface, and then softening or blending slightly again with the badger's-hair brush.

There being great variety in the figures and gnarled appearance of the wood, there need be no tiresome sameness in the graining of a door or panel; and with a view to the acquiring of a varied style it will be well to use as many different patterns of the real wood as possible.

In many specimens there will be seen spots and cracked knots with very distinct shadings around them. These may be made by putting on touches of the darkest shade used, with lines traced in graceful curves around the knots; then comb with a coarse comb up and down, curving the strokes as they pass around the knots. The large knots can be retouched after the final over-graining with a small brush or hair-pencil, in order to trace the cracks or lines across the face of them.

When the paint is entirely dry a coat of varnish will bring out the colors finely, and finish it with the proper polish.

There is another style of painting called by painters, Distemper. The difference consists chiefly in the mixing of the paints, the process we have been describing having reference entirely to oil-colors, while the other method is by mixing them with size and water, or what will answer as well—thin glue-water.

Most of the paints which are usually mixed in oil can be prepared equally well in this way. The inner walls of houses can be done with this kind of paint; but great care must be taken before applying the paint that the surface is entirely smooth, and free from grease, lime, or dirt. If there is the least likelihood of grease being there the wall must be thoroughly cleaned by scraping, or by a wash of pearlash water.

When the wall is thus prepared let a coat of glue-water be put on warm, and when dry the surface should be well rubbed, and smoothed with sand-paper or pumice. The color may be mixed with thin glue-water as a size, but must not be put on too thick.

To grain oak in distemper, the wood or wall, after the preparation described, should be wet slightly with the sponge and the fuller's earth; then mix together Vandyke brown and a little burned sienna with a portion of the size, and with a brush or sash-tool, dipped first in the sour ale, spread on the color, and proceed to comb and over-grain as directed for oil-graining. (These directions are only for the graining; the ground is supposed to have been prepared in oil, as before described.)

This is not as handsome as oil-work, but is done more quickly and with less expense. When finished with a coat of varnish it will look very well.

WALNUT.

To imitate walnut the same general rules may be followed, only that a darker ground-work is produced by using more Vandyke brown or burned umber, graining with black and softening with the badger brush, with a good pattern in the natural wood from which to copy.

MAHOGANY.

Use the same colors for ground-work as directed for light oak, only adding enough burned sienna to give it a reddish tint. Mix together Vandyke brown and a little Victoria lake with oil; put it on when the ground is dry, but not as an even coat—rather in blotches or streaks. Mottle it well by rubbing it off here and there with a rag, and also comb it slightly in parts; then go over it with the badger until all are well blended. By going in the same direction always in using the badger a uniform shading will be given to the figures of the wood. The whole may then be darkened somewhat by going over with a coating of Victoria lake in distemper, finishing off with the badger.

This wood may also be imitated in distemper by staining first with Venetian red, and with Vandyke brown, burned Sienna, and Victoria lake to form the grains and figures, mottling the wood while it is wet with the badger. Last of all, touch it, and over-grain with Vandyke brown and a little black.

ROSEWOOD.

Color the ground with extract of logwood, an even coat; then with a coarse bristle brush put on some irregular streaks of Vandyke brown and black, leaving the red streaks between. Copy now from the real wood, using the over-grainer and fine comb to blend and curl the stripes. Over all this put on a coating of Victoria lake, and finish it with varnish.

When the wood is new and has never been painted, it will be much better to stain it first with the extract of logwood dissolved in spirits of wine, and then apply the dark colors in the way described.

Light mahogany furniture may be readily converted into rosewood by treating in the way described, only that the natural color of the mahogany will answer well for the ground, and the varnish previously put on the wood will not interfere with the application of the dark veining colors.

A MILLION A MINUTE.

THAT was my fortune. This is no dream, no romance. I set down the simple truth, strange as it will appear to many. During a portion of my life that was my income—a million sterling per minute—secured to me by papers held in my own hands. Never had I conceived of so much wealth as those papers entitled me to, and even as I read them I did not believe in their reality. They were real, nevertheless. So was the fortune. So, I am persuaded now, were the circumstances, romantic as they seemed, under which I gained it and lost it.

The money came to me under the will of old Rodney Gauntlett. Every body in the City knew him in his lifetime—knew him as a shrewd, active, hot-tempered man, and called him "old" while he was yet in his prime. If he ever unbent, it was to his little Julie, as he called me, and that was more often, I think, when I had grown out of my childhood and become a woman, and so more of a companion to him. In my younger life, I remember fancying that he avoided, and even regarded me with dislike. It might have been so. There was no apparent reason why he should regard me in any other light. I was only, as I knew quite soon enough, the child of an old friend—one Colonel Anthony Wyvern—whom he had adopted out of charity.

Ours was not a very lively home. Our house was an old one that had held its own in the City when the City had even its palaces. But in the long course of time it had yielded, foot by foot, to encroachments on all sides, until it was fairly bricked in, and utterly lost to public gaze.

Old Rodney Gauntlett's own rooms were on the ground-floor; they were like dungeons, but he never saw them so.

Bridget and I lived up stairs. Bridget, by-the-way, was our one domestic—housekeeper, nurse, and general servant in one. She was as old as her master. Thin white locks would stray out from under her mob-cap bound round with a black ribbon, and shine like silver. Her skin was yellow and wrinkled; her hands suggested claws, they were so hard and fleshless. But she had an eye bright and true as a hawk's; it defied age. Bridget was my good friend and almost sole companion.

As I was saying, our rooms were up stairs. They were three in number, and formed the whole of the second-floor. My share comprised a very large bedroom, that had been a reception-room in the old times, and a smaller apartment opening out of it. Bridget's chamber was outside mine, her door close to the top of the great staircase; so that sleeping there she, in a manner, kept watch and ward over me.

The smaller room, in which I lived, was like a room borrowed from the last century. It was wainscoted, and had a high mantle-piece carved over with Cupids engaged in festooning heavy wreaths about it. Above, there was an oval glass, slanting forward so that it reflected all below it, only a fraction of its surface being hidden by a small clock, on which it appeared to rest. The furniture was in keeping: tables with bowed legs and brass handles and fittings; chairs with oval backs and striped moreen cushions; escriptoires with drawers, and Indian jars—all these were conspicuous. But most conspicuous of all was a Japanese cabinet, very large and cumbersome, black as ebony, with quaint figures in gold and dead colors in slight relief. It must once have been very costly, but was now out of repair, and was only used to keep papers in.

I never recall my room without a thought of this cabinet. It is especially associated with the first visit of a friend of Rodney Gauntlett's, who afterward came often to the old house—far oftener than I cared to see him. As I was sitting by the window one evening Mr. Gauntlett entered with a stranger—a fine, tall, square-shouldered man, with an olive face, black eyes, and shining white teeth, whom he introduced as his esteemed friend, Mr. Hugh Dimsdale. My guardian was in fine spirits, and Mr. Dimsdale embarrassingly polite; but I noticed that the latter's eyes strayed constantly in the direction of the Japanese cabinet, which appeared to have a strange fascination for him.

That night's introduction was, as I have said, followed by many a visit on the part of Mr. Hugh Dimsdale. It was not long before he declared himself my devoted admirer, and begged me to regard him as a suitor for my hand. My patron, too, hinted as delicately as he could that such an arrangement would be gratifying to him. But I received him coldly; I could not like him; his coming chilled my heart.

Still he came and came. I had a suspicion that he knew how I loathed him, and gloried in his power to inflict the torture of his presence on me; gloried still more in suggesting a further horror.

"Am I never to prove my love by showing how happy I can make you?" he would ask.

"I am very happy," would be my cold reply.

"But as my wife? Ah, if we could only realize the future I have planned!"

"The present amply contents me."

So it went on.

At last he lost all patience, and grew fairly angry with me. Whenever we met his words were harsh and his looks threatening. I could not endure this, and, in one passionate outburst, bade him begone and trouble me no farther.

"I will never be your wife," I said. "I will die first. I hate you. Leave me!"

He obeyed; but there was a malignant glitter in his eyes as he strode from the room; and I saw that he bit his thin lips to bleeding to keep in the words with which he would have cursed me.

For more than a month I saw him no more. This might have surprised me; but during the latter part of that time I had no leisure to give a thought to him. My benefactor was taken ill. It was the winter time, and he was seized with a slight cold, of which he took no heed until inflammation followed; and he was soon really ill. Even then he would not deem himself an invalid, would not have a doctor, or give up his daily pursuits. Within a week he was worn to a shadow; his eyes sunk, his shoulders rounded, and a cough tore fiercely at his lungs. I was terrified; but he only laughed at my fears, and declared that he would soon be better.

On the eighth night of his illness I sat late in my room. I could hear him coughing below; but Bridget had brought a message that he was busy over his papers, and did not care to be intruded on. Having given this message, and assured me he had all he could need for the night, she had gone to bed. I was wretched, for I felt certain he was very ill and needed advice. Sitting there over the dying embers, I half persuaded myself to go to him, in spite of his message, and entreat him to comply with my wishes in this respect. But he was not a man whose will could be thwarted, or who was open to persuasion. So I tried to bethink me of some friend to whom I might appeal—some one who had influence over him. One name alone suggested itself—the hateful name of Hugh Dimsdale. At the bare suggestion of it I cowered over the grate with a shudder. But it seemed to act as a spell; under its influence thoughts crowded upon me, my mind grew morbidly active, and soon I was almost lost to consciousness in the bewildering perplexities of my own reflections.

For an hour I might have brooded thus. When I at length started, as out of a vision, I was conscious of a chilliness, and of its being very late. I put my hand to my waist for my watch. It wanted three minutes to two. Was that right by the clock on the mantle-piece? I asked myself. Instinctively I looked up. The leaning oval glass reflected me as I sat. I saw my own face and figure; and I saw more. There was another face looking over my shoulder—another figure standing at my back!

Yes, clearly and unmistakably I saw my benefactor, Rodney Gauntlett, standing there, and bending over me with a strange, pitying look in his face.

"You here, Sir!" I cried, turning round frightened—I knew not why.

There was no answer.

I half rose.

As I did so the form receded from me. It went slowly, with the shuffling gait of an enfeebled man. The face was toward me even when there was the width of the room between us. Then it turned away. It turned toward the Japanese cabinet; and I saw an uplifted forefinger beckoning me to observe what followed. The movement was so natural, so real, that it scared away the fears which were beginning to paralyze me.

"Speak to me, Sir!" I cried out, stepping forward as I spoke. "Or if you are too ill—"

The finger was raised again; this time as if to silence me. Then the face half turned. I could catch the expression of the eyes, and followed them. They seemed to single out a spot—a rose-bud in the flower-pattern of the cabinet—and then the pointing finger went straight to that spot.

Unless I dreamed, the bud yielded under the pressure of the finger-tip!

I saw it sink and spring back to its place. Then almost instantly a long, narrow panel fell out and dropped on the ground.

"You wish to show me the secret of this?" I gasped, looking up from the spot where the panel lay.

To my dismay I addressed vacancy. The figure was gone!

My alarm was intense. Had I seen the ghost of Rodney Gauntlett? My conviction was that I had. Yet the finger had touched the spring, the rose-bud had yielded, and there was the result before me! Could a spirit have done that? If so, for what purpose? While, more dead than alive, I asked of myself this second question, my eyes involuntarily turned toward that part of the cabinet from which the panel had dropped. A small aperture had been laid bare; evidently a secret recess; and what it contained was clearly revealed to my gaze.

It was a folded paper.

Here again was something real and tangible. It helped me to fight against the conviction that what I had seen was supernatural; though my frame shook with the terror of a ghostly visitation. With a tremulous hand I snatched at the paper and tore it open. Casting my eyes hurriedly over it I saw that it was a will—Rodney Gauntlett's will. Through a mass of blurred letters I gathered that by means of it he revoked all former wills; and then I lighted on these words, glowing, as they seemed, in letters of fire:

"—all my real and personal estate, amounting at this present writing to three millions sterling, to Julia Gauntlett, otherwise known and designated by me as Julia Wyvern, my own true and lawful daughter—"

I could read no more. The words swam before my eyes.

What! Was I Rodney Gauntlett's own child? Was it a fiction that he had reared me out of the love he bore his old friend? What mystery was here? What could have prompted so strange, so cruel a course? And now, why did he seek to atone for all by securing to me a fortune vast beyond computation?

These questions bubbled to my lips. The awe, the marvel, the mystery of what was passing confounded me. My only proof of the reality of all was the crackling of the paper I grasped in my hand. That was real, that and the cabinet from which I had taken it. Yes; and hark! The great bell of St. Paul's was chiming. Real enough, that. I stood and counted the quarterchimes; and then the first for the hour—One; the second—Two.

As the last echo died away I glanced again at the will. In the act of doing so, and stooping my head for the purpose, I suddenly fell heavily forward with a crashing sound in my ears. A blow had been dealt from behind, by an unseen hand, and under the force of it I dropped bleeding and senseless.

More than a week had elapsed before the sense of life returned to me. I was in my own bed, and Bridget's kindly face was bending over me. Pain racked my brow, and I was conscious of having suffered intensely. It was some time before I was permitted to ask questions, or to receive information as to what had happened. At length Bridget gratified my curiosity to an extent.

She informed me that my patron, Rodney Gauntlett, had died on the night to which I have alluded, at three minutes to two, as nearly as Bridget could calculate, she being then the only person in the house except myself. Her reason for fixing the hour was, that at three minutes to two—the time at which the house-clock gave "warning"—she being startled by a strange noise, had gone into his room only to find him dead in his chair. While there, a sound overhead apprised her of my fall, and at the same moment St. Paul's struck two. On rushing up stairs she had found me on the floor, where I had fallen, as she supposed, in hurrying to the sick man's aid, and with the back of my head bleeding.

At this stage I interrupted her with two questions of the utmost moment to me. Was she quite certain that there was no person in the house besides ourselves? She was quite certain. Did she observe any thing peculiar about the Japanese cabinet, or see any paper on the floor? No.

These answers startled me. It was hard to believe that I had been dreaming, and yet was it not more probable than that all of which I seemed to have a remembrance should really have happened? The apparition, the will, the enormous fortune, the disclosure of my relationship to Gauntlett, the brutal attack by which I was overpowered—who would believe in the reality of these things? How could I even believe in them myself? It was well-nigh impossible: yet it had all been so real, so terribly real to me, that I could not forego belief in it without a struggle.

However, I kept my own counsel. I said nothing to Bridget; nothing to the doctor when he came. In time I formed this further resolution—I would say nothing unless my impressions received some confirmation through subsequent events. One such confirmation they did receive—it was a very startling one. When Rodney Gauntlett's will came to be read, it was found that his fortune exceeded all belief. He had been money-grubbing and speculating all his life, but no one suspected that he had died worth—three millions of money! His will disclosed that fact for the first time. When I heard the words I fainted. Here was a corroboration of what I had discovered in my dream, or whatever it was, so strong that it utterly overpowered me. Unless I had read it in the paper I took from the Japanese cabinet, how could I have thought of that sum? Such a thing was beyond coincidence; and when I came to myself, I eagerly demanded a sight of the will. It was handed to me, and one glance dispelled all my illusions. It was not written on the paper I had seen, and it contained no mention of my relationship to the testator. My name was there, but only for an annuity of three hundred pounds for life. The bulk of the vast fortune was left in other ways, a very large slice falling to the share of the man I detested and had rejected, Hugh Dimsdale.

Time passed on. I had quitted the old house. All I have related had become a thing of memory. Bridget was dead. Hugh Dimsdale had gone I knew not where—to the Indies I had heard, but neither knew nor cared. I was receiving my annuity, and enjoying a simple country life, over which the shadows of the past fell lightly. In the process of time I had almost persuaded myself out of the reality of what I long held as the mystery of my life.

One winter evening an adventure occurred to me.

I was returning home from a long walk. Tired, and anxious to reach my cottage before dark, I took a short cut through a field adjoining a farm. In that field were several stacks of hay and corn, and as I passed these I saw that a group of persons, evidently from the farm itself, were bending over some object lying on the ground. My curiosity was aroused. I quitted the path, and went toward them. As they moved aside on my drawing near, I saw that it was a man who was the object of their attention—a squalid man in the rags of a beggar. He was ill, haggard, starving—yet I could not mistake that face.

"Hugh Dimsdale!" I exclaimed aloud.

He shuddered as he lay, then looked up feebly, shading his eyes with a tremulous hand. With that hand he then beckoned me to his side. Too weak to speak out, it was only by drawing my ear toward his mouth that he could make me understand what he had to say. It took this form:

"Julia Gauntlett—for that is your true, right name—I robbed you of all. I did it. Yes, yes: no need to hide it now. I knew Gauntlett's last will was hidden in that cabinet—knew it from the first; knew its purport, and strove to make you mine in consequence. Had you consented, we should have shared the old man's millions—you and I. You rejected me, and I had recourse to other means to get the later will destroyed, so that I might benefit by a former one under which I was entitled. I was in the house when he died, his life shortened by my means. I passed from his room to yours, when I had made sure of the old will that left me so much. I came upon you as you read the will you had found—the true will, in which he had acknowledged you as his child, and left you all. It was I who struck you down and secured that paper. I swear to you that this is the truth.”

“But tell me,” I cried, “what do you know of my father’s motive in disowning me—of my mother—”

“Nothing.”

“Destroyed. Consumed in the flames. The fortune can never be yours.”

They were his last words, spoken with his stiffening lips—and they were true. Without the will, it was impossible for me to gain one penny more of my father’s princely fortune than I now enjoy. The wealth he had designed as a recompense for the wrong he had done me—Heaven only knows why!—had flowed away into other channels, and could never be recovered. I had held the right to it for three minutes only: from the moment of his death—that in which he had appeared to me—until the villain’s hand snatched it away. Only for three minutes out of a whole lifetime; but during that space my income exceeded that of any potentate in the world. It was at the rate of a million a minute.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF “THE DODGE CLUB.”

CHAPTER LVI.

FATHER AND SON.

VIJAL, on going back to Brandon village, went first to the inn where he saw John. To the inquiries which were eagerly addressed to him he answered nothing, but simply said that he wished to see Potts. John, finding him impracticable, cursed him and led the way to the bank.

As Vijal entered Potts locked the door carefully, and then anxiously questioned him. Vijal gave a plain account of every thing exactly as it had happened, but with some important alterations and omissions. In the first place, he said nothing whatever of the long interview which had taken place and the startling information which he had received. In the second place, he assured Potts that he must have attacked the wrong man. For when this man had spared his life he looked at him closely and found out that he was not the one that he ought to have attacked.

“You blasted fool,” cried Potts. “Haven’t you got eyes? D—n you; I wish the fellow, whoever he is, had seized you, or blown your brains out.”

Vijal cast down his eyes humbly.

“I can try again,” said he. “I have made a mistake this time; the next time I will make sure.”

There was something in the tone of his voice so remorseless and so vengeful that Potts felt reassured.

“You are a good lad,” said he, “a good lad. And you’ll try again?”

“Yes,” said Vijal, with flashing eyes.

“You’ll make sure this time?”

“I’ll make sure this time. But I must have some one with me,” he continued. “You need not trouble yourself. Send John with me. He won’t mistake. If he is with me I’ll make sure.”

As the Malay said this a brighter and more vivid flash shone from his eyes. He gave a malevolent smile, and his white teeth glistened balefully. Instantly he checked the smile, and cast down his eyes.

“Ah!” said Potts. “That is very good. John shall go. Johnnie, you don’t mind going, do you?”

“I’ll go,” said John, languidly.

“You’ll know the fellow, won’t you?”

“I rather think I should.”

“But what will you do first?”

“Go to Denton,” said John.

“To Denton?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“Because Brandon is there.”

“How can he be?”

“Simply,” said John, “because I know the man that Vijal attacked must have been Brandon. No other person answers to the description. No other person would be so quick to dodge the cord, and so quick with the revolver. He has humbugged Vijal somehow, and this fool of a nigger has believed him. He was Brandon, and no one else, and I’m going on his track.”

“Well—you’re right, perhaps,” said Potts; “but take care of yourself, Johnnie.”

John gave a dry smile.

“I’ll try to do so; and I hope to take care of others also,” said he.

“God bless you, Johnnie!” said Potts, affectionately, not knowing the blasphemy of invoking the blessing of God on one who was setting out to commit murder.

John went back to the inn first, and after a few preparations started for Denton. On the way he amused himself with coarse jests at Vijal’s stupidity in allowing himself to be deceived by Brandon, taunted him with cowardice in yielding so easily, and assured him that one who was so great a coward could not possibly succeed in any undertaking.

Toward evening they reached the inn at Denton. John was anxious not to show himself, so he went at once to the inn, directing Vijal to keep a look-out for Brandon and let him know if he saw any one who looked like him. These directions were accompanied and intermingled with numerous threats as to what he would do if Vijal dared to fail in any particular. The Malay listened calmly, showing none of that impatience and haughty resentment which he formerly used to manifest toward John, and quietly promised to do what was ordered.

About ten o’clock John happened to look out of the window. He saw a figure standing where the light from the windows flashed out, which at once attracted his attention. It was the man whom he sought—it was Brandon. Was he stopping at the same inn? If so, why had not Vijal told him? He at once summoned Vijal, who came as calm as ever. To John’s impatient questions as to why he had not told him about Brandon, he answered that Brandon had only come there half an hour previously, and that he had been watching him ever since to see what he was going to do.

“You must keep on watching him, then; do you hear?”

“Yes.”

“And if you let him slip this time, you infernal nigger, you’ll pay dear for it.”

“I’ll not make a mistake this time,” was Vijal’s answer. And as he spoke his eyes gleamed, and again that baleful smile passed over his face.

“That’s the man,” said John. “You understand that? That’s the man you’ve got to fix, do you hear? Don’t be a fool this time. You must manage it to-night, for I don’t want to wait here forever. I leave it to you. I only came to make sure of the man. I’m tired, and I’m going to bed soon. When I wake to-morrow I expect to hear from you that you have finished this business. If you don’t, d—n you, I’ll wring your infernal nigger’s neck.”

“It will all be done by to-morrow,” said Vijal, calmly.

“Then clear out and leave me. I’m going to bed. What you’ve got to do is to watch that man.”

Vijal retired.

The night passed. When the following morning came John was not up at the ordinary breakfast hour. Nine o’clock came. Ten o’clock. Still he did not appear.

“He’s a lazy fellow,” said the landlord, “though he don’t look like it. And where’s his servant?”

“The servant went back to Brandon at day-break,” was the answer.

Eleven o’clock came. Still there were no signs of John. There was a balcony in the inn which ran in front of the windows of the room occupied by John. After knocking at the door once or twice the landlord tapped at the window and tried to peep in to see if the occupant was awake or not. One part of the blind was drawn a little aside, and showed the bed and the form of a man still lying there.

“He’s an awful sleeper,” said the landlord. “It’s twelve o’clock, and he isn’t up yet. Well, it’s his business, not mine.”

About half an hour after the noise of wheels was heard, and a wagon drove swiftly into the yard of the inn. An old man jumped out, gave his horse to the hostler, and entered the inn.

He was somewhat flushed and flurried. His eyes twinkled brightly, and there was a somewhat exuberant familiarity in his address to the landlord.

“There was a party who stopped here last night,” said he, “that I wish to see.”

“There was only one person here last night,” answered the landlord; “a young man—”

“A young man, yes—that’s right; I want to see him.”

“Well, as to that,” said the landlord, “I don’t know but you’ll have to wait. He ain’t up yet.”

“Isn’t he up yet?”

“No; he’s an awful sleeper. He went to bed last night early, for his lights were out before eleven, and now it’s nearly one, and he isn’t up.”

“At any rate, I must see him.”

“Shall I wake him?”

“Yes, and be quick, for I’m in a hurry.”

The landlord went up to the door and knocked loudly. There was no answer. He knocked still more loudly. Still no answer. He then kept up an incessant rapping for about ten minutes. Still there was no answer. He had tried the door before, but it was locked on the inside. He went around to the windows that opened on the balcony; these were open.

He then went down and told the old man that the door was fastened, but that the windows were unfastened. If he chose to go in there he might do so.

“I will do so,” said the other, “for I must see him. I have business of importance.” He went up.

The landlord and some of the servants, whose curiosity was by this time excited, followed after.

The old man opened the window, which swung back on hinges, and entered. There was a man in the bed.

He lay motionless. The old man approached. He recognized the face.

A cold chill went to his heart. He tore down the coverlet, which concealed the greater part of his face. The next moment he fell forward upon the bed.

“Johnnie!” he screamed—“Johnnie!”

There was no answer. The face was rigid and fixed. Around the neck was a faint, bluish line, a mark like what might have been made by a cord.

“Johnnie, Johnnie!” cried the old man again, in piercing tones. He caught at the hands of the figure before him; he tried to pull it forward.

There was no response. The old man turned away and rushed to the window, gasping, with white lips, and bloodshot eyes, and a face of horror.

“He is dead!” he shrieked. “My boy—my son—my Johnnie! Murderer! You have killed him.”

The landlord and the servants started back in horror from the presence of this father in his misery.

It was for but a moment that he stood there. He went back and flung himself upon the bed. Then he came forth again and stood upon the balcony, motionless, white-faced, speechless—his lips muttering inaudible words.

A crowd gathered round. The story soon spread. This was the father of a young man who had stopped at the inn and died suddenly. The crowd that gathered around the inn saw the father as he stood on the balcony.

The dwellers in the cottage that was almost opposite saw him, and Asgeelo brought them the news.

CHAPTER LVII.

MRS. COMPTON’S SECRET.

On the night after the arrival of John, Brandon had left Denton. He did not return till the following day. On arriving at the inn he saw an unusual spectacle—the old man on the balcony, the crowd of villagers around, the universal excitement.

On entering the inn he found some one who for some time had been waiting to see him. It was Philips. Philips had come early in the morning, and had been over to the cottage. He had learned all about the affair at the inn, and narrated it to Brandon, who listened with his usual calmness. He then gave him a letter from Frank, which Brandon read and put in his pocket.

Then Philips told him the news which he had learned at the cottage about Langhetti. Langhetti and Despard were both there yet, the former very dangerously ill, the latter waiting for some friends. He also told about the affair on the road, the seizure of Clark, and his delivery into the hands of the authorities.

Brandon heard all this with the deepest interest. While the excitement at the inn was still at its height, he hurried off to the magistrate into whose hands Clark had been committed. After an interview with him he returned. He found the excitement unabated. He then went to the cottage close by the inn, where Beatrice had found a home, and Langhetti a refuge. Philips was with him.

On knocking at the door Asgeelo opened it. They entered the parlor, and in a short time Mrs. Compton appeared. Brandon’s first inquiry was after Langhetti.

“He is about the same,” said Mrs. Compton.

“Does the doctor hold out any hopes of his recovery?” asked Brandon, anxiously.

“Very little,” said Mrs. Compton.

“Who nurses him?”

“Miss Potts and Mr. Despard.”

“Are they both here?”

“Yes.”

Brandon was silent.

“I will go and tell them that you are here,” said Mrs. Compton.

Brandon made no reply, and Mrs. Compton, taking silence for assent, went to announce his arrival.

In a short time they appeared. Beatrice entered first. She was grave, and cold, and solemn; Despard was gloomy and stern. They both shook hands with Brandon in silence. Beatrice gave her hand without a word, lifelessly and coldly; Despard took his hand abstractedly.

Brandon looked earnestly at Beatrice as she stood there before him, calm, sad, passionless, almost repellent in her demeanor, and wondered what the cause might be of such a change.

Mrs. Compton stood apart at a little distance, near Philips, and looked on with a strange expression, half wistful, half timid.

There was a silence which at length became embarrassing. From the room where they were sitting the inn could plainly be seen, with the crowd outside. Beatrice’s eyes were directed toward this. Despard said not a word. At another time he might have been strongly interested in this man, who on so many accounts was so closely connected with him; but now the power of some dominant and all-engrossing idea possessed him, and he seemed to take no notice of any thing whatever either without the house or within.

After looking in silence at the inn for a long time Beatrice withdrew her gaze. Brandon regarded her with a fixed and earnest glance, as though he would read her inmost soul. She looked at him, and cast down her eyes.

“You abhor me!” said he, in a loud, thrilling voice.

She said nothing, but pointed toward the inn.

“You know all about that?”

Beatrice bowed her head silently.

“And you look upon me as guilty?”

She gazed at him, but said nothing. It was a cold, austere gaze, without one touch of softness.

“After all,” said she, “he was my father. You had your vengeance to take, and you have taken it. You may now exult, but my heart bleeds.”

Brandon started to his feet.

“As God lives,” he cried, “I did not do that thing!”

Beatrice looked up mournfully and inquiringly. “If it had been his base life which I sought,” said Brandon, vehemently, “I might long ago have taken it. He was surrounded on all sides by my power. He could not escape. Officers of the law stood ready to do my bidding. Yet I allowed him to leave the Hall in safety. I might have taken his heart’s-blood. I might have handed him over to the law. I did not.”

“No,” said Beatrice, in icy tones, “you did not; you sought a deeper vengeance. You cared not to take his life. It was sweeter to you to take his son’s life and give him agony. Death would have been insufficient—anguish was what you wished.”

“It is not for me to blame you,” she continued, while Brandon looked at her without a word. “Who am I—a polluted one, of the accursed brood—who am I, to stand between you and him, or to blame you if you seek for vengeance? I am nothing. You have done kindnesses to me which I now wish were undone. Oh that I had died under the hand of the pirates! Oh that the ocean had swept me down to death with all its waves! Then I should not have lived to see this day!”

Roused by her vehemence Despard started from his abstraction and looked around.

“It seems to me,” said he, “as if you were blaming some one for inflicting suffering on a man for whom no suffering can be too great. What! can you think of your friend as he lies there in the next room in his agony, dying, torn to pieces by this man’s agency, and have pity for him?”

“Oh!” cried Beatrice, “is he not my father?”

Mrs. Compton looked around with staring eyes, and trembled from head to foot. Her lips moved—she began to speak, but the words died away on her lips.

“Your father!” said Despard; “his acts have cut him off from a daughter’s sympathy.”

“Yet he has a father’s feelings, at least for his dead son. Never shall I forget his look of anguish as he stood on the balcony. His face was turned this way. He seemed to reproach me.”

“Let me tell you,” cried Despard, harshly. “He has not yet made atonement for his crimes. This is but the beginning. I have a debt of vengeance to extort from him. One scoundrel has been handed over to the law, another lies dead, another is in London in the hands of Langhetti’s friends, the Carbonari. The worst one yet remains, and my father’s voice cries to me day and night from that dreadful ship.”

“Your father’s voice!” cried Beatrice. She looked at Despard. Their eyes met. Something passed between them in that glance which brought back the old, mysterious feeling which she had known before. Despard rose hastily and left the room.

“In God’s name,” cried Brandon, “I say that this man’s life was not sought by me, nor the life of any of his. I will tell you all. When he compassed the death of Uracno, of whom you know, he obtained possession of his son, then a mere boy, and carried him away. He kept this lad with him and brought him up with the idea that he was his best friend, and that he would one day show him his father’s murderer. After I made myself known to him, he told Vijal that I was this murderer. Vijal tried to assassinate me. I foiled him, and could have killed him. But I spared his life. I then told him the truth. That is all that I have done. Of course, I knew that Vijal would seek for vengeance. That was not my concern. Since Potts had sent him to seek my life under a lie, I sent him away with a knowledge of the truth. I do not repent that I told him; nor is there any guilt chargeable to me. The man that lies dead there is not my victim. Yet if he were—oh, Beatrice! if he were—what then? Could that atone for what I have suffered? My father ruined and broken-hearted and dying in a poor-house calls to me always for vengeance. My mother suffering in the emigrant ship, and dying of the plague amidst horrors without a name calls to me. Above all, my sweet sister, my pure Edith—”

“Edith!” interrupted Beatrice—“Edith!”

“Yes; do you not know that? She was buried alive.”

“What!” cried Beatrice; “is it possible that you do not know that she is alive?”

“Alive!”

“Yes, alive; for when I was at Holby I saw her.”

Brandon stood speechless with surprise.

“Langhetti saved her,” said Beatrice. “His sister has charge of her now.”

“Where, where is she?” asked Brandon, wildly.

“In a convent at London.”

At this moment Despard entered.

“Is this true?” asked Brandon, with a deeper agitation than had ever yet been seen in him—“my sister, is it true that she is not dead?”

“It is true. I should have told you,” said Despard, “but other thoughts drove it from my mind, and I forgot that you might be ignorant.”

“How is it possible? I was at Quebec myself. I have sought over the world after my relatives—”

“I will tell you,” said Despard.

He sat down and began to tell the story of Edith’s voyage and all that Langhetti had done, down to the time of his rescue of her from death. The recital filled Brandon with such deep amazement that he had not a word to say. He listened like one stupefied.

“Thank God!” he cried at last when it was ended; “thank God, I am spared this last anguish; I am freed from the thought which for years has been most intolerable. The memories that remain are bitter enough, but they are not so terrible as this. But I must see her. I must find her. Where is she?”

“Make yourself easy on that score,” said Despard, calmly. “She will be here to-morrow or the day after. I have written to Langhetti’s sister; she will come, and will bring your sister with her.”

“I should have told you so before,” said Beatrice, “but my own troubles drove every thing else from my mind.”

“Forgive me,” said Brandon, “for intruding

HE TORE DOWN THE COVERLET, WHICH CONCEALED THE GREATER PART OF HIS FACE."

now. I came in to learn about Langhetti. You look upon me with horror. I will withdraw."

Beatrice bowed her head, and tears streamed from her eyes. Brandon took her hand.

"Farewell," he murmured; "farewell, Beatrice. You will not condemn me when I say that I am innocent?"

"I am accused," she murmured.

Despard looked at these two with deep anxiety.

"Stay," said he to Brandon. "There is something which must be explained. There is a secret which Langhetti has had for years, and which he has several times been on the point of telling. I have just spoken to him and told him that you are here. He says he will tell his secret now, whatever it is. He wishes us all to come in—and you too, especially," said Despard, looking at Mrs. Compton.

The poor old creature began to tremble. "Don't be afraid, old woman," said Philips. "Take my arm and I'll protect you."

She rose, and, leaning on his arm, followed the others into Langhetti's room. He was fearfully emaciated. His material frame, worn down by pain and confinement, seemed about to dissolve and let free that soaring soul of his, whose fiery impulses had for years chafed against the prison bars of its mortal inclosure. His eyes shone darkly and luminously from their deep, hollow sockets, and upon his thin, wan, white lips there was a faint smile of welcome—faint like the smile of the sick, yet sweet as the smile of an angel.

It was with such a smile that he greeted Brandon, and with both of his thin white hands pressed the strong and muscular hand of the other.

"And you are Edith's brother," he said. "Edith's brother," he repeated, resting lovingly upon that name, Edith. "She always said you were alive, and once she told me she should live to see you. Welcome, brother of my Edith! I am a dying man. Edith said her other brother was alive—Frank. Where is Frank? Will he not come to stand by the bedside of his dying friend? He did so once."

"He will come," said Brandon, in a voice choked with emotion, as he pressed the hand of the dying man. "He will come, and at once."

"And you will be all here, then—sweet friends! It is well."

He paused.

"Bice!" said he at last.

Beatrice, who was sitting by his head, bent down toward him.

"Bice," said Langhetti. "My pocket-book is in my coat, and if you open the inside pocket you will find something wrapped in paper. Bring it to me."

Beatrice found the pocket-book and opened it as directed. In the inside pocket there was a thin, small parcel. She opened it and drew forth a very small baby's stocking.

"Look at the mark," said Langhetti.

Beatrice did so, and saw two letters marked on it—B. D.

"This was given me by your nurse at Hong Kong. She said your things were all marked with those letters when you were first brought to her. She did not know what it meant. 'B' meant Beatrice; but what did 'D' mean?"

All around that bedside exchanged glances of wonder. Mrs. Compton was most agitated.

"Take me away," she murmured to Philips.

But Philips would not.

"Cheer up, old woman!" said he. "There's nothing to fear now. That devil won't hurt you."

"Now, in my deep interest in you, and in my affection, I tried to find out what this meant. The nurse and I often talked about it. She told me that your father never cared particularly about you, and that it was strange for your clothing to be marked 'D' if your name was Potts.

It was a thing which greatly troubled her. I made many inquiries. I found out about the Manilla murder case. From that moment I suspected that 'D' meant Despard.

"Oh, Heavens!" sighed Beatrice, in an agony of suspense. Brandon and Despard stood motionless, waiting for something further.

"This is what I tried to solve. I made inquiries every where. At last I gave it up. But when circumstances threw Beatrice again in my way I tried again. I have always been baffled. There is only one who can tell—only one. She is here, in this room; and, in the name of God, I call upon her to speak out and tell the truth."

"Who?" cried Despard, while he and Brandon both looked earnestly at Mrs. Compton.

"Mrs. Compton!" said Langhetti; and his voice seemed to die away from exhaustion.

Mrs. Compton was seized with a panic more overpowering than usual. She gasped for breath. "Oh, Lord!" she cried. "Oh, Lord! Spare me! spare me! He'll kill me!"

Brandon walked up to her and took her hand.

"Mrs. Compton," said he, in a calm, resolute voice, "your timidity has been your curse. There is no need for fear now. I will protect you. The man whom you have feared so many years is now ruined, helpless, and miserable. I could destroy him at this moment if I chose. You are foolish if you fear him. Your son is with you. His arm supports you, and I stand here ready to protect both you and your son. Speak out, and tell what you know. Your husband is still living. He longs for your return. You and your son are free from your enemies. Trust in me, and you shall both go back to him and live in peace."

Tears fell from Mrs. Compton's eyes. She seized Brandon's hand and pressed it to her thin lips.

"You will protect me?" said she.

"Yes."

"You will save me from him?" she persisted, in a voice of agony.

"Yes, and from all others like him. Do not fear. Speak out."

Mrs. Compton clung to the arm of her son. She drew a long breath. She looked up into his face as though to gain courage, and then began.

It was a long story. She had been attendant and nurse to the wife of Colonel Despard, who had died in giving birth to a child. Potts had brought news of her death, but had said nothing whatever about the child. Colonel Despard knew nothing of it. Being at a distance at the time, on duty, he had heard but the one fact of his wife's death, and all other things were forgotten. He had not even made inquiries as to whether the child which he had expected was alive or dead, but had at once given way to the grief of the bereavement, and had hurried off.

In his designs on Colonel Despard, Potts feared that the knowledge of the existence of a child might keep him in India, and distract his mind from its sorrow. Therefore he was the more anxious not only to keep this secret, but also to prevent it from ever being known to Colonel Despard. With this idea he hurried the preparation of the Vishnu to such an extent that it was ready for sea almost immediately, and left with Colonel Despard on that ill-fated voyage.

Mrs. Compton had been left in India with the child. Her son joined her, in company with John, who, though only a boy, had the vices of a grown man. Months passed before Potts came back. He then took her along with the child to China, and left the latter with a respectable woman at Hong Kong, who was the widow of a British naval officer. The child was Beatrice Despard.

Potts always feared that Mrs. Compton might divulge his secret, and therefore always kept her with him. Timid by nature to an unusual degree, the wretched woman was in constant fear for her life, and as years passed on this fear was not lessened. The sufferings which she felt from this terror were atoned for, however, by the constant presence of her son, who remained in connection with Potts, influenced chiefly by the ascendancy which this villain had over a man of his weak and timid nature. Potts had brought them to England, and they had lived in different places, until at last Brandon Hall had fallen into his hands. Of the former occupants of Brandon Hall, Mrs. Compton knew almost nothing. Very little had ever been said about them to her. She knew scarcely any thing about them, except that their names were Brandon, and that they had suffered misfortunes.

Finally, this Beatrice was Beatrice Despard, the daughter of Colonel Despard and the sister of the clergyman then present. She herself, instead of being the daughter of Potts, had been one of his victims, and had suffered not the least at his hands.

This astounding revelation was checked by frequent interruptions. The actual story of her true parentage overwhelmed Beatrice. This was the awful thought which had occurred to herself frequently before. This was what had moved her so deeply in reading the manuscript of her father on that African Isle. This also was the thing which had always made her hate with such intensity the miscreant who pretended to be her father.

Now she was overwhelmed. She threw herself into the arms of her brother and wept upon his breast. Courtenay Despard for a moment rose above the gloom that oppressed him, and pressed to his heart this sister so strangely discovered. Brandon stood apart, looking on, shaken to the soul and unnerved by the deep joy of that unparalleled discovery. Amidst all the speculations in which he had indulged the very possibility of this had never suggested itself. He had believed most implicitly all along that Beatrice was in reality the daughter of his mortal enemy. Now the discovery of the truth came upon him with overwhelming force.

She raised herself from her brother's embrace, and turned and looked upon the man whom she adored—the one who, as she said, had over and over again saved her life; the one whose life she, too, in her turn had saved, with whom she had passed so many adventurous and momentous days—days of alternating peace and storm, of varying hope and despair. To him she owed every thing; to him she owed even the rapture of this moment.

As their eyes met they revealed all their inmost thoughts. There was now no barrier between them. Vanished was the insuperable obstacle, vanished the impassable gulf. They stood side by side. The enemy of this man—his foe, his victim—was also hers. Whatever he might suffer, whatever anguish might have been on the face of that old man who had looked at her from the balcony, she had clearly no part nor lot now in that suffering or that anguish. He was the murderer of her father. She was not the daughter of this man. She was of no vulgar or sordid race. Her blood was no longer polluted or accursed. She was of pure and noble lineage. She was a Despard.

"Beatrice," said Brandon, with a deep, fervid emotion in his voice; "Beatrice, I am yours, and you are mine. Beatrice, it was a lie that kept us apart. My life is yours, and yours is mine."

He thought of nothing but her. He spoke with burning impetuosity. His words sank into her soul. His eyes devoured hers in the passion of their glance.

"Beatrice—my Beatrice!" he said, "Beatrice Despard—"

He spoke low, bending his head to hers. Her head sank toward his breast.

"Beatrice, do you now reproach me?" he murmured.

She held out her hand, while tears stood in her eyes. Brandon seized it and covered it with kisses. Despard saw this. In the midst of the anguish of his face a smile shone forth, like sunshine out of a clouded sky. He looked at these two for a moment.

Langhetti's eyes were closed. Mrs. Compton and her son were talking apart. Despard looked upon the lovers.

"Let them love," he murmured to himself; "let them love and be happy. Heaven has its favorites. I do not envy them; I bless them, though I love without hope. Heaven has its favorites, but I am an outcast from that favor."

A shudder passed through him. He drew himself up.

"Since love is denied me," he thought, "I can at least have vengeance."

"THE ACTUAL STORY OF HER TRUE PARENTAGE OVERWHELMED BEATRICE."

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE IN ENGLAND.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE.

WHEN the Japanese ambassadors returned to their own country after their visit to England some years ago, and endeavored to convey to their friends some slight impressions of what they had seen, and our manners and customs, they described our great Derby day as a religious festival in which the whole nation took part, even the great Lord Palmerston himself. Had they happened to have been with us in the early spring, and so seen the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race, I wonder what ideas they would have formed of it; for this boat-race is now quite as much of a general holiday, quite as much a national event as the races on the Epsom Downs, and, indeed, collects together a far greater concourse of people. It is so near London that it is within a walk for many of the male part of the community, and the metropolitan trains carry thousands of passengers to the various points on the line of route.

And yet it is only within the last twelve years that it has become an annual event. The first boat-race between the two great Universities took place at Henley in 1829. Then, in 1830, there was another from Westminster to Putney, and from that time until 1859 one took place either from Westminster to Putney, or Putney to Mortlake, about once in every two years; but they attracted very little public attention until 1859, from which date they have become by degrees one of the most popular of the cockney holidays.

There is not the smallest doubt that without the Thames London could never have been what it is now. Throughout its varied course this great river of ours, the source of so much wealth, but as compared with your great ocean rivers a mere thread, presents a variety of aspects. In the heart of London, although the Houses of Parliament and other fine buildings line its shores, it is muddy, dark, and most dreary and unsightly; yet, by-and-by, in Middlesex, Surrey, and Oxford, some of the prettiest peeps of our island scenery are to be found on its banks.

The course down which the Oxford and Cambridge race is rowed is by no means its fairest portion. The starting-point is at Putney, a suburb of London, much frequented by the young men of the day who patronize aquatic sports; then on beneath the fine suspension bridge at Hammersmith to Barnes, Chiswick, Kew, and the winning-post at Mortlake, where the river takes a broader sweep and prepares the mind a little for its beauties at Richmond. There views of Kew Palace, Sim House, the pretty homes of the French ex-royal families, together with lovely peeps of pastoral scenery, hill and dale richly wooded, combine to produce as pretty a landscape as the eye would wish to see, duly appreciated by Londoners of all grades, who love to escape from the business and turmoil of town to enjoy here the delights of country.

This university boat-race, on account of the tide—for it must be rowed at the turn of the tide—usually takes place as early as half past eight or nine in the morning, and the gay world, usually no friends to early rising, are astir by five or six to get good places. Ere the sun has well had time to warm the earth, the block of carriages is complete along the best part of the route. You could scarcely see our English life under a prettier aspect. We are celebrated all the world over for our equipages and horses, and here they are to perfection, and in every variety, from lordly four-in-hands, barouches, chariots, dog-carts, mail-phactons, and the like, to broughams, pony-carriages, and gigs; all mixed in one incongruous jumble with omnibuses, cabs, hucksters' carts, covered vans, and Heaven knows what besides.

Dark blue is Oxford's color, light blue that of Cambridge, and the partisans on both sides don their favorite's distinguishing color. The number of blue belts is altogether astonishing; blue bonnets, blue dresses, blue boots, and even blue stockings, they tell me, are the order of the day. Every horse is bedecked with a rosette of one shade or other, and Young England appears in dark blue or light blue neck-ties, and together with conjurers, Ethiopian serenaders, costermongers, and roughs sport dark or light blue streamers, according to their fancy.

The race always comes off on a Saturday, which is now beginning to be a pretty general half holiday here, for most of the shops close at two o'clock; but on this particular day in the year little business is done, though when the event comes off at a very early hour in the morning clerks and the like have time to see it, and be back at their daily duties by the usual hour, which many of them do. This year, however, the tide favored the more lazy part of the community, and the race did not take place until twelve in the day, and the numbers were greater and the crush greater than ever. People come from every part of London and the environs; and the entire course, nearly five miles in length, is one dense mass of carriages and people.

On Saturday, the 4th of April, a thick fog enveloped London, one of those pea-soup compositions which we consider a kind of natural institution. Happily, on the river it was a mere haze, which cleared off entirely later in the day. Last year it was rowed in a deluge of rain, and I shall never forget as you looked down the long towing-path, running along the water's edge, the strange appearance that the dense mass presented, a perfect wall of umbrellas in fact, and nothing else to be seen, save at the moment the boats passed, when they were all put down, and the crowd preferred a wetting to losing the sight. But fog or rain, Londoners on pleasure bent are not to be daunted. The Derby last year was run in snow, and we learn to accustom ourselves to the inclemency of our very variable climate.

Every house along the route is crowded with spectators, and most display banners of one of the rival colors. All the fun and chaff peculiar to such occasions abound, and a deal of patience and good-humor is necessary, for one often has to remain stationary in a block of carriages when one knows that every moment is an object. Half the people never see the boats at all.

Of course the best points of view are Putney, Hammersmith Bridge, and Mortlake; but these can only be attained by a chosen few. The greater part content themselves with a peep of the river of barely a few yards, and think themselves lucky to get that; so that it amounts to this, that after undergoing unheard-of difficulties, and getting up a full three hours earlier than usual, there are ten chances to one that you arrive at the river-side at all, and maybe will have to content yourself with seeing the crowd only; and, after all, that is the most amusing part. It really is a wonderful thing, when you come to consider it, that as many as five hundred and fifty thousand people struggle and fight as if their very life depended on it, to see—what? Not a fine fleet, not a regatta; only two little boats, eight men in each, struggling for the kudos and the honor of the thing alone. This trial of skill of the two universities is supported entirely by their own boat-clubs. No handsome cups or silver centre-pieces reward them for their exertions; a gold medal is presented to each of the victorious crew, and that is all.

Up to 1860 Cambridge had been ten times victorious, Oxford seven; but for the last eight years Oxford has had one continued run of luck. Rowing men, of course, have all kinds of theories to account for this, and some are inclined to think that it is owing to some radical fault in the style of Cambridge; but however this may be, there was a feeling of general disappointment when this year Oxford added another to its many victories, as this state of things spoils a good deal of the interest of the race, for Cambridge loses heart year by year, and it is more than half feared, at each failure, that the contest will be given up. This year, as soon as the training commenced, one of the crew—the Hon. Mr. Gordon—died, and for a week or two the idea of the race was abandoned altogether; but in time they returned to their work with renewed vigor, and the vacant place was refilled.

I give the list of the crew:

No doubt it will be as interesting to my readers on the other side of the Atlantic as to us here. The preliminary toss for station was won by Cambridge for the first time for some few years—an auspicious omen which was not followed up by eventual success. Cambridge took the lead, but scarcely kept it for five minutes. Oxford soon shot ahead, and kept there—three boats' length the best part of the time, and four boats' length at the conclusion.

The rowing was by no means up to the mark in either crew. It was altogether a hollow race, but the quickest on record. It did not occupy quite twenty-one minutes.

We only saw them for a moment. Two tiny specks upon the water, gone before we quite realized they were there, leaving us only the dark mass of water, the distant view of fields, and the crowds on either side of the river, the bright masses of color in the ladies' dresses here and there, looking all the prettier by contrast with the bright early green of spring in the scarcely opening foliage which bent downward toward the water's edge.

There is plenty to amuse one, however, in the hour or more that passes in expectation. Gipsies, conjurers, and all the miscellaneous throng of a race-course drive their trade, and try to wheedle the coin from your pockets. Locomotion of any kind, even for them, is difficult; and, often unable to move, they have to repeat their performances to a somewhat weary audience over and over again. Horsemen and horsewomen (for a good many ladies ride) contrive to make their way somehow, and bring you tidings every now and then of what is going on elsewhere on the river side.

As the race is won the scene at Mortlake is a grand one; every nook and corner is full; and as the victorious boat passes the winning post the volleys of cheers are deafening, and nearly drown the sound of the band on the umpire's boat, which strikes up "See the Conquering Hero Comes" on the instant.

At Hammersmith every chain and pier of the Suspension Bridge is covered with human beings, and the only wonder is that there are so few accidents. The sweep of the river this bridge commands is a grand one; but to see the race to perfection you should be on one of the steamers which follow in the wake of the boats. By this means you are able to see all the race; and so, and only so, can you form any adequate idea of the vast mass of people—a dense living wall which lines both banks of the river.

In old days these steamers came too near to the boats, thereby endangering the lives of the crews, but now the course is under the surveillance of the police, and the arrangements are a great deal better.

The Pride of London—a private steamer belonging to Mr. Egan—bore, as the Times happily puts it, the Pride of England, our heir-apparent, together with Prince Christian, Prince Teck, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Sutherland, Lord Henry Lennox, and Lord Alfred Paget. This led the way, followed by a fleet of others, and the wash from them swept over the by-standers, who were fairly drenched.

After the race the crews are fêted to their hearts' content; lunches, dinners, and the like are provided for them on the day in the most sumptuous style, to which, after their hard training, they no doubt do full justice.

It is always the custom for them to row up the stream again leisurely—the victor leading—to their head-quarters at Putney; then the crowd disperse, some to hospitable mansions or pleasure-parties at Richmond or elsewhere, while the greater part make their way home as best they can, at a snail's pace, slowly though maybe surely.

The river—the scene of the late struggle—is left to the many crafts that cover it: rowing-boats, canoes, and the like, which have been dotted about it all day long. ARDEN HOLT.

GENTLEMEN'S SPRING FASHIONS.

See Illustration on page 490.

Fig. 1.—Coat of black cloth, tight fitting, with short skirts; collar rolling low, with silk facing two inches wide, and fastened at the waist with a single button; sleeves with cuffs, cut up and trimmed with buttons. Vest of pearl gray cloth, somewhat long, with seven buttons and a small rolling collar. Pantaloon of the same, tight fitting, with a stripe down the side.

Fig. 2.—Boy's suit of maroon. Algerine jacket, straight behind, without a collar, and fastened at the throat by a small band. Full trowsers.

Fig. 3.—Lady's dress. We wish only to describe the paletot, which, being of Melton, can be made best by a tailor, on account of the heavy pressing required for the seams. This paletot is almost tight fitting, and is much longer in front than behind; it is confined by a belt at the waist, and is edged with black silk galloon; the sides are slashed.

Fig. 4.—Business suit of maroon and gray cloth, with fine diagonal stripes. Suits of the same material are again coming in favor, not for promenade, or, still less, for visiting costumes, but for business, morning, traveling, and country dress. Coat short waisted, with short skirts, and closing in front, if desired, with a single button. Single-breasted vest, with standing collar, buttoning to the chin. Tight-fitting pantaloon, without straps.

Fig. 5.—Promenade dress, with spring overcoat. This overcoat differs little from those worn last season; the principal modification consists in having but one row of buttons. The coat buttons with an under strip, and can be closed to the chin if desired, a thing very desirable for cool spring mornings and evenings. Tight-fitting pantaloon, in narrow blue and white stripes.

Fig. 6.—Double-breasted coat, of dark blue cassimere, with small collar and roll, closing at the fourth button; short skirts, and flaps on the hips. Double-breasted vest of the same material as the coat. Mixed pantaloon, with a stripe down the side.

Fig. 7.—Riding suit. Velvet jacket, trimmed round the edge with silk galloon laid on flat. Vest of the same material, trimmed in like manner. Gray pantaloon, tight fitting, especially at the knee.

THE QUEEN'S NAME.

THE baptismal names of the present Queen of England are Alexandrina Victoria. Alexandrina was meant by George IV. to be the future title of our English Queen—the future fashionable name in noble and gentle houses. The Hon. Miss Murray says: "It was believed that the Duke of Kent wished to name his child Elizabeth, that being a popular name with the English people; but the prince regent, who was not kind to his brothers, gave notice that he should stand in person as one godfather, and that the Emperor of Russia was to be another. At the ceremony of baptism, when asked by the Archbishop of Canterbury to name the infant, the prince regent gave only the name of Alexandrina; the duke requested that one other name might be added. 'Give her the mother's also then; but,' he added, 'it can not precede that of the emperor.' The Queen, on her accession, commanded that she should be proclaimed as Victoria only."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A RECENT cynical writer complains that men are obliged to take the characters of women at second-hand; that they are unable, until they have led the object of their affections to the altar, to tell whether she has a tender heart or even a decent temper. He pathetically inquires how he can know that his adored, who meets him in the parlor with pretty smiles and blushes, was not scolding the servants, or possibly her mamma, when he pulled the door-bell? how can he tell, when she begs him not to throw his cigar away because she is walking with him on a summer evening, that she is not really half sick, and meditating how she shall put a stop to that favorite habit when they are married? how can he be sure that she is not in reality bored with his quotations from the poets, even though she responds, "how lovely" and "beautiful?" And then he is quite certain that there are more falsities than those of hair included in a young lady's toilette, and does not dare place much dependence on the testimony of his eyes, lest uncomfortable discoveries be made when too late. Very true. Granted that all these matters are uncertain. But pray, how is the young woman to learn the true character and real habits and disposition of the young man who comes dressed in his Sunday best to pay her an evening visit? who with apparent delight drives her about the Park? who takes her a few times to an Opera or a concert, flatters demurely home from church with her, flatters and amuses her for a little while, and then asks her to marry him? Can she penetrate his father's house, to see if mother and sisters are treated with kindly respect, or learn whether, in his private room, any of his belongings are ever put in place by his own hand? Can she follow him to the office or the store, to find out how he treats those dependent upon him? How is she to know of his Club-house life? whether he drinks, or gambles, or is habitually profane? How many young men would be willing that the woman whose hand they are hoping to win should listen, unbeknown, to a lazy hour's chat with a boon companion? Doubtless, matrimony is often a lottery, but the blanks—yes, the worse than blanks—drawn are sometimes men as well as women. Happy they, whether men or women, whose hearts and lives are such that they need no screen of lies, and through life disdain to act "a double part."

A number of persons were recently poisoned in Missouri by eating canned blackberries. A party of twelve were dining, and all were poisoned, excepting two who did not partake of the fruit. Spasmodic retching and violent vomiting were the speedy results, but this was relieved by medical treatment. The fruit was canned in new tin cans last summer, and was the last of a lot canned at the same time, all of which had been eaten without causing any ill results. No difference was noticed in the fruit, except that in the last can it was paler than in the ones previously used. The doctor was of the opinion that the corroding of the can had poisoned the fruit.

A pithy writer on "Fashionable Weddings" gives in the New York Ledger the following advice to young ladies:

"If you love a man with heart and soul, marry him (provided, of course, that he loves you and asks you). If you don't love him, don't marry him, though you die an old maid at ninety in the Asylum for Indigent Old Maids, about to be established in Boston. But let your wedding be simple, and quiet, and beautiful with love, but not with money. If you are rich, do this in the name of grace, and for the sake of example. If you are poor, do it in the name of honesty, and for the sake of a pure conscience. And in either event, do it as an offering to delicacy, and the fitness of things.

"If you have wedding-presents, then most of them will come because the givers love you, and, loving, desire to give the gifts of love. Treasure them sacredly, but on the wedding-day send them to the bank, or hide them in the back-attic, or push them under the bed, or put them in the refrigerator, or do any thing but shake them in the face of the public, and say, 'Behold how pleased I am with my rattle, how tickled with my straw.'"

An amusing story is told of a certain Eastern gentleman, who offered one morning—there being guests in the house to occupy his wife's attention—to do the marketing on his way down town.

"If you will make out a memorandum of what you want, I will get it," he said.

"No, you will not," was the reply; "you will forget it. You'll go down town, get busy talking with somebody, and never once think of my wants. I must get things myself."

The husband asked pardon, and promised that if she would commit the business to him he would get every thing she wanted if the articles were to be found in the city. So the wife wrote a memorandum, and tucked it into his pocket, with a "don't forget now." Arriving at market the gentleman unfolded the paper his wife had given him and read the following list of articles "wanted to-day."

"That house and lot in — Street.

"New velvet cloak.

"Set of furs.

"Diamond ring.

"A well-stocked conservatory.

"This is all that is absolutely needed to-day; would add other articles, but fear your stamps will not hold out."

The gentleman, after pulling his mustache violently for some time, concluded to "dine out." He says he shall never, no, never, insist on doing his wife's marketing.

It is no more expensive, and in general very little additional trouble for a lady to select a bonnet or dress of becoming colors, than it is to choose thoughtlessly shades which only chance to please her fancy, or which are especially fashionable. Because Metternich green or Sultan red happens to be a stylish shade in any season, it is no reason why every lady, fair or dark, pale or rosy, should adopt it. By exercising good taste in the selection of colors, one will appear better dressed, even in the most simple and inexpensive material, than in the richest garments which have been purchased without regard to harmonizing effect. A few suggestions may be useful. With a clear, light, rosy complexion a silver or pearly gray harmonizes admirably. But the gray tints will be found to suit most complexions, partly because they form so good a ground for any strong color that may be required by the character of the complexion or the color of the hair, but also because from their variety it is comparatively easy to find a suitable tone. For instance, while a silver or pearly gray harmonizes with a clear, light, rosy complexion, such a gray would inevitably reveal any lurking orange, and deepen a slightly dusky hue.

Where the face is decidedly dark, strong dark colors will have the effect of rendering it lighter by contrast. A deep purple may be found of much value—dependent, of course, on the special half-tones of the face. But it will require to have light and bright subsidiary colors as trimming or ornaments. If the face be dark but pallid, dark and strong colors must be used cautiously. A florid complexion is rendered more florid by green. On the other hand, an excess of red may be counterbalanced by a crimson dress, or crimson and red near the face; but this last, though it is a common injunction, must not be accepted without caution. Red will not always cure, and sometimes seems to deepen, excess of red in the face—a result, however, it will be seen, if the case be analyzed, of the presence of other elements besides the red in the skin. There are complexions that require rich deep tones and colors, with points of decided contrast. Maroon is apt to bring out any latent green in the skin, and therefore can rarely be placed in contact with it. The interposition of white is sometimes sufficient to counteract the tendency. Black is seldom out of place with any complexion; especially if some bright color is worn as trimming or ornament.

The Metropolitan Police are never wanting in polite attention to ladies who need to be escorted over the crowded crossings. But sometimes those who are not familiar with this New York custom do not avail themselves so heartily of the aid thus offered as they might. Not long ago a young lady from the country, whose ideas of the police were gathered from newspapers, found herself at one of the crossings in Broadway. Frightened by the noise and confusion, she stood hesitating, when one of the gallant policemen politely stepped forward to escort her across. But no sooner had he touched her elbow than with a piercing shriek she shrank from under his hand, cleared the crossing almost at a bound, and exclaimed in terrified accents, "Oh, Sir! it wasn't me! Indeed, indeed, I have been doing nothing!"

Speaking of the police, reminds us of the Broadway Bridge, which, however various the opinions about its usefulness, is certainly an excellent point of sight, from which may be viewed a grand and curious panoramic scene, in which the busy policemen play an active part. It is comic, too, as you pause on the bridge some bright morning, to see a man issue from a second-story window of a building on the left hand of Broadway, upon a little balcony, where stands his camera. He blows a blast upon a horn, and every body looks up; the operator arranges his photographic plate, waves his hand this way and that, politely indicating that those who must go over the bridge are at liberty to do so before he commences operations; he peers through his instrument, claps an old cloth hat over the opening, moves his hand rapidly to and fro, as much as to say, "Go now, or stop;" he raises his finger high in mid-air—the crisis has arrived, off goes the old hat, the long finger slowly descends for a moment, then the hat is put over the instrument again; the operator bows his thanks, and you and Broadway Bridge are "taken!" The whole is an amusing little pantomime.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

CURES

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diptheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promiscuous of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

GUNPOWDER, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

Coffees roasted and ground daily.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY, Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Haul and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. I.—No. 31.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1868.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

MISS CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG.

THE excellent portrait which we give of Miss KELLOGG, the great American prima donna, who is now winning such laurels in England, will doubtless prove acceptable to many of her admirers in this country, where her genius was first recognized. It is pleasant to be able to record, in behalf of our countrywomen, such brilliant triumphs as are achieved by them abroad. It is scarce to be expected that America, which only three centuries ago was a primitive wilderness, in this short space of time should have cleared up its forests, developed its material resources, and attained the highest place in art; but we have justly a right to be proud of our approximation to this result. To say nothing of the renown attained in literature and art by men, we can point out a whole galaxy of female names that have won distinction therein in Europe. Mrs. Stowe and a host of other talented women have represented letters; Harriet Hosmer, Margaret Foley, Emma Stebbins, and Miss Lander, are queening it over sculpture at Rome, and Charlotte Cushman and many others have triumphed in the drama; but music has hitherto remained rather in the back-ground, and there has been great distrust in Europe of the vocal possibilities of the Yankees. Most of our best singers have been sent to us from Italy or Germany; and of those whom we have sent back in turn, Bosio, Malibran, and even Patti, whose merits were first recognized here, were regarded as native Europeans; the charming Adelaide Phillips was a contralto; and no native soprano appeared that could rival the great European prima donnas. At last we have Miss Kellogg, who seems to have carried the Old World by storm.

About Miss Kellogg's nativity there can be no cavil. She was born in Charleston, South Carolina, of Connecticut parentage, and is not yet twenty-four years old. She gave indications of musical genius at a very early age, and could read music with great ease when only seven. She began her musical education by studying the piano-forte; but her parents, finding that she gave promise of rare vocal powers, placed her under the instruction of Professor Milet, a graduate of the Conservatory of Paris. After remaining with him for a short time she was transferred to another Italian professor, who in turn gave place to M. Rizzire, who was also a graduate of the Conservatory of Paris, and with whom she studied industriously for three years. Much of Miss Kellogg's success, indeed, must be imputed to the fact that, instead of making genius an excuse for idleness, she has developed her powers to the fullest extent by that persevering and indefatigable study with which no talent can afford to dispense. Her final instructor was M. Muzio, under whose auspices she made her début in Opera at the New York Academy of Music in 1861 in the character of Gilda, in Verdi's opera of Rigoletto, and at once won the favor of the public. She appeared thenceforth every consecutive season, taking the principal rôles in most of the standard operas, and constantly increasing in popularity until she became universally acknowledged as the leading prima donna in America.

In 1867 Miss Kellogg made her first appearance in London as Margaret, in Gounod's opera of Faust. The impression which she produced then is best described by the following criticism from one of the best English musical judges, and which, moreover, sums up the characteristics of Miss Kellogg's style:

"Miss Kellogg's unqualified success was the more to boast of, inasmuch as it was obtained in a character which has tested the capabilities of many of the most renowned dramatic singers of the day—that of Margaret, in M. Gounod's Faust. She appears to possess every requisite, physical and mental, for the full and satisfactory delineation of the character, unquestionably one of the most engaging in the entire repertory of modern lyric drama. Her voice is a legitimate soprano, of extremely agreeable quality, flexible, as was shown by her facile delivery of the well-known apostrophe to the jewels in the garden scene, telling and resonant, rather than distinguished by any extraordinary degree of power, always at ready command, and—merit not to be over-estimated!—always in tune. Miss Kellogg has a voice, indeed, that leaves little to wish for, and proves by her use of it that her studies have been both assiduous and in the right path. She is, in fact, though so young, a thoroughly accomplished singer—in the school, at any rate, toward which the music of M. Gounod consistently leans, and which essentially differs from the florid school of Rossini and the Italians before Verdi. One of the great charms of her singing is her perfect enunciation of the words she has to utter. She never sacrifices sense to sound; but fits the verbal text to the music, as if she attached equal importance to each. Then her phrasing is highly finished, her cadences being so well rounded off as to satisfy the most tutored and exacting ear, and this notwithstanding an occasional tendency to drag the time and over-elaborate expression. Of the Italian language she seems to be a thorough mistress, and we may well believe that she speaks it both fluently and correctly. These manifest advantages, added to a graceful figure, a countenance full of intelligence, and undoubted dramatic capacity, make up a sum of attractions to be envied, and easily explain the interest excited by Miss Kellogg at the outset, and maintained by her to the end."

Miss Kellogg's first appearance this season at Her Majesty's Opera, in London, as Violetta, in La Traviata, was a perfect ovation. The Prince and Princess of Wales were present and led the applause; and at the close of the effective second act, which all familiar with the opera will remember, the Prince went behind the scenes (for the first time, it is averred), to shake hands with the young cantatrice and congratulate her in the name of the Princess—an honor never before paid by him to any singer. She was encircled, called before the curtain four times, and showered with bouquets; and this success of the moment was followed up by the warmest encomiums from the English journals. The Court Journal was loud in her praise. The Standard said:

"Miss Kellogg at once ingratiated herself into the favor of English audiences. There were no two opinions about her as singer or actress. Her voice was acknowledged to be of beautiful and sympathetic quality, clear as a bell, and invariably in tune—a soprano, indeed, of the highest order; her acting was full of impulse and feeling, extremely graceful and natural, and regulated by the finest taste and judgment. With such qualities it may be readily supposed that the effect she produced was something out of the common, and that a 'new sensation' was created in musical circles."

The Telegraph added:

"The favorable impression is deepened by an expressive face and graceful demeanor. There is also the cachet given by innate refinement on every thing she does, and the Americans may well be proud of a lady whose many accomplishments have been acquired entirely in the new country."

Of Miss Kellogg's subsequent personation of Gilda, at Her Majesty's Opera, on the 18th of April, the Standard says:

"All we can say is, that it was one of the most remarkable first performances ever witnessed. Either there must have been something in the part, both as to the singing and acting, wonderfully congenial to the powers and instincts of the fair artiste, or she must have bestowed an amount of care and pains upon its study that brought her to a perfect knowledge of its every phase and requirement. Had Miss Kellogg played Gilda one hundred nights in succession she could not have trod the boards with greater freedom or with a more thorough reliance on her own resources. Not a note was slurred, not a point was missed; whatever was attempted was achieved in the most artistic manner. Miss Kellogg's Gilda was not perfect merely; it was a new revelation. Miss Kellogg's beautiful and sympathetic voice was never heard to greater advantage than in the music entrusted to Gilda; and every scene in which the fair American prima donna took part had its enthusiastic admirers. After the great Vendetta duet, with which the second act closes, the audience broke forth into a perfect furor of applause, and Miss Kellogg and Mr. Santley (the new Jester) were summoned before the curtain and received with vehement acclamations. The general impression at the end of the performance was that Miss Clara Kellogg had made a profounder impression in Gilda than in any character she had yet attempted in England. The house was crowded in every part."

Miss Kellogg possesses rare versatility of talent. She seems to be equally successful in all kinds of opera, whether tragic or comic; and her acting is worthy of her singing. Her greatest personations, perhaps, are Violetta, in La Traviata; Caterina in L'Etoile du Nord; Annetta in Crispino e la Comare; and Margaret in Faust. The latter, indeed, is a creation of her own; and those who have once seen her in it will be difficult to satisfy with any other Margaret. It is well to say, moreover, that her social position is excellent and her conduct irreproachable; she goes every where under the escort of her mother, who always accompanies her to the opera where she sings, and surrounds herself with barriers of the strictest decorum. So fearful is she of any possible misconception, that, it is said, she persistently refuses to receive any other testimonials from her friends than flowers; which accounts for the innumerable exquisite floral offerings which all will remember who have seen our prima donna. We hope that, instead of lingering in Europe, she will return ere long to the scene of her first triumphs and aid in reviving the fortunes of the Italian Opera, with whose success she seems identified.

It would be ungracious to close this sketch without making mention of Mrs. Vanzandt, another American singer, though we believe of European parentage, who is at this moment creating a sensation in Paris under the Italianized name of Vanzini. By-the-way, the ladies have a right now to challenge the gentlemen. Having produced a soprano, when are we to have a tenor at whose feet the Old World will bow?

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1868.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, SON, AND MARSTON, 188 Fleet Street, London, are Agents for the sale of HARPER'S BAZAR in England.

OUR SUNDAY BEST.

WE Americans are famous for putting our best foot foremost. This practice, however commendable on the whole, may be carried too far in particular instances. In our eagerness to make a good appearance we are apt to become too demonstrative. This shows itself in our talk, which is remarkable for its bold self-assertion; in our houses and furniture, which are made more to attract the eye of the stranger than to suit the taste of the possessor; and above all, in our dress.

There is no such universally well-dressed people in the world as the Americans. It is not only that more of them than of any other nation have good clothes to their backs, but their garments are better made and adjusted to their persons, and worn with an easier grace. While this much may be allowed, it can not be denied that offense against taste and convenience of dress, particularly as to time and occasion, is frequent with us.

We are generally too finely got up for the occasion. We are apt to be, as the French say, endimanchés, which we may translate by the coined word Sundayfied. We often choose the wrong time for the display of our personal finery. For example, while the people of the most refined taste avoid all exhibition of rich dress and flaunting colors in church, we ordinarily turn the sanctuary into a show-room for the fashions. A well-bred French or English woman always chooses her most sober and unnoticeable dress to say her prayers in public, while an American puts on her newest robe and gayest bonnet, in which to perform her genuflections before an admiring congregation of fellow-worshippers. The holiest day of the sacred calendar, Easter Sunday, would lose all its significance in the mind of one of our dames if unassociated with the inauguration of the spring fashions. She would no more think of bowing her head in prayer on such an occasion unadorned with the latest bonnet of the season, than walking up the church-aisle on her knees.

The same want of adaptation of the dress to the occasion is shown by the habit prevalent among our dames of putting on their showiest garments whenever going out, even should it be for the performance only of the most ordinary duty connected with the household. Whether it is to the shop to buy a dozen kitchen towels, to the grocer's to dabble in butter, or to the butcher's to dabble in the blood of a sirloin, she is the same finely-dressed personage. She more frequently, however, avoids the inconsistency of performing humble duties in lofty attire by shifting them to the lowlier and more soberly-clad shoulders of her husband. This is one and not the least of the ill effects of this habit of female overdress. It unfits women for the simple and unostentatious duties of household life.

Our unmarried girls are entirely overdressed. They are allowed to wear such suits as are never worn by modest maidens in Europe, and are hardly seen in public upon the most matronly persons. The young miss, flauntingly costumed, is sure to attract a notice in the streets which should not be agreeable to, and is hardly safe for, virgin modesty.

Our countrywomen, as also our countrymen, are recognized immediately on the highways of travel by the finery of their dress. The glistening black coat and satin waistcoat, and the silk gown and flimsy bonnet of fashion, are discerned at once amidst the dust of the railway and the smoke of the steamer as American national peculiarities.

Apart from the obvious advantage on the score of economy of adapting the dress to the occasion, there are certain moral effects of higher importance which might be expected from a national reform in this particular. Overdress leads to false expectations, and confirms a deceitful vanity which prompts to a pretense of wealth, and all the iniquitous means by which it may be supported. It has more to do than any other single cause with the fall of woman, the bankruptcy of husbands, and the ruin of families. Its effect in destroying female reserve, especially that of the young, as it thus takes away one of the best safeguards of virtue, makes it very pernicious. The excess of dress is certainly the cause of much of the characteristic vice of the day; and with the general adoption of a more modest attire there would be less temptation to that part at least of the prevalent ill-doing for which women are responsible.

KEEP TOGETHER.

IT was once an essential part of the dinner-table etiquette in England, and in America by inheritance, for the ladies to retire after the dessert and a first round of the wine decanters. The confessed purpose of the practice was to allow the gentlemen to indulge freely in strong drink and loose talk, unchecked in their grossness by the restraining influence of refined women. Polished France has given us a lesson of better manners, and the social dinner is now less often marked by this coarse reminder of the divergence of the brutal instincts of one sex from the delicate sentiments of the other. The more refined people in England and the United States now generally adopt the French practice of all rising together from the dinner-table. The effect of this simple change in etiquette has been very great and most beneficial. Drunkenness, once a fashion and almost esteemed a social virtue, is no longer admitted in respectable company, but has been forced to slink away to the bar-room and other haunts of vice.

The good effect on morals of adopting the French practice at dinner-table of not separating the sexes might be extended, if the same chivalrous principle were more generally applied. We might learn a further lesson from the polite cavaliers of France, and adopt their habit of making their dames partners in most of their pleasures and occupations. The constant female presence has throughout the continent of Europe produced a refinement of manners, even among the most common people, of which our roughs and their brutal English relatives have not the remotest conception.

The Club is an institution which could only have originated in a country where men turn the women out of the dining-room, and shut themselves up to drink and talk grossly. The attempts to establish clubs in France and other parts of the continent of Europe have generally failed, or resulted in abortions feebly supported by English residents or the few who ape their manners. The French, Germans, and Italians prefer their coffee-houses and beer-gardens, where, in company with their wives and daughters, they may innocently refresh themselves. It is to be regretted that, with our traditional subjection to English social customs, we should have adopted the Club. Nothing, we believe, is more fatal to the purity of character of the male youth than the habit of seeking such diversions as he can not share with the opposite sex. No young man should habitually go to a club or other resort of pleasure where a mother or sister would be an unwelcome intruder.

A more intimate relation of the two sexes would produce a mutual benefit. The woman, sharing in the daily interests and thoughts of the more practical man, would become less frivolous; and the man, refined by constant contact with the more sentimental woman, would become less gross. This desirable result is already shown in France and Germany, where the women understand and conduct business, and the men are sober and courteous. We do not learn that the one has become less feminine or the other less manly in consequence.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Miss Susan Simple.

MY DEAR SUSAN,—When you ask an old bachelor, who has always been in the habit of going every where and seeing every thing, "without wife or child, good or bad, to provide for," as an older bachelor expressed it; who has followed the bent of his humor without very seriously moralizing, and who is conscious of no vicious inclination to misunderstand, but rather to find good in what may seem bad—when, I say, you ask such a character whether he thinks that you may innocently go to the ballet, why, my dear Susan, he knows hardly what to reply, because there are so many reservations and conditions to be mentioned. A traveler carries his enjoyment with him, you know. If he be ill, or morose, or sad, even Italy is not picturesque, and hardly is the Mediterranean romantic. If he be young and well and buoyant, Mount Desert is as fascinating as Capri, and the queer rock at Dighton is as attractive as the Parthenon. It is the same with amusements of all kinds. The spectator is very apt to take the pleasure or the harm with him.

Lately, we have all heard a great deal of a French comic operetta called La Grande Duchesse. Most of my friends have seen it. Mr. Peter Paul Pry, who is the most indefatigable inquisitor, who hunts through the newspapers for obscure advertisements of any new or strange sight and hurries off straightway to see it, entertains me very often with songs from this play. He taps on my door in the morning, and when I cry "hallo," Mr. Peter Paul Pry begins in the most vigorous manner to sing, "Piff, paff, pouff!" and winds up by two tremendous thumps to accompany the words "Je suis, moi, le Général Boum, Boum!" When he enters he seizes one of my slippers or my razor-strop and pathetically breaks into "le sabre de mon père!" Mr. Peter Paul Pry has so accustomed me to the melodies and the phrases of the play that I really am not quite sure whether I have heard La Grande Duchesse or not. But I will not wander from my point altogether, best of Susans, or you will think me older than I really am.

I was saying that we very often carry the harm of such things with us, and I wish to illustrate what I mean by the example of my sister, Mrs. Smith. She is, as I hope you know, one of the simplest and best of women, the mother of children, and truly a light in her household. She heard all the young people talking of the Grande Duchesse, and her young people begged to go and see it. My sister said that she would go first and see how dangerous it was, and whether it was proper that young people should go. So she went with my friend Pry, and listened and smiled and said to him: "Why, Mr. Pry, I don't see that this is very bad. Why do people call it immoral?" Now, my friend Pry said to me: "I don't know what the reason was; perhaps it was because I was with a woman whom I so much respect; but really I could hardly stand it. It seemed to me revoltingly coarse."

You see, dear Susan, they each carried the Grande Duchesse with them. My sister, who knows nothing of double-entendres and innuendoes and covert allusions, saw and heard only the smooth, pretty surface of the thing, and was not troubled, but enjoyed the burlesque and the music. But Pry, who does understand allusions and innuendoes of every kind, saw that the thing was rotten under the prettiness, and he felt that it was unclean. Indeed, I have never known a more striking illustration than my sister Smith afforded of the truth, that to the pure all things are pure.

The impropriety, or to speak plainly, the indecency of these things is not always in the story, but in the manner of telling it. A coarse actor will make almost any thing coarse. But where the story is bad also, the result is atrocious. In the proper ballet—I mean the ballet proper—the story is usually perfectly free from any thing which you would not read to a child. I remember very well when the famous dancers used to play the Sylphide, for instance, one of the loveliest little spectacles you ever saw. The chief dancer was the queen of the flower spirits. She poised herself beside the blossoms; she touched them gently, and out sprang the fays; and they danced in the soft moonlight as if they heard the music of Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream. The music went rippling through your memory for many a day after, and the dancers were merely visionary forms that were moved by the melody. I should certainly have invited you to go with me, dear Susan, and I am sure that my sister Smith would not have hesitated to take her youngest daughter, Lily.

Mr. Peter Paul Pry insists that taste has degenerated. He declares that a great many things are now tolerated that were intolerable to our fathers and mothers—yes, even to your father and mother. This is a favorite theory of many philosophic gentlemen about town, and is a common complaint in every age. I am not so sure of this degeneracy. Pry asserts that I am an optimist, and will always, make the best of every thing. Very well: better an optimist than a pessimist. Better to make the best than the worst. But see what books were tolerated even a century ago! I observe that the Easy Chair—a well-meaning old gossip in Harper's Monthly—in speaking of this subject, alludes to Cowper reading "Joseph Andrews" to Mrs. Unwin, and her circle of pious friends at Olney. Now, my dear Susan, Cowper was a good man—he was even a morbidly moral man—but I can not advise you to read "Joseph Andrews." When I was younger and living with my sister Smith, she came into my room one day—my room was walled with books of all kinds—and she asked me to lend her "Joseph Andrews." "I have heard so much of Fielding," she said, "that I feel as if I ought to know something about him, so please lend me 'Joseph Andrews.'" I said nothing, and took down the book and handed it to her. Just as she was going out, however, I said "Sister!"—and she turned to hear me. "Sister, you see that book belongs just up there upon the third shelf from the top at the corner." "Oh yes," she answered, "I see the place," and so went out. The next day as I was busy at my table I looked at the third shelf from the top at the corner, and there was "Joseph Andrews." It was as I expected. A very little had been enough, and my sister had stolen into my room, when she knew that I was out, and had replaced the book.

Or if we think there is so much degeneracy of morals, I beg Mr. Peter Paul Pry to look at Richardson, whom Fielding heartily disliked for a milksop, and whose works he parodied. Richardson was the idol of all virtuous young women. He was pre-eminently the moral novelist. My dear, have you read "Pamela?" What is its plot? Have you read "Clarissa Harlowe?" Why, Susan, when I was last in Paris, one of the most "highly-colored" plays, as they are called, that was acted—and it drew a crowd every night—was Clarissa Harlowe, in a sort of free and easy, but not inaccurate paraphrase of Richardson's story by Jules Janin. That was model moral novel-writing more than a hundred years ago; but it was quite piquant enough for the Parisian theatre of a degenerate age. Or step further back upon the English stage, Mr. Pry. Is there a very great fall from Wycherley's "Country Wife" to the Grande Duchesse, for instance? It seems to me—and I shall need something more forcible than Mr. Pry's argument to persuade me—that the very fact of our being obliged to smother the objectionability (I throw myself upon your mercy, dear Susan) under music and the unreality of the opera, shows a greater moral sensitiveness than Wycherley, who knew his public, found it necessary to provide for.

I have no intention, therefore, my dear Susan, of raising the cry of degeneracy, either in the drama or in any other direction. If the "Black Crook" runs for two hundred nights, why only two or three years ago "Hamlet" ran for a hundred nights on the opposite side of the street. One fact is as good as the other. Of course, as the city grows, its vice and temptation grow; and if you ask me whether I should rather see you going to the opera, or to teach in the evening ragged school, I have no hesitation in saying that if I could see you but once, and doing but one thing, I should rather see you teaching the poor children than listening to the opera. But that is not the way to look at it, although it is a way in which it is constantly presented by my good friends in the pulpit. Even the very best of girls—even you—can not be always teaching the poor children in the ragged school, nor carrying jelly to a bedridden widow, nor scraping lint for the hospital, nor distributing tracts, nor engaged in any other technically good work. The rule of conduct, what I should call the correct rule of manners upon the road, is not to be always doing the ideally best possible action, for there is no ideally best action, but never to do any thing of which you have the least doubt. Actions are good, not in themselves, but according to circumstances. It is not a good, but a very wicked thing for you to go and teach poor children in the ragged school, if to do it you abandon your own child lying dangerously ill at home. The difficulty with my good friends in the pulpit is that they seem to imagine there is a class of actions which is necessarily meritorious. But they stop at the form. Giving alms, for instance, they are apt to extol as praiseworthy. But it is not so in itself. It may be so, or it may not. I once saw Jenkins Jones, and I write his name here plainly that it may be remembered—I once saw Jenkins Jones put a five-dollar bill into the plate at the Thanksgiving collection, which I knew Mrs. Jones had given him that morning to pay a debt to me—a debt which he knew he had no other money to pay with. Now that, my dear Susan, was not a good action, although it was alms-giving. It was not charity, it was theft. Jenkins Jones was not to be praised for a liberal contribution; he was to be denounced for picking my pocket.

You probably see, my dear Susan, that I have not answered your question. How can I? You must decide for yourself. If you doubt whether you should go, stay at home. And if you hear that the spectacle is gross, you can not help doubting. I can not honestly advise any body never to sing, never to dance, never to read a novel, never to go to the theatre, never to hear an opera, for I do not see where it would be possible to stop. If you should decline to dine at Mrs. Tilbury's next Wednesday because you are pretty sure that Ned Turquoise will drink more wine than is good for him, you ought seriously to consider whether you ought to sit at your father's table every day at dinner, where your younger brother, Bob, if he can not have a second piece of pie—which he never can—is sure to let his angry passions rise. Resolve if you will, dear Susan, and may Heaven help you to keep your resolution, not to do any thing mean, or unjust, or selfish, or wrong. That is the best advice which I can give you from the experience of

Your faithful friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.

THE fashions for gentlemen are becoming less arbitrary. There is every year greater display of individual taste and fancy, and less of the prescribed regulation costume. The only marked feature of the present styles is their decidedly English tendency. Tailors and hatters commend their goods by declaring their English origin, just as a modiste enhances the value of her stock in trade by persuading her lady customers that she imports directly from Paris.

HATS.

Spring importations of hats show the crown somewhat reduced in height, with brim of medium width, slightly rolled at the sides. Glossy silk beavers are selected for full dress. The black Brighton, with low, bell-shaped crown, is in favor for ordinary wear. It is made in French gray and in cuir color for summer use. "Pocket hats," of soft, pliable felt, have a jaunty appearance, and are convenient for traveling and the theatre, as they bear any amount of crushing without injuring the shape. They are also made of ribbed silk, and of light Scotch cloths, to match the suit with which they are worn. Business hats for summer are of thick straw, either white or brown, in the sailor shape, with low crown, straight brim, and wide ribbon band. Watering-place chapeaux are of the usual negligée styles, the broad-brimmed slouch felt and the valuable Panamas, many of which are marked $30 and $75.

BUSINESS SUITS.

Dark Melton cloths and the Bannockburn Cheviots are selected for business suits. The coat and vest must be of the same material, but it is optional with the wearer whether the pantaloons are similar or in contrast. The English frock-coat is the favorite style; it is still worn quite short, but is a trifle longer than in the past season. Collars roll very low, and are faced with silk. Sleeves are easy fitting and moderately tight at the wrist. Pocket flaps are on the hip. Galloon binding is no longer used. The edge of the garment is finished with a double row of stitching.

Vests may be either collarless or buttoned high with a rolling collar. Standing collars are worn abroad, but are not yet adopted here.

Pantaloons remain close-fitting, but are slightly larger at the ankle. The material is striped cassimere, gray and brown, or a solid color with a two-inch side stripe of darker shade.

The Scotch mixed cloth called Cheviot is in great demand. Dark brown and white and black and white are appropriate for the present season. The pure white Cheviot, like smooth twilled Opera flannel, is cooler for summer than linen, and is as easily washed. Light blue and drab with white will be chosen for morning wear, and are already being made up for the watering-places. The grave colors do not show dust, and as the material is too soft and pliant to wrinkle it is well adapted for traveling suits. The whole suit should be of the same. A light blue suit shown us consisted of a short sack of skeleton make, that is, lined only in front, stitched edges, vest without collar, and tight-fitting pantaloons. A drab suit had an English frock-coat with low rolling collar with but two buttons below the roll. Vest and pantaloons like those just described. Suits of this kind are made to order for $60.

Pantaloons and vests of white duck promise to be more worn during the coming summer than they have been for several years. The coat worn with them should be of light Cheviot.

Spring over-coats and traveling wraps are sack-shaped half adjusted to the figure.

FULL DRESS.

Styles for full dress remain unchanged. Dress coat of black broadcloth faced with watered silk. Collar rolling very low. Vest of the same with low collar to display the embroidered shirt-front. Black pantaloons to fit the figure.

SHIRT FRONTS AND COLLARS.

French shirt-fronts for evening dress are embroidered in vines and medallions of finest needlework. For day wear the bosom is very plain, merely double of the linen or in large pleats.

Standing collars have a small open space in front with the corners carelessly turned down as if broken by the chin, without being pressed flatly. Turned over collars have a round scallop in front instead of the Shakespeare point.

NECK-TIES.

The broad flat Jacksonian scarf, folded instead of being tied, and the sailor's scarf with a knot or ring of the material are the most stylish neckties. Bows worn at the throat should be tied by the wearer and not bought ready-made. Satin and thick corded silks are the prescribed materials. Pretty scarfs of light foulard and grenadine are shown for summer. White cambric and black satin are selected for full evening dress. Gay striped Roman scarfs and brocaded silks of the brilliant Persian colors are worn by young gentlemen.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Tight pantaloons do not fit gracefully over boot tops, consequently shoes are very much worn at present. The shape is in the broad liberal English style rather than the contracted French shoe with its narrow shank and high heel. The English shoe is more comfortable and retains its shape and proportions until worn out. Heels are broad and very high. Box toes without tips. The narrow peaked toe has given place to a wider shape approximating to the duck-bill fashions now prevalent abroad.

JEWELRY.

Scarf rings of Neapolitan coral are shown to represent a tiny serpent with flexible joints winding around a white scarf. Others are of filigree silver with Etruscan carving, with sleeve-buttons, studs, and the fashionable locket—all en suite. A half dozen small buttons of pink coral for a vest are sold for $45. Sleeve-buttons to match are $15. Other sets for vest and cuffs are of the dark blue lapis lazuli, or of carved yellow ivory, the Brazilian beetles, and grinning death's-heads of French enamel; but good taste dictates the more quiet styles, such as the smallest-sized studs of Etruscan gold, or small jewels with very little gold visible in the setting.

Watch-chains are short, with an extra attachment for the universally-worn locket. A fancy sporting chain is formed of golden bits and buckles, with a pendent whip, stirrup, and horse-shoe. The price is $100 in gold. Buttons representing a jockey-cap and whip and bridle are sold with the chain.

WATCHES.

Some beautiful watches were shown us. Among them were several that mark the quarter and even fifths of seconds by independent hands that may be stopped while the minute and hour hand move on. These were also self-winding; that is, with the key in the stem of the watch. A spring at the sides moves the hands. Glass caps are used instead of gold ones. They protect the works from dust, yet do not conceal them. Crystals are of thick glass, not easily broken, as were the fragile ones used until lately. By an ingenious arrangement one side of a double watch is slipped back, and the face left exposed. An elegant watch shown us was of the Jurgensen make, a chronometer balance, self-winding, nickel movement, ruby jewels, and glass cap. The case was richly chased, with a plain centre for a monogram. The price is $500.

American watches are made by machinery, and are claimed to be more accurate than the majority of the hand-made, foreign watches. They are also cheaper, and much simpler, containing only about half as many pieces as a Swiss watch; which is an advantage, inasmuch as every additional piece involves a new liability to accident.

Thanks are due Messrs. W. R. BOWNE; DEV-LIN & Co.; DUNLAP & Co.; GLAZE; E. H. PURDY; UNION ADAMS; BROWNE & SPAULDING; and the AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY.

PERSONAL.

DROLL occurrence in Paris!—Colonel NORTON gave a ball. The Marquis de la Tour appeared as a court-lady. His shoulders, which were bare, were as white as snow, as polished as Parian marble, and as symmetrical as those of the Medicean Venus. When the hour of unmasking arrived every body was astonished to find that these charms belonged to—(ugh!)—a man!

—In the memoirs of the late Baron BUNSEN, just published, are a few pleasant anecdotes about Queen VICTORIA. "The Queen," he says, "is quite different from the representation I had heard of her, speaking with much animation, encouraging conversation, relishing fun. We passed a cheerful evening in playing cards with her. I won a new shilling of her Majesty's special coin, which FANNY shall keep." In another place he says: "The Queen looked well and rayonnante, with that expression which she always has when thoroughly pleased with all that occupies her mind—which you know I always observe with delight, as fraught with that truth and reality which so essentially belong to her character and so strongly distinguish her countenance, in all its changes, from the mixed mask only too common in the royal rank of society." At another time he observes, "the Queen often spoke with me about education, and in particular of religious instruction. Her views are very serious, but at the same time liberal and comprehensive. She, as well as Prince ALBERT, hates all formalism."

—During the progress of the impeachment trial at Washington a letter-writer, deeply impressed with the solemnity of the scene, and desirous that his impressions should go down into history, puts upon record the following great facts: "FESSENDEN whittles the end of his pen-stick; GRIMES slowly rubs his chin; ROSS and NORTON snow up the floor around them with bits of torn paper; CONKLING strokes approvingly the peninsula of light curly hair which stretches down the centre of his forehead; TRUMBULL is always in his seat, and his desk covered with law-books, and he gives the case noticeable attention. Notwithstanding his constant writing, SUMNER is attentive to the trial, and always informed of each aspect of the case as it comes up. YATES, who sits beside SUMNER, keeps his desk unencumbered generally, as well as his chair. When he is in the chamber, SAULSBURY acts like a Polar bear in a menagerie, except a Polar bear doesn't chew quite so much tobacco, nor spit on fine carpets. He is the most uneasy of the Senators. He marches up and down, up and down, turning quickly and walking rapidly for an hour at a time. No Senator on the floor takes a greater interest in the trial than REVERDY JOHNSON, or pays it more steady attention. He chews his lips, and when his hands are not nervously picking at his pantaloons, or rubbing them, his mouth is never still. He leans back in his chair, and is, or looks to be, supremely happy. CHASE is still fine-looking, the most imposing personage in the Chamber.

—Thirty-nine years ago, when a mere literary man about town in London, and quite obscure as a young member of Parliament, Mr. DISRAELI sent the following neat lines to Lady MAHON (now Countess STANHOPE), on her portrait: Fair lady! thee the pencil of Vandyke Might well have painted; thine the English air, Graceful, yet earnest, that his portraits bear, In that far troubled time when sword and pike Gleamed round the ancient halls and castles fair That shrouded Albion's beauty; though when need, Defend the leagured breach, or charging steed Mount in their trampled parks. Far different scene The bowers present before thee; yet serene Though now our days, if coming time impart Our ancient troubles, well I ween thy life Would not reproach thy lot, and what thou art—A warrior's daughter and a statesman's wife.

—The French Empress, at a recent reception at the Tuileries, was attired altogether in black, with clusters of diamonds on the shoulders and along the sides of the dress. An anchor in brilliants in the hair held in place a black aigrette to match the rest of the toilette. All the ladies present were likewise in black. The Court, on the following day, left off all mourning and put on half. The mourning was for the late ex-King of Bavaria.

—JOHN BROWN, an American, residing in Valparaiso—not the John whose "soul is marching on"—has just loaned the Chilean Government $250,000. This J. B. landed a few years ago from a ship, where he had worked as one of the crew, and with nothing but the clothes he had on, commenced work as a journeyman carpenter. To-day he is worth five millions of dollars, has an interesting family, lives like a prince, and stands at the head of social and financial affairs in Chili. Such is the vicacity of the American character!

—Among the curious personal incidents connected with gentlemen who have been prominent in the political affairs of the country, may be mentioned the following: MARTIN VAN BUREN is the only man who held the offices of State Senator, Governor, United States Senator, Secretary of State, Minister to England, Vice-President, and President. THOMAS H. BENTON is the only man who held a seat in the United States Senate for thirty consecutive years. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS held positions under every administration, from Washington to Polk. General SHIELDS is the only person who ever represented, at different times, two States—Illinois and Minnesota. The only instance of father and son being in the Senate together were HENRY DODGE, from Wisconsin, and A. C. DODGE, from Iowa.

Being the first "firm" of the kind ever established in New York, the Bazar wishes them prosperity, and trusts that their example and enterprise may be followed successfully by other "Misses."

—To Lady CRANBOURNE, now Marchioness of SALISBURY, has been attributed the authorship of a series of strictures in regard to Englishwomen, which have lately excited attention. Lord CRANBOURNE's marriage, it is known, greatly offended his father, who might perhaps have forgiven the lady for her parent, who was a judge, but could not overlook the grandfather, who was a dissenting preacher, and for some years the young nobleman and his wife earned more by their literary productions than came to them through their family relations. This experience was a bitter one at the time for Lord CRANBOURNE, but it probably did him good. The judge's daughter, Miss ALDERSON, now a Marchioness, is described as a lady of peculiar sweetness of countenance and manner. Her brother has been a hard-working inspector of schools for years, but he is a parson, and the enormous influence which his brother-in-law now possesses will probably push him on rapidly in the Church.

—The reason why PATTI is not obliged to attend the rehearsal of every opera in which she appears is that Mr. STRAKOSCH, her brother-in-law and manager, does it for her—whistling her rôle and then rehearsing it at home. She knew her parts in several operas before her début. Indeed, their house in Twenty-second Street was vocal from morning to night—Mrs. PATTI, CARLOTTA, ADELINA, and STRAKOSCH, doing little else but musicate. Never were two girls more thoroughly disciplined in the details of the profession than they.

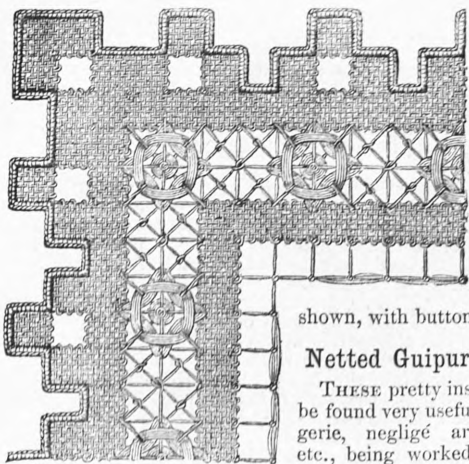

—It is believed that SENOR SARMIENTO, now Minister of the Argentine Republic to the United States, will be elected to the Presidency of the former. He is widely known in literary circles as a man of great ability and fertility of mind, and his work on "Civilization and Barbarism," which drew warm praise from the French and English reviews, has been translated by Mrs. HORACE MANN, and introduced by a sketch of his romantic life, and will soon be published. He wrote a popular life of LINCOLN, which had a large sale in his own country.

—An enterprising Yankee, whose felicity has been rendered complete by a private view of the Tycoon, traces out his "lipinments" (as Mrs. Partington says) in the following words, to wit: "He is a small man of olive complexion, with regular features, more Caucasian than Mongol, and a large intelligent eye. His expression was that of a man who has many affairs of importance upon his mind, but his smile was free, cordial, and pleasant as a woman's. His dress was a long, wide-sleeved robe of violet crape, upon which was embroidered, in some darker color, the trefoil of his family. About his neck and under his robe, but showing above it, was folded a white crape scarf. His wide trowsers were of silk and gold thread woven together, and were worn only to his ankles, so that below one could see the white stockings with which alone his feet were covered. He wore no sword, but carried in his hand a painted fan. His head was bare."

—Readers of items personal may remember that in 1864 the French Academy awarded to M. THIERS a prize of 20,000 francs for his "History of the Consulate and the Empire." Not wishing to retain the money he returned it to the Academicians, asking them to apply the interest of it triennially as a prize for the best historical work which had appeared within the last three years. The first prize under this endowment has recently been awarded to M. MARIE TOPIN, author of "Europe and the Bourbons under Louis the Fourteenth." The committee consisted of very eminent personages: Messrs. GUIZOT, VILLEMAIN, DE MONTALEMBERT, SAINT-MARC GIRARDIN, and Prince ALBERT DE BROGLIE.

—The QUEEN of SAXONY has put her foot squarely down on the hair question, so far as she can dominate over it. The Saxon female, it seems, has of late yielded to the vanity of wearing the hair in an untidy, disheveled state; and having frequently to receive English and American ladies, who sometimes appear with their hair hanging loosely about their shoulders, her Majesty has issued an edict that all persons with such coiffures shall not be admitted at Court. So far as Saxony is concerned, therefore, that matter is settled.

—A grand marriage at Nice, at which all the people were very nice, took place last month, between Miss ISABELLA BUTLER, niece of Lord DUNBOYNE, and HENRY OPPENHEIM, Esq., the wealthy banker of Paris and Egypt. The style in which the bride and assisting damsels were draped is recorded in the following words: The bride, who was dressed in white silk trimmed with point d'Alençon, and having on a magnificent and costly necklace of pearls with a diamond clasp, was attended by six bridesmaids—Miss ROSALINDA BUTLER, her sister; Miss SCOTT MURRAY, the youthful Marquise DE MASSÉNY, the Baronne VAHNSKA DE BERTUCH, and the two Misses LACROIX, daughters of the British Consul, dressed in white and pink, with veils and wreaths of apple-blossoms. The bridal party, ninety in number, afterward proceeded to the Hotel des Anglais, where they then partook of a sumptuous déjeuner, during which the military band of the garrison played a selection of airs. The health of the bride and bridegroom was proposed by Prince COMETINI.

CORNER OF BORDER IN NETTED GUIPURE.

Corner of Border in Netted Guipure.

THESE borders are very pretty for the covers of cushions or pillows; they can also be used for toilette-covers and smaller articles. The illustrations show the manner of working, which is done in point de toile, point de reprise, and small wheels. All of these stitches have already been described in Harper's Bazar. The outer edge is finished, as shown, with button-hole stitch.

Netted Guipure Insertion.

THESE pretty insertions will be found very useful for lingerie, negligé articles, etc., being worked in coarse or fine material according to the uses for which they are designed. The guipure is worked in point d'esprit and point de toile, with four-leaved figures thereon in point de reprise. The sides are button-hole stitched.

Corner of Handkerchief.

THE tasteful style which we give for marking initials in handkerchiefs is new, and commendable on account of its durability. It consists in drawing out the threads of the material in imitation of the netted guipure, which is now so fashionable, and is executed in the following manner: First, hem the pocket-handkerchief an inch and a half wide, then draw out threads in one corner in imitation of netted work. Mark the edge of this square by a line; then draw out, for the width of each small square, nine threads each way, leaving two threads between for each bar. The pattern counts twenty-eight holes square. Before drawing out these threads they must be carefully cut off at the line which borders the open square. The bars are now sewed around with fine thread, care being taken to fasten the crossing points at regular distances. The number of threads to be drawn out depends, of course, on the fineness of the material and size of the letters used.

Having worked the edge in button-hole stitch, work the letters from any of the patterns given in the alphabet illustration, and finish the edge in point d'esprit.

The most suitable material with which to work the letters is fine thread; though they, as well as the border, may be worked in fine black silk.

NETTED GUIPURE INSERTION.

Alphabet in Netted Guipure, for Altar Cloths, Table-Covers,
Handkerchiefs, etc.

GUIPURE is now so much in vogue that many uses will be found for the letters thus worked. These letters are suitable for altar-cloths, or other covers used in church services, or also for the covers of stands, satchels, etc.

This manner of working is especially pretty and durable for initials in pocket-handkerchiefs, and in covers for cushions, and other covers, in which the netted foundation is worked to the material in button-hole stitch. This may also be imitated in the stuff by drawing out threads, as is explained by the illustration of the corner of a handkerchief and the appended description. The letters have a very pretty effect if worked partly in thread and partly in fine gold thread; or they may also be worked in white and red—so-called Turkish—yarn; these are especially suitable for objects designed for church use.

Toilette Case.

See illustration, page 485.

THIS case will be found very useful for carrying toilette combs and brushes, especially in traveling. The illustrations show the case open and closed. The original is made of brown linen and oiled silk. The linen, of which the outside is composed, is embroidered with brown wool and silk. The inside is divided into several compartments, and is made of oiled silk. The case is nine inches in length by three and a half in breadth. Of this size cut, first, for the outer sides of the case, two equal pieces of linen and oiled silk; and of the same material four strips, each one and a half inches in width, for the sidepieces, of the length and breadth of the case. Then prepare for the inner pockets, of the oiled silk only, a piece of the same size as the outer pieces, and a somewhat narrower piece, and fasten both together on one side and on both ends. To the narrower part sew a still smaller pocket as shown in the illustration of the case open. Take the two outside pieces of stuff, which have been embroidered in point russe, in the manner shown in the illustrations, and the corresponding linings, also the strips of stuff which are to form the edges; then fasten, first, one side-piece of the pocket, excepting on one side, with the edge-pieces which are sewed together at the ends (under corners of the pock-connection with the arrangement of the colors. Begin, on a foundation of twenty-two stitches, with the second (middle) shade, and work one round in single crochet. At the beginning of this round lay on also the lightest shade, and use this as the foundation thread. In the second round (thenceforward always put the needle under both upper veins of each stitch) begin the working of the design by always leaving a loop, one-sixth of an inch in length, of the light foundation thread after each single ets); after which join this to the inner part of the pocket, as also to the outer side-piece. This, however, must be fastened only on one side, while the other is sewed to the fourth edge-piece of stuff. Another pocket-piece of oiled silk has already been fastened to this side-piece as shown by the illustration. Lastly, finish all the pocket-pieces on their outer edges, as also the seams on the outer edges of the pocket, with brown silk ribbon half an inch in width, and sew on, according to the pattern, buttons and button-hole stitch loops, and also two ribbons for fastening. crochet stitch which comes on the dotted signs of the design; in this round these loops will lie on the back of the work. After each loop follows a single crochet stitch, which is worked in the darker shade; one symbol occupies the space of both a loop and a stitch. In the following round, which, like all the remaining rounds, is worked in the same manner, the loops must be on the right side of the work. Having finished one stripe, work the veinings of the leaves with the third shade of wool in long half-polka stitch, according to the illustration, which also shows a part of a stripe in full size. Then crochet on the side of the stripe, first, two

DESIGN FOR TRAVELING BLANKET.

Case for Traveling Shawl.

MATERIALS: Brown linen, red woolen braid half an inch in width, black zephyr wool.

When covered by a case which protects it from the dust a shawl may be conveniently used for a foot-stool in traveling. This case, being supplied with handles, renders shawl-straps unnecessary. The original is of brown linen, and is ornamented with red woolen braid and black zephyr wool, worked in herring-bone stitch. Prepare, first, a piece of brown linen, twenty-seven inches in length by twenty-two in breadth, and two circular pieces each seven and a half inches in diameter. Hem the four-cornered piece at the distance of an inch and a half from the edge of the shorter sides, and work three button-holes at regular distances; after which sew on the corresponding buttons, which are covered with linen. Then trim the whole according to the pattern with the trimming mentioned, and back stitch the four-cornered piece on each side to one of the circular pieces. In sewing these seams the four-cornered piece must be held in, and the hems left so as to lap over each other. The handles are each nine inches long by one and a half inches in width, and are of double linen, ornamented with braid and herring-bone stitch. They are sewed to the case in the manner shown by the illustration.

rounds in single crochet of gray wool—in the first round taking care to put the needle through the border stitch; then one round in double crochet. The next round is bordered on the sides by only one round in single crochet, after which the stripes are overcasted together from the under side. In setting the stripes together care must be taken that the outer ones shall be those which were bordered with only one row of single crochet. The cover is then worked around together in the same manner as the stripes. For the fringe knit of the lightest shade a stripe twenty inches in width and of the requisite length, and press this with a hot iron. Then loosen one stitch on the edge of one side of the stripe, and ravel out the stitches till only two rows are left on the other side. These remain a firm border, the outer row of which is fastened to the cover.

Beaded Border for Bodices, etc.

This border forms an exceedingly tasteful trimming for bodices and waists. It is made of black silk braid and lace, on which jet beads and bugles are sewn in the manner shown in the illustration, the bottom being finished with jet grelots between the leaves of the edge, the latter of which are veined with bugles.

BEARDS.

IT needs a good deal of moral courage to begin to grow a beard. Nothing can well look more disreputable than a beard two days old, except perhaps it be a beard of three days. It takes a week before the scope and design of what the fellow is about becomes apparent, and even then he feels uncomfortable to himself and all about him. The bent and genius of a man's character may be divined by observing the manner in which he begins to grow a beard, having resolved to do so. One man will cultivate the stubble excrecence all over each appointed square inch, suffering resolutely taunts and gibes: the mens sibi conscia recti. I like that man: he is an honest which is put together of single stripes. These stripes in the pattern are worked with wool in two shades of red, the darker shade forming the foundation of the stripes, which is worked in single crochet stitches. The small loops which stand out in relief and form the design are of the lightest shade. These give the work a velvet-like appearance. With a third still darker shade of the wool the veins in the leaves of the design are worked with double thread in long half-polka stitch. The stripes are bordered on the sides with a narrow crochet border of gray wool, and are then sewed together. The completed cover is bordered in the same manner. A knitted fringe of red worsted finishes this border. The stripes of the pattern are each three and a half inches in width and thirty-nine inches in length. The stripes can, of course, be made as much wider as may be desired by making the foundation a few stitches wider; or another wider pattern may be chosen. The illustration gives the design for the stripes in man. With my purse I would trust that man—my wife, my daughter. To such a man I incline at once: he is my beau-ideal. He would tell me my faults at once, and not conceal them, making me morally worse, thinking to please me. Another man, having concluded to grow a beard, will go surreptitiously to work, encroaching a little day by day, thinking you will never discover it. Accursed be that base individual—carbone notandus! Even so would he encroach on my landmarks, my purse, my family peace. He would rob a canary-bird of his sugar—the trope is not mine—he would grub up his grandmamma to make knife-handles out of her leg-bones.

MARY.

MARY'S but a lowly maid,
Very wise and gentle;
Proud Lucinda's rich brocade
Proves her father's rental.
Where the lamps and jewels glow
Doth Lucinda bask it;
Cottage small, where roses blow,
You're my Mary's casket!

See, in whim, Lucinda bright
Flings her glances my way,
As a traveling duchess might Wander down a by-way,
Love the brook, the village inn—
"Here to live and die now!"
Ah, new horses—off we spin:
Little place, good-by now!"

Nay, my lady, by your leave,
Wasted fall those glances;
You yourself alone deceive,
Dangling toyish fancies.
There, in all your charms array'd,
Calm I look you over;
Mary's but a cottage-maid,
I am Mary's lover.

Sweeter far my Mary's smile,
Tender, truthful, gracious,
Than the lady's honey'd wile,
Delicately mendacious.
Give me Mary's finger-tips,
Robb'd of half their whiteness,
Rather than Lucinda's lips,
Wreath'd in languid brightness!

A thousand beauties, fair and brown,
I've seen, of every station:
Like my Mary, never one;
She's new as Eve's creation.
And hid was this delightful girl
Where no man could discover,
Till I, most happy, found the pearl—
I am Mary's lover.

Fresher far than flowery wood
When the Spring awakes it,
Brighter far than morning cloud
When the sunshine takes it,
Mary's love—and pure as Heaven:
Oh, thou best and dearest!
All thy love to me is given,
All my soul thou cheerest!

DEBORAH'S ROMANCE.

"DEBORAH!"—mother's voice rang out sharp and clear from the kitchen, as though in urgent haste—"Deborah, run here quick, will thee!"

I flew down to the kitchen in a moment, where mother stood at the table with her hands plunged in a drift of flour, and her eyes fixed anxiously on the oven-door whence a slight smoke was issuing. "Open the oven-door quick, will thee, Deborah? those pies are spoiled, I fear!" and as I hurried the doors wide open little spluttering pools of boiling sugar, hissing and seething like young volcanoes, greeted my eyes, while the contraband shade of the rich paste of the apple pies, and the properly yellow coat of the pumpkin-pies, puffing up into huge black swellings here and there, seemed to tell a direful story to the patient hands that had been laboring since sunrise, and now beheld their crowning glory spoiled. For it was the day before Thanksgiving, and mother and I had been busy all the morning—mother baking and I putting the house in perfect order in anticipation of expected company on the morrow. Brother Solon was coming home, and with him Gerald Haynes, of whom I had heard so much; Gerald Haynes, Solon's chum, and fellow-clerk, and beau-ideal united in one! No wonder I longed to see him. Wouldn't any girl in her senses if she had heard a young man praised as I had heard him; his person, his character, his talents all seemed to Solon perfection itself, and, of course, I should be dazzled. I, a little country girl, who knew nothing beyond house-work, and a little schooling, and whose knowledge of the world was limited to the very slight glimpse of it to be obtained in a little rural town of Maine.

So when the letter came announcing that Solon had invited Gerald to come and spend Thanksgiving with him at his country home—for Solon retained a strong love for that home in spite of all the city glare—and that the invitation had been accepted, it threw mother and me into quite a fever of excitement; mother, because she was so anxious for her reputation as the perfect house-keeper Solon had always declared her to be, and I—well, I was excited for various reasons.

And, first of all, I began to wonder if he would think me a little green country girl! I looked over my dresses, wondering what I should wear. There was my new crimson merino, I knew that became me, but Solon had pronounced it too gay the last time he was home; he said he liked "quiet" colors better, and that Gerald did too. Then I looked at my old brown dress which I had worn for two winters; it looked fairly dowdy, and the braid was fagged out round the edge. No, I couldn't wear that, so the crimson it must be, for my wardrobe was limited and my choice only lay between those two, unless I dared put on my very best, my drab silk, and I knew mother would hold up her hands in horror at that idea, so with a sigh I took down the dress, wishing the shade I so much admired when I bought it was more "quiet," and wondering what he would think of it.

Then I thought of my unfortunate name—Deborah! There were only two of us, and why did mother give us such dreadful names! I never heard mine called without thinking of what Fanny May said. Fanny lives in Boston, and is a cousin to Sarah Lawton, our next-door neighbor. Fanny said to me, after we got acquainted with each other, "What a pity it is your mother gave you such a name, Debbie! When I used to hear Sarah talk about Deborah Wayne, I always used to imagine a tall, gaunt old maid—about forty years old." Perhaps I may tell the whole she said without seeming vain. She added, "I never thought of your being such a charming little wild rose as you are!" Now I don't get such compliments as that very often. Plenty of people tell me I am rosy, and plump, and "trig," but no one has ever said any thing like that. Only once old Farmer Daniels came near it in his homely way, for he said to mother as he rested his tired old frame on our front-door steps, and I handed him the plate of dough-nuts mother took down from the shelf: "That gal of yours is as pooty as a posy, Mis' Wayne. It does my old eyes good to look at her!" But, oh dear! I think I take naturally to refinement; and these honest but ungrammatical country neighbors sometimes disgust me.

We were all ready and on the watch when the stage drove up to the door; mother in her neat drab dress and spotless cap, and I in my crimson merino and a white bib-apron. Solon always liked me to wear aprons. I peeped through the blinds and saw them alight from the outside where they had been riding. Solon's boyish figure leaped down first, and a tall, manly form followed, which made my heart bound—I don't know why, I'm sure!

Mother met them first, and I hung back trembling until I heard, "Where's sis?" and then I could no longer keep back, and rushed to Solon's outstretched arms, and received and returned his warm kisses. When I was released to be presented to Mr. Haynes, I just glanced up in his face as I put my hand in his warm clasp, but that look was enough to set my foolish heart to fluttering again. Oh, he was so different from our country youths with their shy, awkward manners and nasal voices. His very bow denoted the difference—much more his voice and words. Well, we managed to get into the parlor; and mother, to my great relief, devoted herself to Mr. Haynes; and I was glad when his great brown eyes were taken off my face, for I felt the blushes burning there, and knew he would set me down at once as an astonishing little piece of rusticity. So I became quite at ease when his broad back was toward me, and ventured on giving Solon two or three little impromptu hugs, safe in the idea that he could not see out of the back of his head, when he was so busily engaged talking with mother, too, until I happened to glance in the glass opposite, just after Solon had taken my face between his hands and kissed me twice or thrice, for we dearly love each other, as an only brother and sister should—when, I say, on raising my eyes, I saw that the whole scene was pictured before him; and although his back was turned to us, his eyes were fixed upon the glass with a curious look which made me glad to run out of the room.

Pretty soon mother came out. "Now, Deborah," she said, "thee can stay in the other room and entertain them, and I will see to dinner. I don't need thee, now every thing is all ready." So in I had to go again; but this time the owner of those searching eyes was seated on the sofa, looking over my album. After one assuring glance, to see if he was really entertaining himself, I took the chair Solon beckoned me to, by his side, and submitted to a catechism respecting all our old friends. But fearing we had a listener, I was so absurdly constrained and stiffly grammatical, lest I might shock his fastidious taste, that at last Solon began to stare with surprise.

"Why, Debbie!" he exclaimed, "what in the world is the matter? Have you swallowed a grammar, or a dictionary, or both? I never thought my little sister was inclined to be pedantic before—let me look at you!" And he faced about and held my face up, burning with blushes, to see if he could detect any thing unusual there. I could not forbear glancing at our visitor, to see if he was observing the ridiculous picture I knew I was making, feeling convinced that he knew the truth, that I was overpowered by his presence; but that glance revealed the truth to Solon, for he burst out laughing as he exclaimed, "Why, Gerald, I do believe the child is afraid of you! She glances over to your quarters as a little mouse might look at the fiercest cat, as though she thought you might pounce upon her suddenly at any time. Why, chicken," he went on, as the album closed with a thump, and I felt rather than saw the tall figure striding toward us, while the merry laugh of our guest increased my confusion. "You needn't mind Ger; he's a great big fellow, I know, but he's harmless as a kitten!"

"But kittens are death on mice," interrupted Gerald, still laughing, "and that won't reassure her, of course. Say I am as harmless as a caterpillar, or the most innocent little creature you can think of; tell her I am much more afraid of her than she is of me—for I am naturally very modest, as you well know!"

Just then, to my relief, mother came in to call us to dinner, and the attractions of the table for a while occupied the whole attention of our company; for Solon said it was such a dinner as his mother, and no one else in the world, could "get up;" which gratified mother immensely, of course, though she only said, calmly: "Now, Solon, don't thee go to talking so foolish. It's only that it's home that makes thee think every thing is so much better here than thee has it at Boston." But Mr. Haynes supported Solon so strongly in his opinion that mother was forced to let them have it their own way, and yielded with her usual quiet smile.

When the short afternoon had drawn to its close Solon said: "Now we'll have a good old-fashioned sleigh-ride to-night. What do you say, Gerald? This snow is too great a luxury to us to be unimproved. We don't see such snow as this in Boston—do we, Ger?"

"Not to be mentioned in the same breath," said Mr. Haynes; "such sparkling whiteness is altogether too pure for the city. Ours is yellowish-brown, of the consistency of meal; this is crisp, clean, and sparkles like myriads of little gems. How the moon touches it up! Dame Nature is in full dress to-night, and has donned all her diamonds." As he said this he stood by the window, holding back the curtain with one hand, and turned to me as though inviting me to come too and look at the scene without. I went to his side, murmuring some confused reply; for his eyes were bent on mine with an earnest look that disconcerted me for a moment until he laid his hand on my head, and exclaimed, frankly, "What a little thing you are—a mere child! I always thought Solon's sister Deborah was a very different person from you. Are you quite sure you are she?" His unconventional tone and laugh entirely restored me to myself, and I answered as frankly as he had spoken, "Oh, I know what sort of person you thought I would be, if you thought about it at all!"

"Now tell me," he answered, folding his arms, and looking curiously down at me, "and I'll promise to acknowledge if you tell truly; for certainly I did think about it, but not so much as I should have done if I had known the truth," he added in a lower tone, which again set my blood to scorching my face; but I would not be rendered dumb by that, so I answered, demurely,

"You thought I would be a tall, gaunt female of uncertain age, with high cheek-bones and squeaky shoes, in a huge, dark calico apron; now didn't you, Mr. Haynes?"

"I really hadn't got so far as the apron," he replied, laughing, "although if I had known what a bewitching little article of female apparel they might be made, I should have done so, no doubt; but I confess I had imagined some such person as you describe, only a little more attractive; for I knew my friend Solon here had a strong affection for that sister, and he is fastidious in his quiet way. I might have known he had something at home to make him so."

He paused a moment, during which I was deliberating whether it was my duty to sit down myself, or offer him a chair, being quite convinced that one of the two would be quite proper under the circumstances, for I had been hard at work all day, when he said, with a look down at me that drove all fatigue out of my mind:

"Instead of which I find a little brown-haired fairy, in a glowing, warm-hued dress, a most captivating little white apron, and—"

"Instead of which you find only a poor little country girl, in a dress that Brother Solon dislikes because it is fiery—a girl who doesn't even know how to entertain her brother's visitors without talking about herself," I exclaimed, interrupting him, for I would not have it go on so any longer.

Then Solon came back, and reported: "We can each have a horse and sleigh, and a companion, if we can get one, Gerald, or we can take the double sleigh, and all go together. What do you like best?"

"If Miss Deborah will go with me, I prefer a single sleigh," he replied, glancing laughingly at me. "I am still boy enough to be fond of driving, and it is a privilege I don't often have. Will you indulge me by going with me? Do you think you can trust your life in my hands?"

Now, of course, I wanted to go. What young girl wouldn't have had her heart jump at the offer of a sleigh-ride on a bright moonlight night, with capital sleighing, and such a companion? but I made-believe I wasn't as pleased as I really felt, and asked demurely if he was sure he knew how to drive—if he had ever driven any; adding that I was not fond of being thrown into a snow-drift.

"Preposterous!" exclaimed Mr. Haynes, while mother, who had just come in from the kitchen, stood smilingly by. "Just think, Mrs. Wayne, of her asking a great, long fellow like me if I have ever driven a horse! I think I must manage to upset her to pay for that."

"If you threaten I can stay at home," I said. "Which implies that if I don't you will go," he rejoined.

"Thee mustn't mind what that child says. Gerald," said mother, with a benign look at him that made me sure that she had already gone over to Solon's side, and was deep in admiration of him; for mother always thinks just as Solon does of every body; but I am very different. I choose to form my own opinions; and I am not so easily taken captive, you know.

"Who'll thee ask to go, Solon?" said mother, while a rapid, telegraphic glance shot between Solon and me, intercepted by a pair of dark eyes that fixed themselves most pertinaciously on my face. "Thee had better ask Mary Bowman. She was saying the other day that she would like a sleigh-ride, and hadn't had one for the winter."

"Well, but mother dear, you know how her mother always worries when Mary goes any where. I am afraid it would make her seriously unhappy lest Mary should get cold or be upset.

I don't think I'd better ask her to-night. Perhaps I can get some one nearer home;" and Solon shot out of the door like a flash.

"I'll warrant he's gone after Sarah Lawton," said mother, "and she can't even make her own clothes! There's Mary Bowman does every stitch of sewing for the family with her own hands, and takes care of her sick mother; and there isn't a better housekeeper in the village. 'Hee remembers her dinner last Fourth-day, Deborah," and poor mother gave a little sigh as she thought of her disappointed plans and her possible future daughter-in-law.

Well, we went. Solon came in, bringing Sarah with him, her golden hair and blue eyes peeping out from the depths of her huge "pumpkin-hood;" and as she ran up stairs with me to get ready, we confided to each other our delight at the prospect before us.

How bright the moon shone, and how the snow sparkled! how silvery-sweet rang out the bells on the still air, as we glided along, tucked in snugly and warmly with buffalo-ropes and blankets, and hot soap-stones at our feet!

I must not try to tell all that was said during that delightful ride. I can only say that my head was in a whirl—the blood ran riot in my veins. Something—the exhilarating air, the rapid motion, or the brilliancy of my companion—had transformed me for the time. I had sung, laughed, and talked with all the abandon of a child, and Gerald Haynes had also become transformed into a boy; and we gave ourselves up to the spell of the hour; so that when his arm stole around my waist, drawing me close to his side, with a half-intelligible remark to the effect that there must be no room for cold air to creep in between us, and he asked if he might be allowed to claim me for his little sister too, as he had none in the wide world, I nestled close to him, and frankly expressed my pleasure at the request. And when we rode lingeringly home at last (I sighing in my heart as home grew nearer and nearer), and we drove up to the gate, I did not resist as he took me in his arms and ran up the path and to the very door with me; and I'm afraid I only turned my face away a very little as he pressed a rapid, thrilling kiss on my lips—a kiss that burned there the whole night; for I had never received such a one before in my whole life.

On Friday we all went up to Uncle Ralph's and spent the day. My tall, farmer cousins, honest and manly, but uncouth, unconsciously deepened my admiration for Gerald. I could not help contrasting them as they stood in the yard examining the "stock," Ben and John in their coarse working clothes, with their broad, stooping shoulders, and their huge brawny hands, red and coarse from hard work, their heavy cow-hide boots, and their hearty but coarse voices, and Gerald, with his tall, erect figure showing to such advantage in his perfect-fitting suit, his polished boots, and his hands whiter than mine as I had noticed with shame the night before. And yet, strong as this contrast was, it was not the dress alone, but the clear, well-modulated tones, the refinement of face and manner, that struck me with such force that a sickening feeling rushed over me as I thought, must I spend my days among such people when I so long for and admire cultivated and refined society! I was growing positively miserable over the thought, when mother's hand was laid on my shoulder; and her voice, roused a little from its wonted serenity, exclaimed, "Why, Deborah, child! didn't thee hear Aunt Ruth? She has been talking to thee this half hour, and thee looks as though thee hadn't heard a word. What does thee see uncommon out there?"

Oh, I did see "uncommon things." I was feasting my eyes on what was luxury for me, but with a great sigh I choked back my feelings, and tried to take an interest in good Aunt Ruth's humdrum talk, striving to remember exactly my recipe for the sweet pickles I had just been making. But it was very hard.

On Saturday Sarah asked us all there to tea. I mean Gerald, Solon, and me. In the evening we played games until nine, when we dared no longer indulge, for we had been brought up to strict observance of Saturday night; and even to desecrate it until nine was an unusual occurrence: but Sarah's father and mother had gone to a neighboring town to spend Sunday, and her older sister, Martha, who kept house, was evidently so taken with Mr. Haynes that she not only countenanced us in our dissipation, but participated in it, performing her forfeits with great zest. As for Solon and myself we strangled our consciences, and entered into the games with all our hearts until the bell rang for nine, when mother's face loomed up before me so reproachfully that my courage failed, and I declared I could play no longer.

"Oh, but you have a forfeit to pay first," exclaimed Gerald, starting up. "You are not to get rid of that so easily," and marched me up to Solon, saying, "Judge her, Solon, and don't be lenient now; give a good tough one if it's to be her last."

"I don't know of a tougher one than to propose that she shall go through a marriage-ceremony, as I've often heard her say she should never be married; and Sarah has one to pay too; she must go through with the same."

"I haven't chosen you for my judge yet," said Sarah, saucily, turning her radiant face to him; but I seized her arm, exclaiming,

"Very well, say, let's be married to each other;" and we instantly walked up to Gerald, requesting him to tie the knot.

"The idea!" exclaimed Gerald, with well-feigned horror. "You know very well that two women can't live in one house, and the idea of being tied to each other for life! I shan't consent to act the parson, but I will offer my services in another character—as bridegroom," and before I knew fairly what he was about he had me under his arm, while Solon bore off Sarah, and we were marshaled before Martha, who in a remarkable fit of congeniality had entered into the joke, and immediately commenced the words of a mock-marriage-service then in vogue for such occasions.

"Remember you are my little wife," whispered Gerald as he detained me for a moment before we entered our own door that night; "give me a husband's privilege," and once more he pressed on my unresisting and unaccustomed lips a long, long kiss.

Neither did the remembrance of that kiss leave me, even in my dreams, that night.

On Sunday we went in the forenoon to mother's meeting, where Gerald and Solon sat side by side in most decorous silence, across the aisle from me, through the long forenoon, for the Spirit moved not, until just before the hand-shaking a good and saintly-faced sister arose, and with peace breathing in every line of her face, said a few words of Christian consolation and encouragement.

In the afternoon Solon, Gerald, and I rode over to the Congregational church, two miles away, for which Solon had a decided preference, possibly because of the fact that Sarah Lawton's contralto voice lent its music to the choir; but I am always charitable toward Solon, so I won't insist upon that as the sole attraction.

In the evening mother had one of her bad headaches, and went to bed early. After I had bathed her head and given her the camphor-bottle, she said, "Now, thee go right back, Deborah, and stay with Gerald and Solon. I will call thee if I want any thing." So back I went to the sitting-room. Then Solon, after a few restless movements and glances out of the window, exclaimed, as though it had that moment occurred to him, that he supposed he ought to go and bid Sarah good-by, as they would be off so early in the morning. So we were left alone, Gerald and I.

He made me come and sit beside him, and he held my little red hand in his own shapely white one, while I blushed at the contrast, foolishly enough. He told me of their city life, of the opera and other amusements; of concerts, which made my heart burn with wild desires; of the shops of Art, where one can feast the eye on the best paintings whenever he feels so inclined; and of the places of public interest; and my poor life seemed so barren by contrast! I believe I said something to that effect, of my life spent in making bread and pies under mother's watchful eye; of sweeping, and dusting, and sewing; my tiresome, monotonous routine, every day repairing the ravages of the day previous, in that endless round that shall never cease so long as we remain in the tabernacle of the body. I spoke of it, I know, with distaste; but he said, "Don't you know, my darling, that these very things are fitting you to make the very best little wife in the world? The man who gets a wife well skilled in these matters is to be envied if, in addition, she has a loving heart and bewitchingly womanly ways, like my little sister here," and he smiled on me so lovingly that my heart acknowledged him as its king from that moment.

"You have been my little wife in jest—you are my little sister in earnest. What shall it be next?" he said, as he folded me close to his side, and kissed me once more in that same mysterious, because lasting fashion. Then we heard Solon stamping his snowy boots outside the door.

Well, the next morning they went.

I believe I felt dreary enough that next day. Never did housework seem so utterly distasteful to me as then, and in spite of what Gerald had said, I felt that if I lived in a city, and had white hands, and could play on the piano, I should be much better pleased with myself and more attractive to my friends.

So I went through the day, dreaming day-dreams, such as young girls often dream, and was not fully aroused until an unwonted sharp reprimand from mother brought me to my senses. I had built the fire for tea, and supper was all ready; but when mother came out, as she always preferred to do, to make the tea herself, there wasn't a drop of water in the tea-kettle.

"Why, Deborah, child, what ails thee? Thee has acted all day as though thee had lost thy senses. Thee had better come down out of the clouds, and learn to be a better housekeeper before thee goes up again."

The color rushed to my face, for in spite of mother's quiet ways I knew she was a keen observer, and little escaped her sharp eye; so by great effort I succeeded in arousing myself to my usual interest in the affairs of the house, resolving to wait until I could be by myself before I lived over the past three days again.

But my solace came. Every letter from Solon had an addition which gave it a new charm to my eyes; eagerly as I had always welcomed those letters before, they were now thrice welcome. At first it was a message, then a postscript, in a bold, manly hand; then it came all by itself—a letter to the "dear little brown-haired sister away off in Maine;" and so it went on, until I began to find that I was two persons, living two lives. The one swept, dusted, made puddings and pies as of old; chatted with the country folk, among them but not of them, trying to take interest in the petty affairs of a harmlessly gossiping neighborhood. The other tried to keep herself dainty and fresh to please one who had so often spoken of prizing those things in her: she studied late at night and early in the morning that he might think her improved when they met—as he assured her they should soon meet—and she lived in a world of her own fashioning, surrounded by intelligence and refinement, filling her heart by pondering on these things.

So the days went by, and the hot midsummer came, when wearied city people throng out to the cool retreats of country-side and sea-shore.

And the sultry August days brought us our guests again. Solon, taller, more graceful and manly, improved in looks and appearance; and the other!—well, if to my eyes he was perfect before, then I demonstrated the truth of that which the world had declared impossible—that perfection will admit of increase.

If I trembled and shrank back when he came before, still more did I do so now; now that I was so much more anxious to appear well in his eyes!—now that he had become so much to me! And, as I stood at my old post of observation, behind the blinds, I watched his affectionate greeting of mother, with eager eyes, while even my captious fancy could detect no difference in her reception of the two.

But his eager glance shot by her, through the doorway, and his ardent face anticipated Solon's first question, "Where's Debbie, mother?" So, with one glance at my own blushing face, I went forward to meet them. As before, I was first taken to Solon's loving embrace, and when I was released and turned to the other, I gave one swift glance at his face. There was so much in it that my own eyes fell. I dared not look again; and we met with a strong, firm pressure of hands—a grasp that seemed never willing to loose itself; and that was all!

But afterward, when the first bustle of their coming was over, and mother had left the room for a moment, Solon followed her, and we were left alone. I remember I was standing by the window, carelessly breaking the leaves from an ivy which latticed the window, not daring to speak or look for a moment. Then, summoning all my courage, I turned suddenly to address him; there he stood, close by me, with eyes brimful of love and longing. I could read it plainly; and as I stood before him mute, fascinated by his look, without the power to withdraw my eyes from his, he stretched out his arms to me, with unutterable longing in his eyes and voice, as he said: "Will my darling come to me now, as she never came before? Not as my little sister, but as my own true, loving wife, from whom nothing but death shall part me forever. Will she come?" And in a moment I was folded close, close to the heart that was all my own. My longings were satisfied; my unrest quieted; I had found my home.

SINGULAR CUSTOM IN BURMAH.

A CORRESPONDENT, writing from Mandalay, describes the ceremony of "boring the ears" of the daughters of the King of Burmah, which took place there lately. The whole of the royal party were bedecked with diamonds, rubies, sapphires, emeralds, and pearls. His Majesty and two of the principal queens were scarcely able to walk from the weight of the ornaments on their robes. The king and the queens were supported on either side by maids of honor of rare Burmese beauty. The orchestra was filled by some of the dancing girls, who performed on sackbuts, drums, harps, etc. It is estimated that the whole affair will cost upward of ten lacs of rupees. The gates of the palace were thrown open to all—men, women, and children—and theatrical performances went on day and night.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE London Saturday Review has recently produced a series of articles on the women of the present day. Either the Saturday Review is a disappointed bachelor, who has never known any type of true womanhood, or else his matrimonial relations have been fearfully unfortunate, and in either case is worthy of commiseration. He who deals out wholesale denunciation upon women as a class, proclaims not merely that he is no gentleman, but that all his home relations in life have been a miserable failure. He who has cherished, with manly love, a good mother, sister, or wife, will never cast sweeping reproach upon the whole sex, whatever may be the errors and follies of a part. But it has been stated that the articles referred to were written by a woman; to which we would reply, never, by one who deserves the name of woman. No true, pure woman could thus revile her sex, and fling base accusations upon the maiden, wife, and mother. It is simply impossible.

The truth is, that the grains of justice contained in the papers in question are wholly lost in the error and false judgment they display. It is not to be denied that while, with the progress of the age, new means of usefulness and influence have been opened to women, evils and follies of various kinds have not lagged behind. But because many girls are rude and vulgar, or vain, frivolous, and extravagant, are we to conclude that all are so? Because some wives disgrace their name, are none pure and faithful? Because some mothers forsake the nursery for the ball-room, who has the right to charge the whole class of mothers with hatred for the cares of maternity? Yet such seems to be the tone of criticism; no exceptions are made; all are alike guilty. Because some have soiled their fingers with the gambling card, it has been proclaimed throughout the country that "Washington ladies" and "New York ladies" are "gamblers." Because some of the weaker followed the example of many of the stronger sex, and polluted their lips with the intoxicating cup, a report spread through the land giving the impression that "fashionable ladies" were in the habit of "getting tipsy." Criticism, to be useful, must be just and discriminating.

"Or shall we all condemn, and all distrust, Because some men are false and some unjust?"

An instance of maternal energy and faithfulness is recorded of a poor Irish woman, who formerly lived in Massachusetts. Her husband was lost in a fishing-vessel and she was left with four young children. Finding that she could not bring up her children respectably in Massachusetts on her slender earnings, she put them at a Catholic school in Brookline, agreeing to pay a certain stipend for their board and instruction, and secured a passage round Cape Horn to California by working as a stewardess. Arriving safely, she went to work there. Every thing that she could save from her earnings was sent home for her children, to the care of a woman who had charge of them. At length she became apprised of the unfaithfulness of this woman, and started for Massachusetts to find her children. They were scattered around. One of them had died without her being apprised of it, and one of them was where he was ill-used. She gathered them together, and has started back with them to California, determined hereafter not only to work for them, but to have them where she can look after them.

The Roman Catholic Cathedral which is now in process of erection on Fifth Avenue, between Fifth and Fifty-first streets, was commenced in the year 1858. During our civil war there was an almost entire cessation of work upon it. Now it is progressing with considerable rapidity, although some time must elapse before its completion. The building will be of beautiful white marble, and will be richly finished and decorated. When completed it will probably be the largest and most expensive ecclesiastical building in America.

A discouraged merchant in a certain New England city, not being very successful in his business, disconsolately told his wife the other day that he did not know what he was coming to, and that he did wish he had a house, and lot somewhere to fall back upon. The good wife had heard such lamentations frequently before, but this time her liege appearing uncommonly cast down she determined to relieve his mind a little, and produced, to his utter astonishment and joy, a deed of a fine house and lot in the vicinity. She had bought it with the "pin money" of many years.

Many years ago a Massachusetts teacher saw a boy come into his school who bore a bad character. He determined, if he could, to make a good boy of him. So he spoke kindly to him, and he behaved well that day. The next morning the prudential committee (as he was called) came in, and said: "Mr. T., I hear that bad fellow, M., has come to your school. Turn him out at once! he will spoil the rest of the boys."—"No, Sir," replied the teacher; "I will leave the school, if you say so, but I can not expel a boy so long as he behaves well." So he kept him, and encouraged him, confided in him, till he became one of the best boys in school. Years afterward that boy, having grown to manhood, and obtained an honorable position in life, would take special pains to visit his old teacher, and thank him for having been the means of saving him. Wrong-doers would more often reform if they could find any who would trust them and help them.

The painful revelations in connection with "baby-farming" have induced a number of charitable ladies in London to establish a crèche, similar to those in France, and in other parts of the Continent. In this instance the crèche is intended for the benefit of the poor belonging to the Roman Catholic community, the subscriptions having been raised entirely by that denomination. A large house, in the midst of a very poor district, has been taken; and here mothers who have to gain a livelihood away from their homes will be enabled to leave their children during the day. The infants will be well cared for by the Sisters of Charity, and will be fed and clothed free of expense to their parents. It is proposed to have in the same house a system by which poor girls, not old enough to go out to service, can be kept out of harm's way. These girls will assist the sisters in tending the children, and will receive food, clothing, and education gratuitously.

Don't fret. It does no good—on the contrary much harm. It ruffles the temper. Ruffled dresses may be stylish just now, but ruffled tempers have not "come in" yet. Fretting makes people lose their balance; and you do not want to lose your balance, because you might never find it again. Fretting is a folly; and you do not want to be a fool. A fretter has every body's cold shoulder, which is quite too many by more than half. One may do for a lunch, but several—every body's—would be quite too much for the hungriest meal. Don't fret.

Sulphur is recommended as a specific against insects in bird-cages. Tie up a little sulphur in a silk bag and suspend it in the cage. For mocking-birds this is essential to their health, and the sulphur will keep red ants and other insects from the cages of all kinds of birds. Red ants will never be found in a closet or drawer if a small bag of sulphur be kept in these places.

Treading on the trail of a Parisian lady's dress seems to have been attended with more serious consequences than any similar accident we have heard of in this country. On a grand night at the Opera in Paris, a few weeks ago, after the performance, a charming woman, magnificently dressed, was descending the staircase, leaning on the arm of her cousin, dragging behind her a long train of primrose-colored silk, trimmed with flounces of rich Chantilly lace. A gentleman was clumsy enough to step on the trail of her dress. The lady leaned back, on feeling her progress arrested, but too late to prevent a slight crack from being heard. She gathered up her dress, without appearing to perceive that any thing had occurred; but her cavalier, assuming an air of importance, cast a look of defiance behind him, and muttered something in which the word "clumsy" was heard. "I will try and be less so to-morrow," whispered the innocent author of the accident, in his ear. Early the next morning, the cousin received a visit from his antagonist's second. A duel took place with swords, and, as the other had promised, he proved his address in the weapon. The cousin was carried home with an awkward wound in his shoulder. The stranger, however, obtained an introduction to the lady, and not only received her pardon for the unintentional mishap, but has since made such progress in her good graces that a marriage is now talked of as shortly to take place. As to the cousin, he still keeps his bed, and will probably remain in it until after the wedding.

In a private letter dated "Nice," a friend writes as follows: "This is a lazy country where we are now. Between rising and retiring there is just ample time to breakfast, take a walk, and dine. We rise about as at home, breakfast at nine, lunch on oranges, apples, or pears wherever we are, and dine at six. We find ourselves in this place—almost for the first time since we left England—in a hotel full of English and Americans. In one aspect it is very pleasant; but generally we prefer rather those native hotels where, although necessarily more secluded, we see more of the customs of the country, and speak more of its language. In the recollection we enjoy most those places where we have found landlady and servants innocent of English, and have sat down at table with French people alone.

"This town is half English, half French, and half Italian, being accordingly a town and a half strictly speaking. The old Italian town is a solid mass of lofty houses, with narrow cracks running through the mass, which are the streets. With a few exceptions the streets of this old town are too narrow for vehicles, and too deep to be heated by the sun. This queer old place is surrounded by the new streets, the grand hotels of the watering-place, and the numerous villas that have grown up in later times. The old town talks a species of Italian, and the new talks French and English. If you think that, with your ideas of women's rights, you are in advance of the age, you are, in one aspect, at least, mistaken. All the women here are 'out of their sphere' according to the arguments we often hear. They are the really industrious part of the population, and seem to be doing most of what is going on, while the benches and sunny corners of sunny places are occupied by the lounging and sleeping lords of creation. I suppose this is only a foretaste of Italy upon whose confines we are. Any one who regards—or rather is able to disregard—the 'lower classes' as a set of beasts of burden whose plight is not to be thought of, may enjoy himself hugely here, between the sea and the mountains, the gardens and the society; but to me, there is too much in the condition of the poor fellow-creatures to make it a very agreeable residence, unless one could be doing something for them. I should as soon think of building a mansion to live in at the Five Points as to make this region an abode for pleasure."

An American lady who visited Rome with a special desire of seeing the illustrious Liszt, and who was gratified by a cordial invitation to call upon him, thus describes his residence and himself:

"The old Convent of Santa Francesca Romana is situated in the immediate vicinity of the Coliseum and other ruins of imposing grandeur; it is a low building, with a small iron door, upon which is the name, 'L'Abbé Liszt,' and ascending one broad flight of stone steps, we came to the door of his apartment. There we met the footman, who showed us through a large ante-chamber, in which stands a grand piano, into the drawing-room. This is vast in size, and very handsomely furnished; in one corner stands an exquisite statuette of St. Elizabeth, and pictures and objets religieux adorn the walls.

"After waiting a few moments the Abbé entered, and advancing toward me welcomed me, extending both hands.

"Liszt is of medium height, slender, and erect. His face is fresh and unwrinkled; his large gray eyes have a reposeful calmness, except when playing impassioned music; then the whole face changes, the eyes sparkle and flash, the massive steel-gray hair trembles and shakes, and the head is thrown into a pose of striking grandeur—the whole reminding me of the imposing image of an inspired Numidian lion."

Chambers's Journal relates an anecdote of a lady who had advertised for a parlor-maid. The person who applied in answer to the advertisement appeared to be quite satisfactory, but the lady wishing to say something kind at parting, remarked: "I am sorry to see by your black dress that you have been in trouble lately." "Oh no, mum, thank you, not at all," replied the young woman; "it's only for my late missus. I have been particular fortunate in service, mum. My three last missuses have all died while I was with them; so I got mourning given me every time." It is hardly necessary to say that the young woman was not engaged.

The first act of a young Japanese bride after being conducted to her husband's home is to sacrifice her beauty by shaving her eye-brows, and painting her teeth black. By this strange custom she symbolizes to her husband and to strangers in the street that she has renounced completely every desire to please or coquet. Though sacredly observed while continuing, the marriage-tie of the Japanese is easily broken, the mutual consent of the contracting parties sufficing. Once in possession of the bit of paper by which the husband restores to the wife her liberty, she readily regains her lost beauty; two days enabling her to transform her teeth to their pristine pearly whiteness, and two months of nature giving back to her her beautiful dark eyebrows.

In Japan, the respect shown by the lower to the higher classes is extreme. And even between equals the forms of civility are excessive. When two officers or merchants meet in the street they stop still, and before passing exchange grave and profound bows. Even two friends who meet every day are careful never to neglect this ceremony. Among women these forms are still more emphasized. When a friend calls and is once seated on the mat, all bow their foreheads several times to the floor. The first words are thanks for some past service which they really or feignedly call to mind. Then the hostess fills, lights, wipes, and passes to the newcomer her little pipe, and along with it the inevitable cup of tea. It is taken without either milk or sugar. A delicate drink is made from an infusion of peach-blossoms, which is offered to favored guests.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. CORA JONES.—You will learn the fashion of making short piqué dresses from the New York Fashion Article in Harper's Bazar, No. 30. Long piqué dresses have gored trained skirts, cut in the manner described in the Bazar, and trimmed with bretteles on the waist, edged with narrow fringe, and braided in medallions with white braid. They are also trained in the robe fashion, or sweeping down from the front to define a tunic. Wide braids of mixed colors are used for trimming. Deep pointed cuffs are simulated on the coat-sleeve.

M. L. WALLEY.—Lockets, medallions, or crosses are generally suspended from the ribbon worn around the neck. Black or colored velvet ribbon is used.

Fig. 1. FORTUNIO.—Small paletot of black gros grain, rounded in front and cut up slightly behind, trimmed with a double bias fold of the same material bound with satin, and gros grain scallops bound with satin around the bottom. On the upper part of the paletot a passementerie ornament holds a broad sash of gros grain, which is tied in a large bow below the bottom of the paletot. The ends of the sash fall low down on the skirt, and are edged with scallops and fringe.

in front that are crossed in the same manner as a fichu. A belt passing over the basque gathers it slightly at the sides and in the back; this belt is of gros grain, without ends, and with a bow in the middle. A quilling of faille round the edge, and bias folds, and small bows of the same material form the trimming. Loose sleeves.

Fig. 3. DAUPHINESS.—Basquine of black poul de soie, with three pleats at the waist, trimmed round the edge with guipure lace and three bias folds of satin, and caught up at the sides by three large bows of poul de soie. Simulated capuchon of guipure, with satin fan-bow in the middle, from which fall two long ends of guipure. Tight sleeves.

Fig. 4. WATTEAU.—This novel style of Watteau paletot has a back and front but no sides. A round cape, trimmed with fringe and three rows of satin piping, with small bows, is worn over the paletot. The paletot is trimmed like the cape, with several rows of satin piping, terminated with small bows. A broad bias sash, the ends of which are trimmed with fringe, is knotted at the side over the paletot.

Fig. 5. REINE MARGOT.—Tight-fitting jacket of black poul de soie, simulating a vest in front, with five large basques in the form of scutcheons, trimmed with two bias folds of poul de soie and silk fringe. A passementerie ornament is set on the top of the two side basques; the shoulders are likewise trimmed with passementerie.

WHITE PUFFED LACE BONNET.

Fig. 6. PRINTANIERE.—This rich garment is composed of a mantilla, cut in large arched scallops, with three seams in the back, and falling straight in front, where it is adjusted to the waist by the aid of a small belt that fastens in front with a clasp. The paletot is completed by a richly embroidered cape, bordered with lace and knotted in the back, the ends forming a long sash which falls below the bottom of the paletot.

BONNET OF WHITE FIGURED LACE.—Scarf-strings, trimmed with white blonde. The trimming consists of white satin piping, forming a diadem as shown in the illustration, together with wheat, leaves, and grapes, which are set partly on the front and partly on the back of the bonnet. The scarf-strings are fastened together with a spray of flowers.

BLACK LACE BONNET WITH SPANISH MANTILLA.—These graceful mantillas are almost universally worn with bonnets in Paris; and, as will be seen from our correspondent's letter in another column, there is a fair prospect that bonnets will give way altogether to lace head-coverings. The front of the bonnet in the illustration is trimmed with a diadem formed of jet grelots and beads, with a cluster of dark red flowers at the right side. The mantilla is trimmed with black satin piping and blonde.

LEGHORN HAT.—This pretty hat is trimmed with satin braids of the same color, and yellow wild roses. A scarf of white lace, edged with blonde, is set on the back.

To Imitate Tortoise-Shell.

ARTICLES of ordinary horn may be made to imitate tortoise-shell very closely by being treated as follows:

Mix together in strong soap-suds a small quantity of quick-lime with the same amount of red-lead; give the horn a coat of it with a small brush, laying it on so as to imitate as nearly as possible the mottled look of the shell. Put on several coats, and let them remain several hours until the stain can penetrate the horn.

Litharge and quick-lime in equal quantities, with a little salt of tartar, to make it about as thick as paint, will have the same effect. When it has remained on sufficiently long to accomplish the design, it may be cleared off with water and polished.

FIVE YEARS OLD.

If you want to see a perfect type
Of a true and genuine boy,
With a love of fun and frolic,
And a wealth of sport and toy
Just look upon our Willie,
In his wild unfettered play,
And remember he is five years old—
But five years old to-day.

He was born amid the war-clouds
That rolled from hill to shore,
And cradled near the scenes of blood
Grim visaged battle bere;
But little knew he of the strife,
Of braves who bit the clay,
For he was but a baby then—
Though five years old to-day.

Above his tiny infant couch,
By day and through the night,
A banner hung in ruddy folds—
The stars and stripes in sight;
And often now he bears that flag
Where his little comrades play,
A noble patriot-boy is Will—
Just five years old to-day!

Far hence he'll read the story,
Of the contest fierce and wild,
That shook this mighty continent,
When he was but a child;
Now these be all forgotten,
In this brief natal day;
Our thoughts should be of merrier themes,
He's five years old to-day!

Be sure a happy life is his,
No cares his breast invade;
If shadows cross that sunny brow,
Like morning mists they fade;
His hours glide like the music
Of some merry roundelay,
Nor wonder when I tell you,
He's but five years old to-day!

Would that his onward path might be
Thus ever light with joy!
But years will come and go again,
And he no more a boy.
Manhood will bring its stern pursuits,
That leave no time for play,
What reck we of the future?
He's five years old to-day!

We know he has the qualities
To make him good and wise,
And from the level of the world
Amid the great to rise;
Then on the threshold of his years
Let us devoutly pray,
That God may bless our precious boy,
Just five years old to-day!

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, April 18, 1868.

THE EXTENSION GIANT.

I SUPPOSE you will think it very odd that my son Peter should be going about with an Extension Giant in his pocket. But this is the way that it happened:

Early one morning our maid came up with word that a strange gentleman wished to see me. "And a very strange gentleman he is," said Mollie. "When he was outside he was as tall as a house! and now he is inside, ma'am, he has just shut himself up into a little man as if he run on slides like a opera-glass. I never see the like, ma'am."

And true enough when I went down stairs I found the stranger trying to fit his size to our parlor, and raising and lowering himself by turns. But when he saw me he took off his hat, and made me a low bow.

"Your servant, Madam," said the Giant. "I want your son Peter."

"Want Peter!"

"Yes," said the Giant; "twice a year I visit all the children with bad habits of which nothing can cure them. And your chimney-elf, an old friend of mine, tells me that she heard you say the other day that your son Peter was so contrary that he spoiled all your pleasure, and that you could not teach him better."

Think of that!

And as I was trying to invent some excuse for Peter, who should come to the door but the child himself? If I had asked him to come in he would have run away! But as I said, "Run away, dear," he clung fast to the door-handle, and began to roar:

"I want to come in! I want to come in!"

And this is how he has an Extension Giant in his pocket—Peter, I mean. For instead of seizing Peter between his thumb and finger, and stepping up chimney, what should the Giant do but shut himself up smaller and smaller till at last he was no larger than your thumb!

And then he jumped into Peter's pocket.

He Is There Now.

And since he has been there the house is in a constant uproar; for Peter can not get him out. We have tried that! And then Peter pulled off the trowsers, and threw them out of window. But there was the misery of dealing with an Extension Giant, who had nothing to do but to stretch himself to his full height, open the second story window, throw in the trowsers, and step in after them! Try as Peter would, the Giant was still fast in his pocket, and what was yet more unfortunate, proved to be twice as contrary as Peter himself.

Just then, of all unlucky times, Uncle George came home from China, with plenty of little stone men and women, and carved ivory boxes, and a present for each of the children in his trunk.

But these presents were only to be delivered to the children that had been good. Fancy our Peter with an Extension Giant in his pocket.

"If he only would go away," sobbed Peter.

"But I am not going," answered the Giant, "and unless you do exactly as I wish, I will pop out of your pocket, and stretch myself full length before your Uncle George, and then he must hear my history. So remember!"

All this while we were running about for cloaks and overshoes, getting ready to meet Uncle George, Peter the briskest and most anxious of any of us, and dancing about on the steps in his hurry to be off.

But just as we were starting, "I am not going," growled the Giant. "It is too cold."

"Then I can change my trowsers," said Peter.

"No, you won't," cried the Giant. "Do you suppose that I will be left here all alone?"

"I will go," roared Peter.

Hearing a sobbing and crying, I ran back to see what was the matter. There was the Giant, with one leg in Peter's pocket, and one arm about his neck, while the other arm stretched up the steps to the handle of the door, by which he held fast.

So of course Peter could not stir, and when Uncle George asked, "Why did not little Peter come also?" I was obliged to answer, "It was not convenient."

All the time that we were away Peter spent in crying; but at last the Giant said to him, "I hear the carriage. You had better go up stairs and wash and dress yourself."

Peter went up stairs, and, having taken his bath, began to feel in better humor. He brushed his hair, he blacked his shoes, and then he took up his trowsers.

"But no," said the Giant, who sat on a chair, reading; "you can not put them on yet."

"Why not?" asked Peter.

"I have found an interesting story," answered the Giant. "Pray do not look so impatient. You should consider that it can not be very amusing to be carried about on your leg all day."

"Then I can put on the trowsers, and you can come when you like."

"No you won't," answered the Giant.

"We will see about that," cries Peter, picking up the trowsers in a rage; but lo! they were shut up, as tight as if they had been sewed, and he could not open them. Of course, then, he could not get into them.

Peter went to find another pair. "You need not disturb yourself," remarked the Giant, "I have the key of your clothes' closet in my pocket."

Peter sat down in his drawers and shoes and waited. The bell rang for dinner.

"Very funny! ha, ha!" exclaimed the Giant, laughing as he stopped to turn over a leaf.

The people went to dinner, and Peter could hear the clatter of dishes and the rattle of spoons and forks; but there sat the Giant, reading and laughing to himself still; and there sat Peter in his shoes and drawers. The people went away from dinner, and sat down in the parlor, and Peter could hear his Uncle George talk, and such words as "Porcelain Tower," "Pig Tails," "Shipwrecks."

My poor little Peter! the tears rolled down his cheeks. "You are an ugly, wicked, spiteful Giant," said Peter.

"Yes," said the Giant, "I always had a contrary nature. I am something like a little boy who always wanted to go out when his mamma and sisters wished to stay in, and always wanted to make a noise when they wished to be quiet, and always found fault with whatever pleased them."

Peter hung down his head, and the Giant shut up his book and hopped into Peter's trowsers' pocket. Oh, how glad was Peter, for he was so hungry! He might say that he flew down the stairs, and though the dinner was quite cold it tasted delicious.

"If that is so nice, I will try a mouthful myself," observed the Giant, stretching his neck out of Peter's trowsers' pocket, and proceeding to help himself.

"But I am in such a hurry," pleaded Peter.

"I have not seen Uncle George yet."

"And I am so hungry."

"Why do you always want something that just spoils what I want?" cried Peter, nearly beside himself as the Giant kept on eating and eating.

"I suppose because I am so contrary," answered the Giant, with his mouth full.

Peter groaned. Think of being obliged to stand before a table with a great, greedy, glutinous, tiresome Giant, who ate till Peter began to hope that he would never be able to get back in the pocket again. But there was no such comfort for Peter. When he had eaten the dinner of ten men the Giant shut himself up as small as ever and popped back again.

By this time it was quite dark, and Uncle George was telling the children such a delightful story that all the grown people could not help listening also. They were very still, for Uncle George had a weak voice and disliked a noise. So, of course, at the most interesting point, our Giant begins to rattle the marbles in Peter's pocket.

"S-s-h," said Peter.

"Shan't," said the Giant. "I don't care for the stupid story! I am having a nice game here."

Uncle George raised his voice, and gave Peter a vexed look.

The Giant dropped a marble from Peter's pocket. It fell and rolled on the marble hearth with a loud noise.

"Why can't you be quiet?" said Peter.

"I always had a contrary disposition," returned the Giant, clicking a slate-pencil on the table.

"I am surprised," said Peter's father, much disturbed by all this whispering and buzzing. "Peter, leave the room and go to bed."

Peter was very sorry not to hear the story, but the day had been so wretched that he thought he should be glad to go to sleep. But as he was getting down among the pillows something hit his nose. The Giant had rolled up his trowsers and thrown them at him.

"Let me alone," said Peter. "I am sleepy."

"I am not," replied the Giant. "I want some fun," and he pulled out the pillows from under Peter's head.

"Stop," said Peter.

Then the Giant began to shut himself up and stretch himself out so fast that it made Peter wink to see him, and he could not possibly go to sleep.

And then, making himself very small, he sat up on the bedpost, and tickled Peter's nose with a feather till Peter could hold his eyes open no longer, and fell asleep in spite of him.

Peter slept late. When he opened his eyes it was not only daylight, but the bell was ringing for breakfast. Peter attempted to get up, but something was in his way!—the Giant, stretched out at his longest, had curled himself all about the bed, and was snoring.

"Let me out," said Peter.

"Let me alone," answered the Giant.

"But I want to get up."

"And I choose to sleep."

"Oh, how disagreeable a contrary person is!" said Peter.

The Giant turned on his other side, and snored harder than ever. Nine o'clock! Ten o'clock! The sun shone in Peter's eyes. His head ached. He was so tired!

"Why did you not sleep last night when I was sleepy?" asked Peter. "Then you could get up when I am ready."

"Why when your mamma gives you an order do you always try to do something else?" returned the Giant. "Because you are contrary. Well, I am contrary."

Then he snored for another hour. And by that time Uncle George had gone, saying:

"I think little Peter has altered very much. He used to be fond of me, but I have scarcely seen him at all."

Poor Peter! his heart was full, but he was determined not to cry again for the "nasty Giant," as he called him; and getting a book he began to read. When he was nicely in the middle of the story the Giant began to shake him.

Peter took no notice.

"Come," said the Giant, "this won't do."

"What won't?"

"We must have a run out of doors."

"But it is cold. I want to read."

"I want fresh air."

"Go and get it, then," said Peter.

"Not without you," answered the Giant; but Peter continued to read.

The Giant sent Peter's book spinning out of his hand. Peter sat still in his chair. The Giant stuck one leg out of Peter's pocket, and began to spin around on it like a top; of course Peter could not help spinning around with him.

"Stop! I am dizzy!" cried Peter.

"Come out and walk, then."

So Peter went to walk with the Extension Giant. And whichever way he turned the Giant said, "No, we must take the other way."

And if Peter walked fast the Giant threw out one leg and dragged it, so that Peter could barely get on at all; but when Peter was tired the Giant said, continually, "Hurry, now. Do you suppose I want to be all day on the road?"

"What does ail you?" said Peter at last.

"Oh! I was always contrary, you know," answered the Giant.

Peter now noticed that they were walking in a street that he had never seen before.

"Where are we?" he asked the Giant.

"In a fine country for people like you and me," said the Giant. "This is the country where every thing is contrary. So take care of yourself."

"How take care?" asked Peter.

"Oh, you will see," replied the Giant, laughing.

Peter wondered very much how he would see. Just then he spied a fine hill covered with snow.

"Oh, I am so glad that I brought my sled," he cried, running up to the top, and giving himself a shove. The sled moved a little and stopped. The hill had suddenly flattened.

"What is the matter?" asked the Giant.

"Why, you can't think how it makes a fellow feel," said Peter.

"Oh yes, I can; or at least your mamma can. From your contrary nature you have disappointed her many a time, exactly like that. Not about sleds, to be sure, but when she was expecting something very nice from you."

They walked on till they reached a fine frozen pond. Peter began at once to buckle on his skates, but at his first step the ice suddenly dissolved, and Peter went down over his head in water, and would have drowned if the Giant had not caught him.

"How does any boy skate or slide here, I should like to know?" asked Peter, as he came out, sulky and dripping.

"Very few boys ever get the chance," said the Giant; "for here every grain of dust, and drop of water, and atom of air is so perfectly contrary that, as you see, the ice will dissolve if you only say you are going to skate. But the way in which the boys manage is this: If they have a sled they keep it covered till they are at the top of the hill, and then, before you can wink, they are down the hill like lightning. Just so with skates. You must turn your back and buckle on your skates, and then, if you are swift and sure on your skates, you may get across before the ice has time to dissolve. It is dangerous work, however, and no boy, unless he is brought up in the country, should ever attempt it. I have known a boy whose neck was broken on his sled. As he was half-way down the hill it flattened suddenly."

"What an uncomfortable country!" said Peter.

"Yes," answered the Giant. "Contrary things are always uncomfortable. But I am tired. Let us sit down on this bench."

Peter was willing enough to rest, but as he was sitting down the bench jumped from under him, and he came to the ground with a tremendous thump.

"Dear me!" said the Giant, "you should have popped down on it instantly."

"I call such a country mean!" cried Peter, getting up, red and angry. Just then he spied some fine flowers growing in the open window of a house near by. To hide his mortification Peter went up to peep in the window and smell the flowers, which sent out a delicious odor. But as he bent his head the flowers shut up flat, and ran a long thorn into his nose.

Peter turned away, ready to cry. "I am going home," he said.

At once the road, which lay straight before him, doubled, twisted, turned about, and ran in every direction.

"Now what are we to do?" exclaimed Peter, much frightened.

"Why, sit down and enjoy the pleasant sun," answered the Giant; and you would have thought that he had snuffed the sun out, so instantly did it disappear, leaving the sky covered with clouds.

"But if the sun pops out whenever any body likes it," said Peter, "how do they have any settled weather?"

"They never do have any," replied the Giant.

"A country of contraries is like a perverse person. You can never say what will happen in the next five minutes; and whatever you do you wish you had done something else! The way to manage is this. Say, I hope we shall have no sun. I dislike the heat. See! there it is out again. And when you are going on a journey you must name the opposite direction, and then your road will take you where you wish. We will not go home to-night, will we, Peter? See now! here we are at your mother's door!"

"But your atoms of dust and water are stupid," remarked Peter. "They are all the time being cheated."

"Exactly," said the Giant. "So is a contrary person."

The Extension Giant is still in Peter's pocket; but Peter has grown so much afraid of being "contrary" that I think we shall soon be rid of him.

THE HYGIENE OF BEAUTY.

IF the care and cultivation of personal beauty were merely a means of increasing human attractiveness, they would justly claim the consideration of us all; for it is our duty to make ourselves mutually agreeable. There is hardly Puritanism enough nowadays to deny this. It would be difficult, we suppose, to find another Mrs. Praise-God Barebones, who so grieved at the beauty of her daughter that she never ceased exhorting her to hang her head, poke out her neck, turn in her toes, and otherwise distort her naturally fair proportions, lest they might please the ungodly. If there are any such mothers extant we would remind them that health and good looks are so closely associated that it is almost impossible to have one without the other. Thus, while with the least natural affection they can not refuse our advice in regard to the former, they will be obliged to accept our counsels for the improvement of the latter.

The first great law of beauty, as of health, is cleanliness, which, moreover, being "next to godliness," is allied to piety. Moses and Mohammed both recommended frequent ablutions, and every good Mussulman not only prays, but washes five times a day. Pure water is the best of all agents of cleanliness. It should neither be very cold nor hot. It is most favorable to the beauty of the skin and complexion when lukewarm. A bath is taken daily by the wise, and should be by every person. Its temperature, when used for the toilette only, should not be more or less than 70° Fahrenheit. Rain or river water is the best, and soap is the only addition ordinarily required. After a bath of the proper kind the skin becomes softer, more flexible, sleek, and glossy. The body should always be rapidly and thoroughly dried, and a brisk walk or some active exercise or other for a few minutes afterward will be advantageous.

The various Russian and Turkish baths, and the whole so-called hydropathic system, the effect of all of which is to force the perspiration, are not favorable to the beauty of the skin. A simple vapor-bath, with moderate rubbing, may be allowed, but not the floods of hot steam, followed by dashes of ice-water, and the dislocating process of shampooing. The ancient practice of anointing the body after bathing with oil and perfumed unguents was favorable to the health and beauty of the skin, and might be revived with advantage. The Egyptians rub away the hard points with pumice-stone, and when moderately applied the effect seems good. There are various emollient and perfumed baths, which are in great favor with the luxurious. These are composed of oil, milk, butter-milk, or various aromatic herbs. The famous beauty of the Court of Napoleon I., Madame Tallien, was in the habit of bathing herself in strawberries and cream. The most serious objection to the use of milk and other drinkable and edible materials for the female bath is the chance of these being served to meet the demands of the public appetite after having satisfied the requirements of the private toilette. In fact, the milk used to lave the limbs of a luxurious Parisian dame, becoming the perquisite of her femme de chambre, was traced from the bathing-tub to the breakfast-table. The best of all emollient baths is that made of bran and water. Flax-seed is also a good ingredient. For an aromatic bath there is nothing better than lavender, which derives its name from this use. The French pâte d'amandes, made of almonds, ground rice,orris root, essence of lavender, cloves, etc., is often added by the Parisian dames to their baths, and its effect is highly appreciated by them.

There is nothing more unfavorable to female beauty than late hours. Women who, either from necessity or choice, spend most of the day in bed and the night at work or in dissipation, have always a pale, faded complexion, and darkly-rimmed and wearied eyes. Too much sleep is almost as hurtful as too little, and is sure to bloat the person with a pallid, unwholesome fat.

The diet has a marked influence upon personal beauty. Generous living is favorable to good looks, as it tends to fill out and give color and sleekness to the skin. A gross and excessive indulgence, however, in eating and drinking, is fatal to female charms, especially where there is a great tendency to "making flesh." Regularity of time in the daily repasts, and scientific cooking, are the best means of securing not only good health but good looks. The appetite should never be wasted during the intervals between meals on pastry, confectionery, or any other tickler of the appetite, which gratifies the taste but does not support the system. There is an old French saying, of the fifteenth century, to this effect:

"To rise at five, to dine at nine,
To sup at five, to sleep at nine,
Will make you live to ninety-nine."

This proverb, inasmuch as it inculcates early rising and early going to bed, with regularity of eating and drinking, is as worthy of acceptance now as ever.

Exercise is, of course, essential to personal beauty. It animates the whole physical life, quickens the circulation of the blood, heightens the color, develops the growth, and perfects the form of each limb and the entire body. It also gives elasticity and grace to every movement.

Swimming, which is so generally neglected by women, is one of the best possible exercises for growing girls. It requires a regularity of movement favorable to graceful development, especially of the chest and hips.

Dancing is also an excellent exercise, but not as it is generally practiced. Nothing, in fact, can be more hurtful to the health than the fashionable balls in overcrowded rooms, where the atmosphere is hot and pestilential, the excitement intense and sensual, and the indulgence in eating and drinking excessive and untimely. The dance, to be healthful, should be in the open air or in well-ventilated rooms, and should consist not of the stiff, mincing paces of the modern beau and belle, but of the hearty shake-downs and double-shuffles of their grandams and grand-sires.

The game of battle-door and shuttle-cock is good, and so is the croquet now in vogue; but both should be played always in the open air, and with an outdoor freshness of spirit, and not the tameness of drawing-room attitudes and manners.

Gymnastics, or calisthenics, as they are sometimes called, should be a branch of all education, and especially of that of girls. Anthropology, or in fact any other ology, is comparatively unimportant when compared with that art which is essential to the development of the physical vigor and beauty of woman. It was in the gymnasium where the Greek woman formed herself into that immortal model of graceful proportion which all admire and strive to imitate, but neither modern art nor nature can reach.

Walking is the most obvious mode of exercising the body, but is so embarrassed by the awkward drapery of fashion that it has become an artificial movement, which is by no means favorable to the grace and health of the body. The frame should be free of every constricting band or tight garment, and the foot covered with a shoe adapted to its natural shape, so as to admit of perfect ease of posture and facility of movement. With the form thus emancipated it should move in walking so briskly as to quicken the circulation, bring a good warmth to the skin, and a moderate perspiration. Horseback exercise is particularly favorable to female form, attitude, and grace. It is, moreover, held to be the best preventive of an excessive lustiness.

The chief rule in regard to dress is that it should never be worn so as to interfere with the natural action and movement of the body. All tight-fitting coverings which check the circulation of the blood, pain the acute sensibility of the nerves, and impede muscular motion, are injurious not only to health but to beauty of color as well as form. The Greeks and Romans seldom covered their heads; but this exposure is said to have favored a precocious furrowing of the forehead and corners of the eyes with wrinkles. We Americans are apt to keep our heads not only covered out of doors but indoors. This habit is particularly injurious to the hair, and is a common cause of baldness. The hat, bonnet, or cap, should be generally light, as, with the natural covering of the hair, the head does not require much additional protection. There should be always, although there is seldom or never, a front piece sufficiently wide to shade the eyes and upper part of the face. In putting on the child's hat or cap, care should be taken that the ears lie smooth under the rim—which, moreover, should never be stiff and hard. The practice of lining the hat with an impermeable stuff, such as oil-silk and varnished leather, is bad, as it prevents the evaporation of the perspiration, which, remaining on the skin and irritating it, frequently produces a redness of the forehead and sometimes ugly pimples. The baring of the face, shoulders, arms, and legs of young children, with a view of displaying their tender charms, is a great folly, and fatal to health and beauty. The fashionable full-dress of our dames, which seems to mean as scanty dress as possible, is neither modest, wholesome, nor favorable to feminine charms. The veil is an excellent article of apparel, not only as a protection against the winter's cold but the summer's heat, the dust, and the light. The kid glove is particularly favorable to the beauty of the skin of the hand, which it renders smooth and flexible. It should, however, not be worn as pinching as it generally is, with the view of giving the hand a false semblance of smallness. The fashionable shoe is altogether faulty. Its high and misplaced heel throws the toes forward and pinches them, weakens the arch of the foot, and gives a tottering step to the walk which becomes graceless, unsettles the balance of the body, and disfigures its form.

If women will wear corsets care should be taken to have them properly adapted to their natural forms. The pressure of a corset should be particularly slight where it is brought in contact with those organs which are the most sensible and the least resisting. Its elasticity should be so great that it does not oppose the least obstacle to the freest movement of the ribs and the dilatation of the stomach. Above it should be so full as to hold the breasts without compressing them; and there should be no shoulder-straps. The whalebones and the steel springs should be so numerous, thin, flexible, and well-placed, as not to press painfully any where or embarrass the free movement of the chest. Instead of the busk or corset-bone fixed in the centre, generally made of a broad and tough piece of inelastic wood, there should be two pieces of narrow whalebone, separated from each other by elastic tissue. The corset, moreover, should follow the line of the figure, and indicate, not counterfeit, the natural waist. Young girls should never be allowed to put on a pair of corsets before they have reached womanhood; and, when once assumed, care should be taken to adapt them to every change of development.

Finally, the best means of acquiring and preserving good looks is the proper culture of the understanding and affections. A quick intelligence and a gentle sentiment will be reflected purely in the coarsest medium, and endow the homeliest face with an attractiveness beyond that of all charms of mere form and complexion.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE Parisian world has recently been saddened by two cases of mental derangement in well-known men, beloved by a large circle of friends. One of these, Eugene Forcade, the distinguished critic of the Revue des deux Mondes, is still in a very alarming state of health. The other, the Deputy, Henri Didier, appeared a few days since, dressed as a Turk, at the house of M. Rouher, who saw at a glance that he was insane. He was sent at once to a lunatic asylum, where he received proper medical care, notwithstanding which he survived the frightful attack but a few days. M. Didier was unmarried, and possessed a large fortune. He left three million francs by will to the artiste, Madame Denain, formerly of the Comedie Française; three hundred thousand francs to Alexandre Dumas, fils; a hundred thousand francs to the celebrated writer, Edmond About; a hundred thousand francs to a lady friend; and twenty thousand francs to Victorien Sardou.

The Camp of St. Maur, just opened to the public, is about to become a resort for fair promenaders, like the Camp of Vincennes a few years ago. The encampment is occupied by native Zouaves from Algeria, commanded by General Bourbaki. Their Arab costumes, bronzed faces, and manners and customs so different from our own, excite much interest and curiosity.

As every thing at Paris is turned into an occasion for dress, camp toilettes are already in preparation for the promenades to St. Maur. These are composed of skirts of English worsted serge or cashmere, trimmed on the bottom with a pleated flounce. Over this skirt is worn a polonaise, in the Marie Leczinska style; that is, caught up at the sides by broad sash ends, surmounted by flat bows, and trimmed with passementerie set on in brandenburgs. The corsage is plain and high, and is open in front, showing a stomacher, unstarched, and usually with a frill. The sleeves are close, with cuffs trimmed on the top with passementerie. Some add aiguillettes of silk, fastened to the left shoulder, to this costume, which is usually of one color, oftenest of black, though lighter colors will probably be more worn as spring advances. Black, however, was never so much in vogue as it has been for some time past, and now black mantelets are reappearing, the necessary accompaniment to the mantillas, the indispensable appendage to all bonnets.

The truth of this was evident on Easter Sunday, at the chapel of the Tuileries, where, after mass, was celebrated the baptism of two children whose fathers are the representatives of the new and old French aristocracy. One was the son of Marshal Canrobert; the other, of the Duke de Montmorency de Talleyrand-Périgord. The Emperor and Empress had consented to be the godfather and godmother of the two illustrious babes. The Empress wore a dress of pearl-gray silk with long train, flounced behind but not in front, a black lace shawl and bonnet, with black and white aigrette.

Prince Murat lately gathered together the most select portion of the official world to celebrate the betrothal of his son, M. Achille Murat, to the Princess of Mingrelia, whose beauty attracted such attention last winter at the court balls. The frequenters of the court must have often remarked the Dowager Princess, who is still possessed of great beauty, and who wears magnificent jewels, especially a diamond and emerald serpent of prodigious value, worn according to the dress as a necklace, belt, or diadem. The young princess is extremely pretty. She is tall and slender, with large black eyes, magnificent hair, and that regularity of features which characterizes the Caucasian race to which she belongs. Her brother is likewise very remarkable for his beauty, which is set off by the Mingrelia uniform of white cloth, belted round the waist, with close-fitting pantaloons and high boots.

On this brilliant occasion the toilettes were magnificent. I cite as specimens those of the Countess d'Orbe and her daughter. The Countess wore a dress of black lace, caught up as a tunic over black satin, with yellow Persian roses and beetle green leaves. The immense train behind, with a flounce of black lace, sloped on each side from under broad sash ends which fell from the waist. The corsage was décolletée, very low in the middle of the front, where it disclosed a black satin bodice, covered with Brazilian topazes, forming flowers with leaves of green enamel. The coiffure was a pouf of yellow roses, confined by a topaz agrafe.

The young girl's toilette was as fresh as her twenty summers—a dress of white tulle bouillonnée en nuage, with large puffings of tulle, caught up by three bias folds of green silk, in the middle of which were fastened three bias folds of tulle. This sash surrounded a beautiful cluster of eglantines of different colors, which formed, as it were, a large cockade on the skirt about the height of the knee. Very small clusters of eglantine, inserted in the puffings of the panniers, seemed to fasten them to the skirt. The Watteau corsage, somewhat high on the shoulders and square in front and behind, was of white puffed tulle, with a narrow piping of green silk around the puffs. A bouquet was fastened at the side near the left shoulder. White blonde, rather high and à pied droit—that is, standing up at the sides on the shoulder instead of falling in the form of a bertha—surrounded the waist. This manner of wearing lace is quite new, as well as the large round crowns with a high diadem which many ladies wore at Prince Murat's assembly. These are the invention of Leroy, now the Empress's hair-dresser, who made her wear a crown of this sort, composed of violets and diamonds, when she was lately in half mourning.

The Empress has greatly contributed to the abandonment of the bonnet, which is giving way more and more for the mantilla, as is very natural on the part of a Spanish sovereign. In the ceremonies of Passion-Week she even absolutely prohibited bonnets. At the grand concert which took place on Good Friday in the chapel of the Tuileries all the ladies were required to attend with the head covered with a black veil, as is done at Rome when one goes to the Vatican for the ceremonies of the funzioni (Funzioni of St. Peter at Rome). It is very probable that nothing but mantillas will be worn before long. The bonnets are already accompanied with lace mantelets, which fall on the waist, crossing in front, and furnished with tabs that tie behind like a ceinture pans.

The Prince Imperial is expected to-morrow. He returns to Paris after visiting Cherbourg, where he was cordially welcomed, it is said, by the fleet and the people. He could not have seen much of the latter, save their backs and their faces, for he was constantly surrounded by so numerous a staff that he always seemed walking amidst a crowd. He has just made his first communion, and entered his thirteenth year. He is a child of delicate appearance, small for his age, fair haired, pale, and very much freckled; with large and beautiful light-blue eyes, and an air of great gentleness. He still limps, slightly. At Paris he is usually dressed in the Breton costume, entirely of black velvet; a full round jacket, full breeches reaching to the knees, red or violet stockings, and kid gaiters or shoes, trimmed with bows. On his journey to Cherbourg he wore the uniform of a sergeant of the Imperial Guard, which was not nearly so becoming to him as a dress more suited to his age.

GASTRONOMY.

SAVOY CAKE.—To make this cake with a hot mixture of the ingredients: Take one pound of loaf-sugar, powdered, one pint of good eggs, and fourteen ounces of flour. Warm a pan, free from grease, with the sugar in it in the oven until you can scarcely bear your hand against it; then take it out and pour in the eggs; whisk the whole together with a birch or wire whisk until it is quite light and cold, when it will be white and thick. If it should not whisk up well, warm it again and beat it as before; or it may be beat over the stove-fire until it is of the warmth of new milk. When it is finished, sift the flour and stir it in lightly with a spoon, adding a few drops of essence of lemon to flavor it. Butter some tin or copper moulds regularly, so that there is not more on one place than another, nor too thick either, with rather less on the top of the mould than the sides. Dust it with loaf-sugar sifted through a lawn sieve. Knock out all that does not adhere, and again dust it with fine flour; turn it out and knock the mould on the board as before. Tie or pin a piece of buttered paper round the mould, so as to come two or three inches above the bottom. Fix the mould in a stand and nearly fill it. Bake in a moderate oven. When done, the top should be firm and dry. Try it by pushing in a small piece of stick or whisk, and if it comes out dry, it is done. The surface of the cake should be quite smooth. There is as much art in buttering the mould properly as in preparing the mixture, if not more.

RICE BREAD.—Boil a quarter of a pound of rice till quite soft, put it on a sieve to drain, when cold mix it well with three-quarters of a pound of flour and a spoonful of yeast; let it stand for three hours to rise, then knead it up, and roll it in about a handful of flour so as to make it dry enough to put in the oven: about an hour and a quarter will bake it. It should not be cut till a day or two old, and then looks like a honey-comb.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE MALAY'S VENGEANCE.

SOME hours afterward Despard called Brandon outside the cottage, and walked along the bank which overhung the beach. Arriving at a point several hundred yards distant from the cottage he stopped. Brandon noticed a deeper gloom upon his face and a sterner purpose on his resolute mouth.

"I have called you aside," said Despard, "to say that I am going on a journey. I may be back immediately. If I do not return, will you say to any one who may ask"—and here he paused for a moment—"say to any one who may ask, that I have gone away on important business, and that the time of my coming is uncertain."

"I suppose you can be heard of at Holby, in case of need."

"I am never going back again to Holby."

Brandon looked surprised.

"To one like you," said Despard, "I do not object to tell my purpose. You know what it is to seek for vengeance. The only feeling that I have is that. Love, tenderness, affection, all are idle words with me."

"There are three who pre-eminently were concerned in my father's death," continued Despard. "One was Cigole. The Carbonari have him. Langhetti tells me that he must die, unless he himself interposes to save him. And I think Langhetti will never so interpose. Langhetti is dying—another stimulus to vengeance."

"The one who has been the cause of this is Clark, another one of my father's murderers. He is in the hands of the law. His punishment is certain."

"There yet remains the third, and the worst. Your vengeance is satisfied on him. Mine is not. Not even the sight of that miscreant in the attitude of a bereaved father could for one moment move me to pity. I took note of the agony of his face. I watched his grief with joy. I am going to complete that joy. He must die, and no mortal can save him from my hands."

The deep, stern tones of Despard were like the knell of doom, and there was in them such determinate vindictiveness that Brandon saw all remonstrance to be useless.

He marked the pale sad face of this man. He saw in it the traces of sorrow of longer standing than any which he might have felt about the manuscript that he had read. It was the face of a man who had suffered so much that life had become a burden.

"You are a clergyman," said Brandon at length, with a faint hope that an appeal to his profession might have some effect.

Despard smiled cynically.

"I am a man," said he.

"Can not the discovery of a sister," asked Brandon, "atone in some degree for your grief about your father?"

Despard shook his head wearily.

"No," said he, "I must do something, and only one purpose is before me now. I see your motive. You wish to stop short of taking that devil's life. It is useless to remonstrate. My mind is made up. Perhaps I may come back unsuccessful. If so—I must be resigned, I suppose. At any rate you know my purpose, and can let those who ask after me know, in a general way, what I have said."

With a slight bow Despard walked away, leaving Brandon standing there filled with thoughts which were half mournful, half remorseful.

On leaving Brandon Despard went at once to the inn. The crowd without had dwindled away to half a dozen people, who were still talking about the one event of the day. Making his way through these he entered the inn.

The landlord stood there with a puzzled face, discussing with several friends the case of the day. More particularly he was troubled by the sudden departure of the old man, who about an hour previously had started off in a great hurry, leaving no directions whatever as to what was to be done with the body up stairs. It was this which now perplexed the landlord.

Despard listened attentively to the conversation. The landlord mentioned that Potts had taken the road to Brandon. The servant who had been with the young man had not been seen. If the old man should not return what was to be done?

This was enough for Despard, who had his horse saddled without delay and started also on the Brandon road. He rode on swiftly for some time, hoping to overtake the man whom he pursued. He rode, however, several miles without coming in sight of him or of any one like him. At last he reached that hollow which had been the scene of his encounter with Clark. As he descended into it he saw a group of men by the road-side surrounding some object. In the middle of the road was a farmer's wagon, and a horse was standing in the distance.

Despard rode up and saw the prostrate figure of a man. He dismounted. The farmers stood aside and disclosed the face.

It was Potts.

Despard stooped down. It was already dusk; but even in that dim light he saw the coils of a thin cord wound tightly about the neck of this victim, from one end of which a leaden bullet hung down.

By that light also he saw the hilt of a weapon which had been plunged into his heart, from which the blood had flowed in torrents.

It was a Malay creese. Upon the handle was carven a name:

JOHN POTTS.

CHAPTER LIX.

Δεῦτε τελευταῖον ἄσπασμον ὄωμεν.

THE excitement which had prevailed through the village of Denton was intensified by the arrival there of the body of the old man. For his mysterious death no one could account except one person.

That one was Brandon, whom Despard surprised by his speedy return, and to whom he narrated the circumstances of the discovery. Brandon knew who it was that could wield that cord, what arm it was that had held that weapon, and what heart it was that was animated by sufficient vengeance to strike these blows.

Despard, finding his purpose thus unexpectedly taken away, remained in the village and waited. There was one whom he wished to see again. On the following day Frank Brandon arrived from London. He met Langhetti with deep emotion, and learned from his brother the astonishing story of Edith.

On the following day that long-lost sister herself appeared in company with Mrs. Thornton. Her form, always fragile, now appeared frailer than ever, her face had a deeper pallor, her eyes an intenser lustre, her expression was more unearthly. The joy which the brothers felt at finding their sister was subdued by an involuntary awe which was inspired by her presence. She seemed to them as she had seemed to others, like one who had arisen from the dead.

At the sight of her Langhetti's face grew radiant—all pain seemed to leave him. She bent over him, and their wan lips met in the only kiss which they had ever exchanged, with all that deep love which they had felt for one another. She sat by his bedside. She seemed to appropriate him to herself. The others acknowledged this quiet claim and gave way to it.

As she kissed Langhetti's lips he murmured faintly:

"I knew you would come."

"Yes," said Edith. "We will go together."

"Yes, sweetest and dearest," said Langhetti. "And therefore we meet now never to part again."

She looked at him fondly.

"The time of our deliverance is near, oh my friend."

"Near," repeated Langhetti, with a smile of ecstasy—"near. Yes, you have already by your presence brought me nearer to my immortality."

Mrs. Thornton was pale and wan; and the shock which she felt at the sight of her brother at first overcame her.

Despard said nothing to her through the day, but as evening came on he went up to her and in a low voice said, "Let us take a walk."

Mrs. Thornton looked at him earnestly, and then put on her bonnet. It was quite dark as they left the house. They walked along the road. The sea was on their left.

"This is the last that we shall see of one another, Little Playmate," said Despard, after a long silence. "I have left Holby forever."

"Left Holby! Where are you going?" asked Mrs. Thornton, anxiously.

"To join the army."

"The army!"

"Little Playmate," said Despard, "even my discovery of my father's death has not changed me. Even my thirst for vengeance could not take the place of my love. Listen—I flung myself with all the ardor that I could command into the pursuit of my father's murderers. I forced myself to an unnatural pitch of pitilessness and vindictiveness. I set out to pursue one of the worst of these men with the full determination to kill him. God saved me from blood-guiltiness. I found the man dead in the road. After this all my passion for vengeance died out, and I was brought face to face with the old love and the old despair. But each of us would die rather than do wrong, or go on in a wrong course. The only thing left for us is to separate forever."

"IT WAS POTTS."

"Yes, forever," murmured Mrs. Thornton.

"Ah, Little Playmate," he continued, taking her hand, "you are the one who was not only my sweet companion but the bright ideal of my youth. You always stood transfigured in my eyes. You, Teresa, were in my mind something perfect—a bright, brilliant being unlike any other. Whether you were really what I believed you mattered not so far as the effect upon me was concerned. You were at once a real and an ideal being. I believed in you, and believe in you yet."

"I was not a lover; I was a devotee. My feelings toward you are such as Dante describes his feelings toward his Beatrice. My love is tender and reverential. I exalt you to a plane above my own. What I say may sound extravagant to you, but it is actual fact with me. Why it should be so I can not tell. I can only say—I am so made."

"We part, and I leave you; but I shall be like Dante, I suppose, and as the years pass, instead of weakening my love they will only refine it and purify it. You will be to me a guardian angel, a patron saint—your name shall always mingle with my prayers. Is it impious to name your name in prayer? I turn away from you because I would rather suffer than do wrong. May I not pray for my darling?"

"I don't know what to do," said Mrs. Thornton, wearily. "Your power over me is fearful."

Lama, I would do any thing for your sake. You talk about your memories; it is not for me to speak about mine. Whether you idealize me or not, after all, you must know what I really am."

"Would you be glad never to see me again?"

The hand which Despard held trembled.

"If you would be happier," said she.

"Would you be glad if I could conquer this love of mine, and meet you again as coolly as a common friend?"

"I want you to be happy, Lama," she replied. "I would suffer myself to make you happy."

She was weeping.—Despard folded her in his arms.

"This once," said he, "the only time, Little Playmate, in this life."

She wept upon his breast.

"Τελευταῖον ἄσπασμον ὄωμεν," said Despard, murmuring in a low voice the opening of the song of the dead, so well known, so often sung, so fondly remembered—the song which bids farewell to the dead when the friends bestow the "last kiss."

He bent down his head. Her head fell. His lips touched her forehead.

She felt the beating of his heart; she felt his frame tremble from head to foot; she heard his deep-drawn breathing, every breath a sigh.

"It is our last farewell," said he, in a voice of agony.

Then he tore himself away, and, a few minutes later, was riding from the village.

CHAPTER LX.

CONCLUSION.

A MONTH passed. Despard gave no sign. A short note which he wrote to Brandon announced his arrival at London, and informed him that important affairs required his departure abroad.

The cottage was but a small place, and Brandon determined to have Langhetti conveyed to the Hall. An ambulance was obtained from Exeter, and on this Langhetti and Edith were taken away.

On arriving at Brandon Hall Beatrice found her diary in its place of concealment, the memory of old sorrows which could never be forgotten. But those old sorrows were passing away now, in the presence of her new joy.

And yet that joy was darkened by the cloud of a new sorrow. Langhetti was dying. His frail form became more and more attenuated every day, his eyes more lustrous, his face more spiritual. Down every step of that way which led to the grave Edith went with him, seeming in her own face and form to promise a speedier advent in that spirit-world where she longed to arrive. Beside these Beatrice watched, and Mrs. Thornton added her tender care.

Day by day Langhetti grew worse. At last one day he called for his violin. He had caused it to be sent for on a previous occasion, but had never used it. His love for music was satisfied by the songs of Beatrice. Now he wished to exert his own skill with the last remnants of his strength.

Langhetti was propped up by pillows, so that he might hold the instrument. Near him Edith reclined on a sofa. Her large, lustrous eyes were fixed on him. Her breathing, which came and went rapidly, showed her utter weakness and prostration.

Langhetti drew his bow across the strings.

It was a strange, sweet sound, weak, but sweet beyond all words—a long, faint, lingering tone, which rose and died and rose again, bearing away the souls of those who heard it into a realm of enchantment and delight.

That tone gave strength to Langhetti. It was as though some unseen power had been invoked and had come to his aid. The tones came forth more strongly, on firmer pinions, flying from the strings and towering through the air.

The strength of these tones seemed to emanate from some unseen power; so also did their meaning. It was a meaning beyond what might be intelligible to those who listened—a meaning beyond mortal thought.

Yet Langhetti understood it, and so did Edith. Her eyes grew brighter, a flush started to her wan cheeks, her breathing grew more rapid.

The music went on. More subtle, more penetrating, more thrilling in its mysterious meaning, it rose and swelled through the air, like the song of some unseen ones, who were waiting for newcomers to the Invisible land.

Suddenly Beatrice gave a piercing cry. She rushed to Edith's sofa. Edith lay back, her marble face motionless, her white lips apart, her eyes looking upward. But the lips breathed no more, and in the eyes there no longer beamed the light of life.

At the cry of Beatrice the violin fell from Langhetti's hand, and he sank back. His face was turned toward Edith. He saw her and knew it all.

He said not a word, but lay with his face turned toward her. They wished to carry her away, but he gently reproved them.

"Wait!" he murmured. "In a short time you will carry away another also. Wait."

They waited.

An hour before midnight all was over. They had passed—those pure spirits, from a world which was uncongenial to a fairer world and a purer clime.

They were buried side by side in the Brandon vaults. Frank then returned to London. Mrs. Thornton went back to Holby. The new rector was surprised at the request of the lady of Thornton Grange to be allowed to become organist in Trinity Church. She offered to pension off the old man who now presided there. Her request was gladly acceded to. Her zeal was remarkable. Every day she visited the church to practice at the organ. This became the purpose of her life. Yet of all the pieces two were performed most frequently in her daily practice, the one being the Agnus Dei; the other, the τελευταῖον ἄσπασμον of St. John Damascene. Peace! Peace!

Was that cry of hers unavailing? Of Despard nothing was known for some time. Mr. Thornton once mentioned to his wife that the Rev. Courtenay Despard had joined the Eleventh Regiment, and had gone to South Africa. He mentioned this because he had seen a paragraph stating that a Captain Despard had been killed in the Kaffir war, and wondered whether it could be any possibility be their old friend or not.

At Brandon Hall, the one who had been so long a prisoner and a slave soon became mistress.

The gloom which had rested over the house was dispelled, and Brandon and his wife were soon able to look back, even to the darkest period of their lives, without fear of marring their perfect happiness.

"SHE WAS WEeping. DESPARD FOLDED HER IN HIS ARMS."

"LANGHETTI DREW HIS BOW ACROSS THE STRINGS."

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER I.

"What you wants, my little sister, is to git religion—Jesus he come bimeby! Go look into de church-yard—see de little graves, Some no longer dan you an' I; Den jump into de chariot and ride right along—Jump into de chariot and ride right along."

"What you wants, my ole massa, is to git religion—Jesus he come bimeby! Don't wait for de corn git ripe in de fall, Oh, p'raps neber you come at all! Too late when de angel stand in de sky, And blow wid de trumpet—Ride right along, Jump into de chariot, and ride right along."

"What shall poor sinnahs do When de moon turn into blood? Oh, jump into de chariot and ride right along! No more mornin' calls for me, No more drivers' horns, But jump into de chariot and ride right along—Ride right along!"

The singer was a middle-aged, motherly mulatto woman, sitting in the pleasant spring sunshine on the low door-step of an old Kentucky home, in the Valley of the Cumberland. A brilliant tartan shawl, luxurious and ample as the heaviest rose-blanket, draped the threshold beside her, its fringes trailing on the bright young grass; and on the shawl, with her golden curls straying over the woman's lap, lay a child whose large soft eyes wondered lovingly at the sky, with whose liquid blue tenderness and breezy May-morn chase of sunlight following cloud they were akin. A little girl of seven years, fresher than the young grass, brighter than the shining air—in every limb, and pulse, and motion fuller of sorrowless grace and sinless abandon than the new-born breeze which momentarily lifted her curls with innocent toying finger to show the sun how beautiful a playmate the Lord had given it in its hour-old holiday.

From this lovely picture, framed between the oaken door-posts of an ancient homestead's long low southern wing, with a back-ground of snow-floored kitchen and polished household tins, the bright new grass sloped in a natural lawn three furlongs down to the mossy rocks and lithe pale osiers cradling Garnet Run—a tributary to the Cumberland—whose stream laughed into snow and crystals on its broad shining shallows, dreamed in winy shadow over its deeper pools, and was the pride, the tutelary genius, the proprietary boundary, of the Dalmager demesne.

The threshold which held the dusky singer and her fair little charge was a sunny island in a sea of caressing shade, whose tide fell and lifted as the breeze lay hushed, drinking charmed odors from the pink alabaster chalices of the great magnolias upreared above the lawn, or swept their glossy leaves into a tremor hurrying on for inspirations no less sweet from the bosoms of climbing Virgin-roses, which made the house-wall seem built of blossom; the twining jasmine's golden censurers which swung on living chains of tendril from the topmost finger-tips of stately live-oaks, like benediction thuribles from priest to prince, to the kingly-appareled red-buds further down. Behind the house a dense woodland went billowing upward and away toward the blue horizon-line of a distant mountain-chain. To the right and the left a rolling meadow country threaded, with frequent water-glances, by the Garnet Run, bared a broad bosom to caressing wind and sun. Before the singer and the child, on many a fairy cascade, the ever-young stream was prattling in a silver tongue yet unlearned of man though old as Eden. From far a-field on either side came the tinkle of many a bell, the lowing of happy herds, and the bleating of simple sheep. Out of the inmost forest heart in the upland the thrush and the mocking-bird gurgled and pealed excess of joy. The glory and the peace of God welled every where—fell from the heavens—made fountains from the earth—and floated through all the air around. They came in music, in light, in perfume. Ear-gate, eye-gate—every door of sense was opened to them. It was a day to make the Sybarite forget that any other heaven was promised—the holy soul to pant with a passion of longing for the heaven which shall be whose antepast it was.

Yet in the middle morning of a glory and a peace like this, in that plaintive negro minor which is the very native voice of tears, the song of the nurse Kledda sounded above the pure child face that looked from her lap out of a golden halo of curls—

"What shall poor sinnahs do-o-o-o When de moon turn into blood?"

"Kledda," said the little girl, the far-away look suddenly leaving her eyes as for the first time she fixed them on the nurse, and gave her words the attention she had been wondering bestowing on the sky, "Kledda, will the moon turn into blood to-day?"

Kledda hugged the child to her bosom with an expression of surprise, as if the little one's earnestness of understanding had only just awakened her to the full meaning of a negro hymn she had been singing in part at least by rote and mechanically, as a sort of plaintive pastime and lullaby substitute.

"Into blood—to-day—Miss Lily? Can't tell, my darlin' sweet! De good Lord know his own time!"

"Does grandpa know, Kledda?"

Kledda shuddered, caught Lily closer, and showed pallor even in her dusky cheeks as she kissed the golden halo of hair with a passionate tenderness, answering,

"Oh, sweet Miss Lily dear, don't ask me such questions as dem. How can I tell, my darlin'?"

"Oughtn't grandpa to know, Kledda?" continued Lily, in her earnestness rising to kneel by her nurse's lap, and searching the simple yellow face with her sincere, sweet eyes, "Oughtn't he, Kledda?"

"Why, dear Missy; why, my darlin'?"

"They didn't think I heard them, Kledda—I'm a very little girl, and papa says there are many, many things must be kept from me—but I couldn't help hearing the Doctor and the minister this morning, when Mr. Pulpiduster got into the Doctor's gig to get a ride home after they'd both been in there—to see—Him." And with a childish awe, which had none of Kledda's terror in it, Lily pointed as she spoke the last word to the farther window in the wall of roses, where the breeze fanning back a snowy curtain showed a row of various-colored vials and cups, with spoons standing on the sill.

"Oh, my darlin', dat was oo pooah Kledda's fault! Don't know what missus do to me, she know I let you heal dem tings. Don't mean notin', Miss Lily, honey! Don't tink notin' about it, p'ecious bird! Want to go down to de run see if we can't catch a little fish, honey?" Kledda shuddered again, but restrained herself, and rose as though to lead her little mistress to the brook.

"No, Kledda," answered the child, shaking her curls as she also stood up with an air of gentle decision, "I want to stay here till the Lord comes for grandpa. I heard them say he was coming right away. Mr. Pulpiduster said, 'Doctor, won't there be one more chance to speak to him about his precious soul?' Then the Doctor said, 'You can speak to him all you like, but he'll never hear you again, and never answer you either; he's heard your last sermon, reverend.' Mr. Pulpiduster put his hands over his face—so—and I thought he was going to cry, Kledda, but he didn't; he only made a noise, so"—(the little child as yet knew only the sound, not the name, of the groans which bitter life wrings from older hearts)—"and then he said, 'Will God come for him to-day, d'ye think, Doctor?' And oh, Kledda, wasn't it naughty for the Doctor to do so? he laughed, right by poor grandpa's window, and said, 'Well, either God or t'other fellow.' But I know it's God that's coming to-day; and who's t'other fellow, Kledda?"

Kledda trembled from head to foot, but tried still to draw her young mistress away. "Oh, blessed honey, do come—come, my precious darlin'!"

"Not till God does," answered the little girl, firmly. "I want to see him when he comes. I want to see the moon turn into blood, too; but I can't, Kledda, you know, because it's day-time. Sit down, Kledda—that's a good girl—and let me put my head in your lap again, so I can look up and watch the sky. You needn't look if it scares you—I'll tell you in time for you to see."

Still shaking with terror, and longing to leave the house, as if it were haunted, the woman resumed her seat on the threshold with the passive obedience of her race. The golden hair flowed over her lap again, and the beautiful eyes for a long time looked silently up into their resembling heaven, while the nurse covered, moaning and rocking herself to and fro.

At length the cloudy chase which hurried across the firmament took to the little watcher's eyes another shape than the strange mountains, towers, beasts, birds, and faces which she had been imagining to herself all the morning—the shape as of some vast chariot whose path streamed with rays, whose ponderous wheels ever dissolved and redissolved, but steadfastly renewed themselves and rolled. There was one spot of unbearable brightness in the centre of the mass, which made the intent baby-eyes weep and close despite themselves.

"God is coming," said the child, solemnly, but without fear, and stood up. "Look!" and she pointed to the zenith.

Kledda cast one quick glance where the tiny finger pointed, gave a bitter wail, and fell on her knees with her face in her hands—her simple nature utterly overpowered by the younger but stronger mind, so magnetic in its full solemnity of credence.

"Don't be afraid, Kledda. I'll stay by you till He goes! Pray for grandpa, Kledda! Pray to God, Kledda. You know Him. I'll pray to dear Jesus. I know Him. Mamma says he loves little children. Dear Jesus! O dear Jesus, don't let the moon turn into blood, if God takes grandpa out any where where 'tisn't day-time!"

She dropped on her knees on the door-sill beside her nurse. There suddenly came a sound of rolling wheels at the lawn entrance, many rods off to the right.

"There He comes! I hear the gate shut! Keep praying, Kledda; the wheels are coming up the road!"

And in the pure courage of one whose angel always beholding our Father's face, fears not herself to see him, the little girl stood up, looking with innocent, wide-open eyes toward the approaching chariot. Long and patiently she looked—then, as the wheels stopped before the porch, with a voice in which tenderness for a grandfather whom she scarcely knew contended with disappointment at not beholding the Father she most burned to see, she said, patting Kledda on the shoulder:

"Get up, Kledda. He hasn't come yet for grandpa after all. It's only the Doctor back again."

Dr. Dalmager's boy fastened his horses to the tie-post, and the Doctor himself leaped down on the gravel-walk which led to the porch. He had promised Lily Kearney's father that he would return to spend the last day by the old man's bedside as soon as he had paid a necessary visit in the neighboring market village of Owlville. He knew this would be the last day; yet it was so beautiful that he might be pardoned for the few moments which he lingered outside the porch, casting those deep, dreamy black eyes of his over the woods and fields which had never been lovelier than to-day in all the hundred years during which they had been called the Dalmager demesne—never, surely, during the later years in which he had learned to expect that the estate would some time be his own. Old Reuben Dalmager had been the largest land-owner in this corner of Kentucky; and this, of all, had been his favorite, because it was his ancestral holding. But the love of money had grown faster in him than the love of land, and five years ago he had parted with the demesne called "Dalmager's" par excellence to a New England capitalist nearly as old as himself, who, with no more accountable reason than having the money to spend, had become possessed, in his senility, of the desire to cover with his name rather more of the earth than should finally suffice to hold him. So far as the neighbors were concerned the terms of the transfer had been obscure. Old Reuben Dalmager was a man who communicated his counsels to no one—not even to his only son. Seibert Kearney had come to the Cumberland with nothing but his money to introduce him. After he entered on the Dalmager demesne he lived entirely alone—no kith nor kin ever visiting him—tended only by the servants who had been passed over to him with the estate. The deed which gave him the Garnet Run property had been entered in the nearest books of record—but had been so expressed that a Philadelphia lawyer would have been required to determine whether the act amounted to a full passage of title, a lease for a term with conditions attached, or the more familiar transaction of a sale, part cash and the remainder bond and mortgage. While the wise heads of the district were busying themselves with these questions—dividing themselves into two parties, one of which, from many years' experience with peddlers, held that a Yankee was a match for the devil, and the other, out of the depths of its own consciousness, that a Kentucky family, by divine right, could never be cheated—Derrick Dalmager came home from a six-years' residence in Paris, during which he had learned many secrets of the world's metropolis besides those which are comprehended in the Hôtel Dieu, and, within five months after his father, old Reuben Dalmager, had died. Thus far nobody had solved the problem—though the better opinion seemed to be that Seibert Kearney had taken the property in fee and was to pay its price in installments. Derrick Dalmager, uniting the nerve and verve of the hunter with the nonchalant wit and endless power of entertaining which belong to the finished man of society, was so popular at once that, when he opened a doctor's office in Owlville, all the young girls, old maids, and old men within ten miles radius would rather have died in his hands than be cured in a matter-of-fact way by other physicians. He inherited enough of the old man's reticence to satisfy nobody on the subject of the Garnet Run estate. Yet those who knew him best were sure that he was deeply chagrined at the fact of its having passed out of the family hands. The year after the old man's death saw a great change in Derrick. He never lost the peculiar family characteristic of inscrutableness. He was always himself—always wide-awake to the business in hand—always silent about his own affairs. He fell into the habits of the society about him; perhaps it would be juster to say that he grafted those of the Latin Quarter on a Kentucky stock. He had always loved wine and intrigue; he was dashing and handsome enough to have been a heart-breaker any where, and possessed one of those exceptional nervous systems which can rise from a night's debauch to perform without a tremor the most delicate manipulations of the surgical amphitheatre. His professional ambition and the necessity of sustaining the dignity of the Dalmager name in a county where every body had known it for a century—these kept him from becoming a Don Giovanni; but in a region where half the gentlemen drank deep because they had nothing else to do, and the other half not to be singular, there was no conventional reason why he should not be as convivial as he pleased, and the habit grew upon him steadily. He was a rich man as well as a handsome one, and every where basked in the auspicious light of beautiful eyes; but he valued his freedom, and made the Roost, as he called his residence, one of the most attractive bachelors' halls this side of the Fanbours. It became the rendezvous for all the better class of sporting men in the county, and presently Derrick Dalmager added to the French repertoire of doubtful habits one which at that day had not been transplanted into Gallic soil—the most passionate addiction to the turf, with especial reference to its facilities for gambling. It would be unjust to say that the agile, clean-limbed, bright-eyed, full-blooded, thorough-bred Doctor had no heart for similar qualities in the noblest of four-legged animals. He had an unusually large and fine stud for a private gentleman who did not wholly devote himself to the hunt and the race-course; he would have said of himself and his horses as the old chronicler of King William and his red deer, that "he loved them like his brothers." Nevertheless, at the core of his passion for them lay the fascination, ever most powerful with the cool-headed, reticent, and inscrutable type of man, of risking values on an uncertainty. Derrick was the last man in the world to be accused of sentimentalism; yet he could not pass the gate of the Dalmager demesne without a melancholy shadow falling over his eyes, or if he were in company, and the finer emotion shrunk from unveiling itself, a frown contracting his forehead. Filial respect had needed reinforcement by all the tenderness inspired by the memory of a dead father to restrain his lips from absolute invective when he first got home from Paris and found that old Reuben had taken advantage of his absence to alienate the estate. From the moment of that discovery he had never ridden by the place except under pressure of absolute necessity. One of the most charming roads out of Owlville followed the banks of Garnet Run, but he deprived himself of its scenery and its exercise-ground, going miles out of his way to avoid the sight of the homestead, and never once passing through its gate until the month prior to his present visit. His return then was professional, and came about after the following wise:

"WHAT YOU WANTS, MY LITTLE SISTER, IS TO GIT RELIGION."

Old Seibert Kearney, after a life of great activity and absolute self-neglect, found himself at the tether's end of a long-suffering constitution. From the day he bought his Crusoe retreat, and began his unaccountable self-seclusion, he too had fallen into the bibulous habits of the neighborhood, pushing them to an extreme which rivaled the most brilliant examples about him, in all respects save the gregarious and hospitable. Because he was lonely, and meant to be—because he had chosen Misanthropy, but could not kill Memory—perhaps because he feared lest his resolution of exile might break down if that foe within the citadel were not at least lulled into a lethargy the next best thing to death—he became that most hopeless of beings, the solitary drinker. There were few nights in the month when Kleda had not to put her master to bed as helpless as any of the babies which it was her natural gift to nurse. The exceptions consisted of nights when he did not go to bed at all, but having distributed his potatoes through the day with a better eye to proportion than usual, he found his ordinary unconsciousness at 10 P.M. substituted by a fearfully acute state of mind, in which the three kingdoms of Heaven, Earth, and Hell seemed to exist only as so many gigantic grudges entertained against this drunken Timon by the universe.

On one such night, his body-servant and Kleda's husband, Perro, as he lay watching him on a sheep-skin rug before the fire, would hear him groaning like an inarticulate lost soul with a horrible rhythm every sixty seconds until daybreak. Another night would see him standing for hours in one corner, with folded arms, and his white hair matted over his bloodshot eyes, steadily churning his body up and down, and pouring forth a soliloquy of low-voiced, blood-freezing oaths, as Perro said, "like a reg'lar cussin' machine," or pacing the room with frenzied gesticulations, and a step like a caged tiger's.

When the sun rose he sank under its first ray a mass of sodden, lifeless flesh, on floor or chair, and the servants bore him away on tip-toe to his bedroom without a whisper. Lest the hellish fu-marole should burst into a fresh eruption, and overwhelm them under hotter curses.

Such things have been endured on many a Southern estate by negroes born into the hands and reared at the feet of their curse and scourge. When the curse died the faithful, forgiving creatures have wept with a true grief for "ole Massa;" but it would be expecting too much of even the godlike patience of their race to wonder at the ill-concealed joy with which they announced at Dr. Dalmager's door one morning: "Massa Kearney—him got a stroke, and I don't reckon him eber git up no more." A strange light momentarily flitted over the black, dreamy depths of the Doctor's eyes as he heard these words, and with no more token of emotion than if he had been a daily visitor at Garnet Run, he told Perro that he would see the latter's owner within the next few hours.

TIGHT SHOES.

MANY beautifully formed feet are miserably distorted by badly fitting shoes. Ladies seem to suffer more than men in this respect, because custom sanctions a tighter fit on a lady's foot than on the lords of creation, who can "skuff round" in loose boots, and no one cares; but were a lady to promenade in just such easy feeling articles, she would subject herself to severe comment. But it is not necessary to wear old shoes in order to keep clear of corns, bunions, and incurved nails. Without being uncomfortably tight, a shoe should embrace every part of the foot comfortably, and then it is both braced and protected.

Enlarged great-toe joints, corns, and irritating nails cutting into the flesh, are invariably the results of compressing the parts with badly fitting shoes or boots. Bare-footed children are never tortured by such painful maladies. Take off the pressure, and the relief is instantaneous, and Nature relieves herself.

Children should have large soft shoes, and it would be an excellent habit if both ladies and gentlemen habitually wore such; but as Fashion is despotic, and still insists upon squeezing the pedal extremities into less space than they ought to occupy—be careful not to wear those which are painfully tight.

PUNISHMENT IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

THE medieval penal code eschewed monotony just as carefully as weakness. Its capital and other corporal punishments might be rather more frequent than modern prejudices approves of, but excellent care was taken to divest them of tedious uniformity. Thanks to our novelists, the reading public is pretty well acquainted with the commoner appliances of torture, and we are therefore not under the necessity of enlarging on such fascinating items as the rack, the wheel, the thumb-screw, and the boot. But these were only the everyday forms of punishment. There were always individuals, princes and politicians, especially of the Byzantine empire, who rose superior to such vulgar usages, and with whom "killing by inches" was not a mere figure of speech, but a dread reality. Indeed some of their detestable inventions of cruelty have obtained as wide celebrity as the bull of Phalaris. There was the "chambre à crucer"—a heavy chest, short, shallow, and lined with sharp stone, in which the sufferer was packed, and the lids heavily weighted, shut down on him. There were the "bernicles," consisting of a mattress, on which the victim was fastened by the neck with bullock's sinews to keep him from moving, while his legs were passed through a kind of stocks, and crushed between two great logs of wood, on the uppermost of which a man was seated; the process being repeated on the third day, which, as the old chronicler tells us, "is the cruellest thing that ever was heard of." There were the iron cages of Louis XI., in which some of his victims spent years, and which were so maliciously contrived that every position—standing, sitting, or lying—was equally uncomfortable to the occupant. But, unquestionably, the master contrivances of all these delicate inventions for producing excruciating agony were the "baiser de la vierge" of Baden-Baden, and the "iron coffin" of Lissa. In the former the prisoner, blindfold and fastened in a chair, was lowered by a windlass through a well-like shaft, reaching from the top of the castle deep down into the heart of a rock on which it stands, so deep—for the shaft still exists—that the visitor passing beneath can barely discern the glimmering daylight at the top. Here he was immured in a dungeon hewn out of the living stone, and fitted with a door of the same material a foot thick, so artfully constructed that it was not to be distinguished from the adjoining wall. In this miserable cell, surrounded by darkness that might be felt—silent, helpless, hopeless, like a toad in the centre of its block—he remained until the hour of trial. He was then brought before his judges, who awaited him, masked and solemn, in a larger excavation, called the Hall of Judgment. From thence he was conducted to the torture chamber—a den amply supplied with all the necessary implements—and subjected to its amenities according to the discretion of his judges. This over, the captive was sped through the last act of the tragedy. He was unbuckled from his iron bed, and directed to kiss a bronze statue of the Virgin, that stood at the end of one of the passages leading from the chamber, as the seal of whatever declaration had been wrung from his agony. Wearily he dragged himself along, with tottering limbs and failing strength, until, as he raised his lips to the mild face of the Madonna, a trap-door gave way beneath his tread, and precipitated him, fathoms down, upon a series of delicately-poised wheels—which his fall set in rapid motion. Nor do we exaggerate in the least, for the fragments of the murderous machinery, stuck thickly over with bits of bone and pieces of dress, still remain at the bottom of the fearful oubliette. More awful still was the punishment of the iron coffin, wherein the prisoner saw his dungeon contracting round him day by day and hour by hour, the sides stealing up and the roof creeping down—slowly, steadily, silently—passionless as fate, and as remorseless—the dread machinery maintaining the calm monotony of its march, through lingering days and nights of horror, until the final collapse crushed him. But even the worst of these was mildness itself when compared with the infernalities occasionally practiced on a few exceptional victims of exasperated power.

All horrent with projecting spears—

Like all other offices of honor and emolument, that of executioner was hereditary with the very strictest entail. And the emoluments were numerous. The executioner had a handsome fixed salary; he was accustomed to receive gratuities more or less splendid according to the rank of his victims; he was the first official to visit the scene of a suicide, and there, standing on the breast of the victim, he acquired a right to every thing he could touch with the point of his seven-foot sword; the women of pleasure were his tributaries; he derived a large indirect income from the surgeons; and, finally, the unmarried executioner had the regal privilege of releasing a woman doomed to death and leading her free from the scaffold—on condition of marrying her.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

The ladies are delighted with WARD'S cloth-lined paper cuffs. They are so much like linen that it is almost impossible to tell one from the other, and they are retailed every where at fifty cents for ten pairs. The cloth lining makes them very strong. Can be had at WARD'S, corner of Union Square and Broadway; also, wholesale and retail, at No. 387 Broadway.—Daily Times.

We are assured that the firm of EASTMAN & KENDALL, 65 Hanover St., Boston, Mass., advertised in our columns, is trustworthy and reliable. For 10 cents they send a patent pen fountain, and a check describing an article to be sold for $1. Their club system of selling goods is becoming quite popular, particularly with the ladies. It is worthy of a trial.—Buffalo Gazette.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars.

Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS. Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.
DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND
CURES
Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.
POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

FACETIÆ.

A LEADER of music in a church where congregational singing was practiced selected a tune with the wrong metre, to be sung to the words, "With hyssop purge my soul, O Lord!" He tried it twice, when some old lady cried out, "Mister, you had better try some other yarb."

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Gallant, adj.—A good old word scarcely recognizable in the manners of the nineteenth century.

Game, to make of.—Making a point before killing.

Garden.—Flora's boudoir.

Generosity—Giving your time and services to a fair where there is no possibility of a flirtation.

Gentility.—Nothing under a boy in buttons.

Giggle.—The safety-valve of weak machinery.

Girlhood.—A preparatory school for women before they go up to take their bachelors.

Give.—A verb implying a desire to receive in exchange.

Glass.—A friend who saves most women the trouble of reflecting.

Glove.—A sheath for a cat's paw.

Gold.—The sun which dazzles all, and blinds so many.

Gossip.—The copper currency of the realm of woman.

Governess.—A poor sister who has not enough intelligence to see that intellect is menial.

Grace.—The flower without which the loveliest garden is worthless.

Grave.—The accent which must fall on our last syllable.

Green.—The color most becoming to pale girls and young heirs.

THE FIRST CROQUET.

Ah! bright days of May, when croquet beginning,
Makes fair lawn and garden look ten times more fair;
I take my good mallet, it can not be sinning
To give up all work and rush out to fresh air.
How sad it is croquet's a pleasure, not duty;
How nice a profession it would be to stay
Forever on lawns smoothly roll'd, and woo Beauty
In earnest, or flirt through the long summer day!

There's never a painter could mix on his pallet
The colors to rightly portray such a scene;
For yonder a maiden is wielding a mallet,
And fair is her face as the Paphian queen.
She stoops to the sward, and I fain would surrender
All chances of winning to keep by her side,
But she croquets me ruthlessly, laughs when I'm tender,
And sends me away o'er the garden so wide.

Yet I cling to the dream, and I still go on playing,
For Croquet and Cupid are ne'er far apart;
And, perchance, ere the season has gone for the Maying,
My loving persistence may win me her heart.
I'll never despair, but on days that are brightest,
I'll stray, like a moth, near my beautiful flame;
My touch when I croquet her ball shall be lightest—
If losing would win her, I'd give up the game.

WAR NEWS.—The war in Japan is over, from which fact it may be concluded the chiefs are not to be considered never-say-daimios.

"You have lost your baby, I hear," said one gentleman to another. "Yes, poor little thing! It was only five months old. We did all we could for it. We had four doctors; blistered its head and feet; put mustard poultices all over it; gave it nine calomel powders; leached its temples; had it bled; and gave it all kinds of medicines; and yet, after a week's illness, it died."

A LITERARY DISCOVERY.—That ingenious American who discovered that Lord Bacon wrote Shakespeare's plays is now engaged on a treatise to prove that Homer was the inventor of petroleum—at any rate, he was known as the old man of Scio's "rocky i'le."

IMMEDIATE.—If "The Girl of the Period" is as she is represented, the sooner a stop is put to her the better.

A DOG IN THE MANGER.

MA'ISELLE. "Why on Earth don't you bring the Pony round, John? I've been Waiting ever so long."
JOHN. "Werry sorry, Miss, but Master's just ordered him for Dinner."

THE CELESTIAL HAT.

STRANGE EXIT.—An Irish physician was called to examine the corpse of another Irishman who had been assassinated by some of his countrymen. "This person," said he, after inspecting the body, "was so ill, that if he had not been murdered he would have died half an hour before he was killed."

THE LOVER'S REVENGE—Marriage.

A HIGH DESTINY—Hanging.

HYMEN HIMSELF AGAIN.

"Marriages" throughout Lent's season,
Few are in the papers found;
"Births" and "Deaths," as if no reason
Could check either, still abound.

As the rushing out of waters
That were long by flood-gates pent,
Lo the sons of men, and daughters,
Getting married after Lent.

PREVALENT COMPLAINT AMONG SAILORS—Se(a)rum on the brain.

SIGNS.—When you see a young man and woman walking down the street, leaning against each other like a pair of badly-matched oxen, it is a pretty good sign that they are bent on consolidation.

A "heated imagination" may be defined to be—dreaming the house is on fire.

THE LADIES' CHIEF AMUSEMENT—Bod-netting.

POOR FELLOW!—An old gentleman, whose mastication is not of the best, has just advertised for a butcher to supply him by contract. In this manner he hopes and expects to get "tender" meat!

CONUNDRUM.—Q. It is made with a train, it travels with a train, it is of no use to a train, but a train can not travel without it.—A. A noise.

A "DEED WITHOUT A NAME"—An unsigned will.

A Missouri farmer being asked if raising hemp was a good business answered, "I can't sartin' say, but it is surely better than being raised by it."

When do ladies carry fire?—When they have taper fingers.

"Father, I don't like the bishop."

"Why, my child?"

"Because he sprinkled water all over my new dress, and said, 'Fanny, I despise thee.'"

They have high rents also in New Orleans; and the Bulletin of that city recently printed the following announcements, which seem to hint that house-builders could find profitable employment in the Crescent City:

FOR SALE.—A splendid hoghead, just vacated by the former occupant, who leaves it for no fault. The premises are a sweet location for a family with young children; are in thorough repair, with bung-hole centrally situated and hoops in good order. Apply to Richard Figgs, Grocer, 144 Cinnamon Street.

TO LET.—One roost on the rail recently put up at Bantamville in the building formerly occupied by Henry Fowle. Price $350 per annum and taxes. Apply to A. Rubster, on the premises.

RARE CHANGE.—The subscriber, having recently introduced steam-heating apparatus into his house, has no further need for his splendid and commodious ash-hole, which has been cleared out, utterly regardless of dirt and expense, and will now be leased to a few single gentlemen who desire lodgings in a quiet and retired situation. Terms made known on application. Geo. Gripe, 34 Bullion Avenue.

GENTLE RESIDENCE FOR SALE.—A splendid Saratoga trunk, formerly the property of Miss Fitzbutter, has been moved upon the new land, its roof raised, and the keyhole materially enlarged; these alterations, with the different compartments in complete order, render it one of the finest residences for a gentleman of wealth, now in the market. Price $182,000. For key apply to Knockemort & Co., Auctioneers. $100,000 must be paid down to the auctioneers before entering.

THE MOST DIFFICULT ASCENT—Getting up a subscription.

What are domestic magazines?—Wives who are always blowing up their husbands.

A schoolmaster, endeavoring to instruct one of his scholars of the nature of a miracle, strove to make it plain.

"Now, my boy, suppose you should see the sun rise in the middle of the night, what would you call that?"

"The moon, Sir."

"No; suppose you knew it was not the moon, but the sun, and that you actually saw it rise in the middle of the night, what should you think?"

"I should think, Sir, that it was time to get up," was the answer.

Epitaph for the late cannibal king of Dahomey—"One who loved his fellow-men."

AN ALTERNATIVE.

Give me, oh give me your photograph, Miss;
Give me a ringlet, or give me a kiss;
Give me a glove in my bosom to place;
Won't you? Then give me a slap on the face.

To escape trouble from noisy children—send them to your neighbors visiting.

Why ought a medical quack to be a woman?—Because he's always a Charlotte Anne.

NOTHING LIKE LEATHER.—What leggings should be made of—Alligator's skins.

"QUICK SANDS"—"The Sands of Life," which so soon "run out."

OLD GENTLEMAN. "I'm so very sorry—tell your dear Parents—so very sorry—I can't accept their invitation."
BOY (anxious to put the Old Gentleman at his ease). "Oh! never mind, it doesn't matter a bit. Pa said he only asked you just out of Compliment!"

LOOKING FORWARD.

"Pray, don't put too many Coals on, Mary! It makes me shiver when I think that in Three Hundred years we shall have None left!"

INFANT'S SWISS MUSLIN HOOD.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XIX., Figs. 66 and 67.

Garden Hats.

BOTH of these garden hats are tasteful and easily made, and will be found useful in the coming season. The first is in the form of a sun bonnet, and is made of figured Swiss muslin, lined with blue linen. For this cut the outside and lining from the patterns given in Figs. 30-32 of the Supplement. Baste the outside on the lining, then stitch with white silk the double material cut from Fig. 30, and run through the shirr thus made a whalebone or a cane of the length given in the pattern. On the front of the crown lay the double material over on the right side to the width of a quarter of an inch, and hem it down with the whalebone or cane inside. On the other side (the back) lay the material underneath in the same manmuslin bow. The strings, which are of Swiss muslin, are thirty inches in length by six in width, and are laid in a few pleats on the upper ends.

The round garden hat is of white and pink linen, the latter being the lining. Cut of the outside and lining one piece each from Figs. 33 and 34, and one piece of the lining from Fig. 33. This last is laid in pleats, always bringing × on ●, and a covered wire is run in on the outer edge. Then cover the outside with pink and white linen, and line the crown with white linen. Lay the piece of white linen cut from Fig. 34 upon the pink linen, after which backstitch the double material with white silk, following the lines given, and run into each of the shirrs thus formed a thin round whalebone or cane ner, with the whalebone or cane inside. Fasten the ends of each whalebone carefully on the bias ends of the piece, then bind the piece with a bias strip of the Swiss muslin. The gathered crown is now fastened, according to the figures on the pattern, to the foundation of the hood. This last is first pleated, always bringing × on ●. The double material of the cape, Fig. 32, is trimmed on the outer edge. On the upper edge lay it in pleats, bringing × on ●, and fasten it to the front and crown. The seam thus made between Figs. 31 and 32 is covered on the inside of the bonnet with a strip of Swiss muslin. On the front and back edges of the crown, and on the outer edge of Fig. 32, set a pointed ruche as shown in the pattern, and on the middle of the back a Swiss of the length given on the pattern. On the under side of Fig. 34 the stuff is laid over on the right side to the width of a quarter of an inch, and hemmed down with the whalebone or cane run in. The other side of Fig. 34 is fastened in the same manner, except that in this case the hem must be laid on the under side. The ends of every whalebone or cane are lapped over about an inch and carefully fastened. Hemstitch the double material across the ends from 5 to 7, and cover the seam, as shown in the illustration, with small bows of white linen; then sew Fig. 34, according to the figures on the pattern, to the outer edge of Fig. 33, and border the hat with a pinked ruche of white linen two inches in width. The strings are made of white linen; they are a yard long and seven inches wide, and are hemmed on the sides and the under end half an inch wide; the top is pleated where it is sewn on the hat.

ALL ALIKE.

THE Americans are the most uniform of people. They have all, it is true, strongly marked national peculiarities, but they differ so little from each other that one may be always taken as a fair specimen of the whole. We look alike, having all the same sharply chiselled features and eager expression; we dress alike, being always in our Sunday best of silk and broadcloth, cut uniformly according to the latest fashion; we build alike and furnish alike, so that we feel as comfortable in our neighbor's house as in our own, or rather as uncomfortable in ours as in his; we talk alike, borrowing our topics from the same source—the morning newspaper; and such is the uniformity of our tastes, manners, and opinions, that we are always at home in each other's company. Thus we eat, drink, live, and move about more gregariously than any other nation. The great hotel, the railway-car and the bar-room, are the characteristic inventions of a people whose individualities are melted up in the mass. This national system of association has no doubt its good effects. It gives the power which comes from a combination of forces, and cherishes that sentiment of unity which is the main strength of our country. It has, however, certain disadvantages of a more or less serious kind. We allude now only to an inconvenience of an economical character.

This uniformity of American life leads often to a foolish assertion of social equality as regards the manner and expense of living. We not seldom, like the little frog in the fable, strive to blow ourselves up to the magnitude of some more portly neighbor. More than half of all the money spent by the so-called respectable classes goes for keeping up a vain rivalry with a few excessively rich people. The only gratification received in return for the costly effort is a showy artifice which deceives none but those who get it up and believe in its success. The large house, the gilded furniture, the balls and banquets, and the costly frivolities of personal adornment, are but in few cases sources of direct enjoyment. There are not many of those who possess them who think them worth the cost; and dared they live for themselves, most would willingly forego them. Men and women put on these golden shackles, which are none the less wearisome to bear for the richness of the metal, because they are unresisting captives to a tyrannical public opinion. Such is their slavish subjection that they will not venture to please themselves, but do every thing to gratify their chosen master. Their slavery is of the most anomalous character, for while it is felt to be oppressive it is still self-imposed.

This following of our neighbors at every cost of convenience is a sheepish instinct, unworthy of rational creatures. The living for others instead of ourselves is by no means pleasant; and has the further disadvantage of leading us into expenses beyond our means, and necessarily to ruin.

SOLITARY FEEDING.

A MAN'S body and his mind are like a jerkin and a jerkin's lining; rumple the one, you rumple the other." The physiological fact, thus humorously illustrated by Sterne, is nowhere more apparent than in the mutual influence of digestion and mental emotion. Both the brain and stomach must be at ease for either to perform its functions properly. Cheerfulness of mind is as essential to a good digestion as a good digestion is essential to cheerfulness of mind.

The sudden announcement of bad news, or the occurrence of any thing to disquiet the mind, will not only arrest the hunger of the sharpest appetite for the choicest food, but produce a loathing of it. To eat, if it were possible, in such a state of mental discomfort, would be sure to result in a fit of indigestion, if not in something more serious.

When the stomach is satisfying its appetite the mind should not only be free from any painful emotion but in a state of gentle and cheerful excitement. "Chatted food," according to the old proverb, "is half digested." This suggests the advantage of social eating, than which nothing is more conducive to the enjoyment as well as the digestion of food. With the sociability of a mixed dinner company there comes just the degree of mental liveliness required. The mind is distracted from its own preoccupations by the common talk to which each one contributes without making an exhaustive draught upon his resources. Thus there is general animation without any individual fatigue. The whole nervous system is by this agreeable means stirred to a gentle excitement, which is favorable to the performance of every bodily function, and especially to that of digestion.

Believing that sociability is an essential element of not only the enjoyable but digestible dinner, we protest emphatically against solitary feeding, which is both a gross and unwholesome practice. It is, however, very general among our men of business. These have the habit of eating while they work. Although they drop the pen in assuming the knife and fork, their brains remain busy with their debit and credit calculations, without, however, taking into account what is due to health. They rush in the anxious interval between an offer and a sale or purchase to the trough of some neighboring bar-room. Here they fill their stomachs in the shortest time with the largest quantity of sludge—for the confused mess of stew, chowder, pie crust, and other miscellaneous grub hardly deserves any other name—and hasten back to pronounce the last word of a bargain, which they have been ruminating while bolting their dinner. The bargain may turn out a good operation, but the dinner will be sure to be a losing, and, if often repeated, a fatal one.

A full hour at least should be spared from the busiest day for the main repast. It should never be slurred over by any of the miserable pretenses of the bar-room, but treated with all the substantial consideration its importance demands. Let each one make the most of his dinner, whatever it may be. Let it be prolonged, and freed from grossness by a graceful ceremony; and above all, let it be partaken of in company, for nothing is so depressing to mind and body as solitary feeding.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Mrs. Rooster.

MY DEAR MADAME,—I have a few words to address to you upon your manners upon the road which I sincerely hope may be of service. Doubtless you suppose them to be unexceptionable, and imagine that I am doing a very superfluous work in criticising them. Dear Madame, let us see. Yesterday morning, about eleven o'clock, as I was taking my usual promenade with my friend Pry—Mr. Peter Paul Pry, whom I have already mentioned in this correspondence—I saw you coming, and indeed close at hand. My friend Pry, who, although no longer as young as the youngest young man in society, does not by any means regard himself as old—and who does, I wonder?—was arrayed in a neat spring suit not unbecoming his years. The trowsers were new, the waistcoat was cheerful, so was the cravat, and he moved with the air of a man who was not at all ashamed to show himself in the street on a bright spring morning.

"What do you suppose that is in that window opposite?" asked my friend Pry, who is among the most inquisitive of men; and he peered across the street through his eye-glasses, drawing my attention in the same direction. The next moment Mr. Peter Paul Pry in his new clothes, and I in my old ones, were sprawling upon the pavement at your feet, dear Madame—and the mishap that befell the new garments of my friend I forbear to mention.

Now, gentlemen of our years do not tumble down without grave reason. For myself, I may truly say that I never fell in Broadway before, and I doubt if Mr. Pry ever did. It was a most humiliating occurrence; for, say what we will, to slip or trip and fall prostrate in the dust, or in the mud, or even upon the dry pavement, is not a dignified or becoming action, and when two elderly gentlemen do it, bless my soul, it is ludicrously mortifying! Every body stopped and moved toward us—supposing, of course, that we had fallen in a simultaneous fit; and at the same moment there was the most intolerable yelping and howling of a dog, so that I supposed we had been attacked by some wild animal of that kind. We comforted the many good Samaritans who crowded about us by rising immediately and smiling as benignantly as the circumstances permitted; and then we perceived the cause of our sorrow.

You were coming up the street—sailing up, if you will allow me, dear Mrs. Rooster, like a magnificent woman-of-war, with a boat attached. The boat was your dog—your poodle, your puppy, your lap-dog—and you held the silken string while he ran along the edge of the walk; and we, gazing with innocent curiosity at the opposite window, encountered the string stretched across the sidewalk from you to your poodle, puppy, and lap-dog—and the result was immediate, and intolerable to think of. Such were your manners upon the road; and I beg permission to express my sentiments, and those of many of the most respectable persons of your acquaintance, upon this practice of petting dogs in which you indulge. Light and foolish women insist that men who object to the female fondness for dogs are jealous of them. Very well. Perhaps Mr. Pry and I are jealous of your poodle in a pink blanket and ribbons. Call me jealous, but hear. A woman who lives in the country and has a healthy fondness for all animals—who likes horses and is not afraid of them, who rides with the grace and confidence of courage and sympathy, or who has the same natural and wholesome knowledge of cows and the other dumb and serviceable friends of man, will also probably like dogs, and they will be very sure to like her.

Why, dear Madame, there is my friend, Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle, who lives upon the banks of the Hudson, you remember, and whom all the animated nature upon her place apparently loves and follows, as the birds and the fish did homage to Lulu in Kaulbach's picture from Goethe. When I have the happiness of passing a week with her in early June, it seems to me that when she steps out upon the piazza in the morning the birds burst into a twitter and warble of welcome, and the donkeys, and the goats, and the cows, and the horses look up as she passes the pasture, and seem to salute her with admiration and love. As for the dog—it is a St. Bernard, and there is another which is merely a dog—it is a terrier—they are her escort. The St. Bernard gravely accompanies her, a stately seneschal of my lovely queen. The terrier runs, and skips, and pricks his ears—the lithe court jester of her Majesty. And I humbly follow, the grateful populace of her delightful realm. But do you suppose Mistress Margery Honeysuckle puts a pink blanket upon the dog, or either of them, or ties a ribbon around their necks? Do you suppose she leads them with silken cords? Can you imagine this pearl of women hugging the dog, or holding him caressingly in her lap? I should as soon expect to see her marrying the good old Ned, her saddle-horse, or holding Donkey's head in her lap to decorate it with flowers. And I can just as easily imagine her dancing in a ballet as promenade in the Fifth Avenue or elsewhere tied to a poodle, or pug, or puppy, or lap-dog in a pink blanket—and thereby bringing elderly gentlemen into public derision.

Mrs. Honeysuckle knows that it is essentially monstrous to lavish upon a dog the caresses that spring from human affection. It is monstrous, and therefore repulsive. I do not know the man who likes to see a woman fondle a dog. He feels that it is affectation, or a gross perversion of feeling. I beg you, Madame, to treat animals as animals, with Mrs. Honeysuckle, and not as human beings. And in the lesser details of treatment I entreat you not to make a spectacle of yourself with a puppy at the end of a string, but if you wish to keep a poodle or a puppy of any kind to keep him in the country, or if you will have him in the city to suffer him to take the air with Epaminondas, your man. But why keep him in the city? Have you mice in your house? Or do you wish a living plaything? Or have you no children?

Dear Madame, I will use my text to extend my sermon. This subject of keeping animals, whether in the city or country, deserves careful consideration. A dog in town is a mere nuisance. To enter a drawing-room and sit down upon a puppy curled up in the softest chair or upon the corner of the sofa is, you will not deny, disgusting. Mrs. Margery, indeed, when Honeysuckle is away upon business, will sometimes have her dog in the cozy room where she sits alone sewing. He is both company and garrison. He sighs and draws long breaths, and stretches his legs, and opens one eye at her, and gets up and walks about a little, and settles himself comfortably again, and she looks at him, and speaks to him, and is glad of his mute sympathy, and when the hour comes sends him to his box of hay, which is his quarters in the house. He is a serviceable animal and treated as an animal. If you have use for him in town and treat him accordingly, then, dearest Madame, we will not quarrel. But no pink blankets and blue ribbons, and hugging, and kissing if you please.

I certainly agree that dogs in the country may be as great nuisances as your dog in the city. A person who keeps a brute that darts out upon every passer—especially upon a moving carriage or horse—is himself a nuisance, and ought to be abated by the local authorities. My friend Richard Salsify—one of the best of men—was once driving me in his wagon on a summer afternoon, pointing out to me the charms of his country situation, and was just saying: "I know not a single drawback," when out rushed a cur from under the gate of a respectable-looking house, ran at the horse, which naturally shied, upset the wagon, and broke Richard Salsify's shoulder. And once when Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle herself was riding not far from her own house, the dog of a barbarian, who had just come up from town and bought a place with the profits of his gold doings in Broad Street (the barbarian, I mean, not the dog), darted out at her as she briskly trotted by, and for a moment it was a question whether the miserable brute (the dog, I mean, not the barbarian) had not killed the noblest of women. But although her horse instinctively leaped aside and became for a few moments ungovernable, the superb rider tamed him and rode safely away.

Now, I say to you, Madame, that the man who owned the dog that broke Richard Salsify's shoulder, and the Broad Street barbarian whose cur nearly slew beautiful Margery Honeysuckle, ought to be presented by the grand juries of their towns as nuisances, or the dogs should be—it is quite the same thing. Or what shall I say of my sister Smith's good neighbors in Watermeadow where she has a charming summer retreat? They are well-meaning people who apparently cherish no nefarious designs upon their neighbors, and who would not willingly depopulate the country around them—but they keep wild beasts in their grounds, and whoever opens their gate is a fool-hardy tempter of Providence. In the deep dead of night, when I am passing a little time with my sister, I hear the roaring of those griffins, the hoarse bay of those dragons. Their noise comes in at the open window, and I dream that I am scaling the wall of the Garden of the Hesperides, and that the monsters are upon me, and my heavy feet refuse their office, and a dragon is just about to munch my paralyzed leg and draw me into his horrible maw, when I awake in terror and hear the dogs of those neighbors.

You call upon these good people at the risk of hydrophobia, of lock-jaw, of maiming and deformity for life. They keep great dogs that rush howling at you and snapping with frightful teeth—and the good people, at whom the dogs do not rush, nor bark, nor gnash their teeth, exclaim: "They are troublesome fellows—but there's no danger. Don't be afraid! They won't bite." Of course the honest inference is, that they do not wish to be called upon, that they have forsworn society, and that whoever tries to be civil to them is civil at the peril of his life. The name of these summer neighbors of my sister—and you ought to know it lest you should ever be in that neighborhood, is Lamb—Mr. and Mrs. Theophilus Lamb; and their house is just at the side of the high-road in Watermeadow. And if I were drawn upon the grand jury in the town of Slobog, in which this pleasant hamlet of Watermeadow is situated, I would endeavor to persuade that intelligent and discriminating body of men to present the dogs of the Theophilus Lambs as public nuisances. For you can not pass the fence but these brutes dash along upon the inside and show their disposition to rend you. They have even jumped over and ran at passengers peacefully passing. And yet the Theophilus Lambs hear the abominable racket—they even sit upon their piazza and see their wild beasts harry innocent persons by trying to get at them, and are content to be denounced as the worst-bred people in the hamlet. Why don't they shut up their dogs? Why should the peace of that rural retreat be at their mercy?

Those dogs and your puppy, poodle, pet, pug, or lap-dog, that so ignominiously overthrew Mr. Peter Paul Pry and me, are a part of the manners upon the road of you and of the Theophilus Lambs. Dear Madame, I entreat you to reform your manners. Consider other people a little. Why should Mrs. Rooster and Mrs. Lamb make themselves nuisances? I pause for a reply; and hoping your reformation, I am, your true friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

RIDING HABITS.

SEVERAL of our correspondents have asked us for information in regard to spring styles in riding habits; but subjects of more general importance have hitherto demanded our attention and compelled us to defer complying with their request until the equestrian season is already advanced.

Black is the favorite color for habits, because the least conspicuous. Ladies' cloth is the material selected, and seven yards the necessary quantity. When a lady has more than one habit, she usually selects the second of dark blue or of invisible green Melton. Serviceable habits, for constant use and for country wear, are made of brown water-proof and the light mixed tweeds in shades of pale gray and dust color.

THE CORSAGE.

The regular habit corset, with a blunt point in front, slight spring over the hips, and short basque behind, is preferred to the fancy jackets that are cut straight around the hips. The waist should be only moderately long. Care should be taken that it is the natural length under the arms, as if made too long it is apt to wrinkle and turn up, and is very uncomfortable to the wearer. Two darts should be taken in front, instead of the one seam advised by many tailors. One seam ends abruptly, and two are necessary to give proper fullness to the bust. Thin horse-hair and a little wadding increase the round appearance. The back should be amply broad at the top, but very narrow at the bottom, with gracefully curved side bodies. The basque at the back is eight or ten inches long, sloping from the hips. A pleat is laid on each side, simulating a continuation of the seams of the side body. The pleat is pressed flat, and finished with a button at each end. The basque is lined with the material of the habit. Tailors advise that the waist be lined with thick silk, as it fits more smoothly than linen, and does not stretch. Ball buttons, either of crocheted silk or of solid jet, are fashionable. They should be put very close together, to prevent gaping between the button-holes.

THE SLEEVE.

The coat-sleeve should fit easily to the arm. When worn with gauntlets it is closed at the wrist, but is left slightly loose when designed for the linen cuffs and wristband gloves now in vogue. A kind of chevron of silk braid sometimes ornaments the sleeve. On others the only trimming is the outline of a deep cuff defined by two rows of braid or of silk cord. A row of buttons, smaller than those on the corsage, extends up the sleeve from the wrist.

TRAINS, TROUSERS, ETC.

Skirts are not so full and long as were formerly worn. They are gored flatly in front and at the sides, with a slight fullness at the back, which should be gathered in, as pleats are difficult to adjust gracefully in the saddle. The proper length of a riding-skirt is a quarter of a yard longer than the ordinary walking dress, yet many ladies have them a yard and a half or three-quarters long. Something depends, of course, on the height of the horse; but long trains to habits are very unsafe, and are not now considered stylish.

Riding trousers of the cloth of the habit are worn with the present style of short skirts. They may be made either in the Bloomer style, gathered into a band at the ankle, or cut small with straps sewn on.

A pretty riding jacket of blue Melton is cut with considerable spring over the hips, and is of uniform length all around. It is slightly sloped at the sides to prevent binding on the hips. The front is open at the neck like a gentleman's vest without a collar. A habit skirt neatly tucked and a standing collar with silk scarf is shown above it. A handkerchief-pocket on the breast is bordered all round with soutache braiding, and fastened in front with loops of cord.

Narrow linen collars, either standing or turned down, are worn with habits. The cuffs should match, and all must be of immaculate whiteness.

The hat selected by equestriennes for riding in Central Park is a glossy beaver with low crown and curved rolling brim. A veil of grenadine or of black or colored net surrounds the hat and streams at the side. Caps with visors and Spanish hats with high, sloping crowns made of fancy yellow straws are shown for summer wear.

Ten or twelve dollars is the price asked for making a riding habit. The best modistes refuse to make them, as they say it is a man's work, and when their customers order a habit in their summer outfits the modiste employs a professional tailor.

SUMMER DRESSES.

We are told that the Empress Eugénie has shortened her trains several inches, and that the ladies of her court are fast following her example. The fashion has not yet been adopted on this side of the water. American ladies, loath to part with what they have cherished against so much opposition, are having their summer dresses made with the graceful, sweeping trains worn during the past season. The skirts, however, are not gored to fit so plainly over the hips as they have been of late. Many ladies prefer to have the front widths plain and all the breadths slightly sloped; but the very newest dresses have three front widths alone gored, while the others are straight and gathered at the back.

We hear many objections made by ladies who do their own sewing to goring thin dresses, but modistes say that by taking a little care not to stretch the bias edges of the goods, or to pucker the sewing, the gored seams will hang as well in thin materials as in the thickest silks. It is said also that the bias seams of muslin skirts can not be ironed properly. This is the fault of the laundress who attempts to smooth the seams by pulling them on the bias instead of the way of the thread. In the furnishing houses thin goods are ironed with great precision, and the process at the same time seems very simple. Gabrielles of sheer muslin, every seam of which is sloped, are perfectly smooth and shapely.

Double skirts, such as are seen on walking dresses, are worn with thin trained dresses. The upper skirts are made with apron fronts and looped up with immense puffs at the back. It is especially stylish to catch them up directly behind almost to the waist, a grotesque fashion that we thought at first sight was certainly a ludicrous mistake of the modiste. Short sashes with four broad loops and two fringed ends hanging very little below the loops are worn with these skirts. The long sash is already passée. Sometimes, a long tunic or a kind of court train is formed by leaving the upper skirt open in front and gathering the fullness in from the hips backward.

Box-pleated quilling and narrow ruffles are worn on all kinds of thin material. The ruffles vary in number from three to fifteen. An odd number it is said has the prettiest effect. Grenadine and Chambéry ruffles must always be cut bias and bound. Wash muslins have straight ruffles cut crossways of the goods and hemmed. White materials are scalloped and needle-worked at the lower edge and put on in box-pleats. One wide flounce around the bottom of the skirt is more distingué than the narrow frills that have already become common. It is made in a variety of ways, but the easiest plan is to bind both edges and put on in box-pleats, wide apart from each other, but lapped so deep that the pleat is distinctly defined without being held securely at the lower edge. Sometimes the edges are vandyked, a pleat being laid in each vandyke. A silk button or a tiny shell bow ornaments each pleat. Occasionally a narrow quilling is added to the upper edge of the flounce. It is pleated in with the flounce and gives the appearance of a full ruche heading. French flounces have the pleats all running one way and reversed about two inches below the heading. This produces a pleated puff that is very much admired.

Waists are plain blouses gathered into a belt, or with shirred yokes. A pretty design for solid colored organdies is to make the puffs of the yoke run diagonally from right to left. The old-fashioned surplice waist is again in vogue. This is the simplest form of bodice, and is becoming alike to stout and slender figures. It is easily made by the blouse pattern. The back is precisely the same. The fullness in front is made by gathering at the shoulder the piece that is usually cut out at the neck. The front is then left in a straight line and fits true.

Grenadines and Chambéry gauze are made with a tight-fitting corsage over silk of the same shade. These materials are so thin and gauze-like that many light shades of gray, blue, and Metternich green can not be worn over white without losing almost every semblance of color. A silk petticoat of the same shade must therefore be worn beneath them. This adds to the expense, but improves the appearance greatly. Black iron grenadine is always lined throughout with silk.

We find it very difficult to discover any thing new in sleeves. French dresses imported for summer have invariably the coat-sleeves so long worn. It is elaborately trimmed up the outer seam, or with innumerable horizontal folds from the wrist to the shoulder. The ruffled Marie Antoinette sleeve is being made here, and is appropriate with the present costume; but we have not seen it on any of the many Parisian dresses shown us.

The Marie Antoinette fichu is universally worn and admired. We heard but one lady object to it this season, and she fancied it would conceal her tapering waist and give a dowdy appearance to the figure. To obviate this her dress-maker crossed the fichu ends beneath the belt of the dress, and the waist looked as small and trim as ever.

ORGANDY ROBES AND EMBROIDERED MUSLIN.

Among the summer importations are some elegant organdy robes at $20 the pattern. The waist, sleeves, and upper part of the skirt are in solid colors, a deep blue, fawn color, or light green. The lower part of each width of the skirt has gay borders of field-flowers, wide enough to reach to the knee, narrower in front, and widening over the train. The same flowers in smaller borders are furnished as garniture for sleeves and sash.

Corded organdies, sold by the yard at sixty cents, have small figures on a white ground. Piqué, the least heavy of thick muslins, and most desirable, is sold in pretty patterns with a band of trimming at each selvage, for one dollar a yard. For ordinary house-dresses we have the Japanese linen at three shillings a yard, a kind of Lisle thread, thin, wiry, and cool. It is of mixed white and black and gray, and is prettily trimmed with frills or box-pleated flouncés, bound with black ribbon, or with blue, cherry, or green.

White will be more worn this summer than for several years, and occupies a prominent place in summer outfits for the sea-side and watering-place. It is chosen alike for morning robes, afternoon toilettes, croquet dresses, street suits, and dancing dresses. Some beautifully embroidered dress patterns have been imported. They are of Victoria lawn and sheer Swiss muslin. The lower part of the skirt is ornamented with the finest French needle-work. The prices range from $60 to $250. Ladies say, however, that they do not make up stylishly without destroying so much of the embroidery that they prefer to select a design among the many shown at the furnishing houses, and order a dress appropriate to their height and figure. Many of these are expensively trimmed with Valenciennes lace; while others, equally well and tastefully made, are ornamented with the low-priced Hamburg insertion and box-pleated ruffling.

We were shown a morning dress, forming part of a bridal outfit, made of French nanook. It was a close-fitting Gabrielle, with every seam in the whole dress joined with Hamburg insertion an inch wide. On each side of the insertion is a group of very narrow tucks. The front of the skirt is closed, only the waist being fastened with buttons. Insertion and tucks are down the front, and the sloped seam extending over the shoulder. Around the gracefully trained skirt are three fluted ruffles, narrow in front, but gradually widening toward the back. These are headed by insertion and tucks. Coat-sleeve with large flowing sleeves attached. The Marie Antoinette fichu is formed entirely of tucks and insertion, and surrounded with a fluted ruffle. Price $55.

A walking dress of nanook is marked $35. The short gored skirt is trimmed with two rows of Hamburg insertion arranged in vandykes, separated by straight rows of points of folded muslin, such as we have described before. A short paletot, to be worn with a belt and sash, is pointed behind, before, and on the hips, and trimmed to match the skirt. The coat-sleeves were similarly trimmed from the wrist to the shoulder. Muslin points at the neck.

A useful novelty shown at one of the most enterprising furnishing houses is a chemise and corset-cover combined. It consists of a regular chemise skirt gathered into a waist to cover the corsets. It is fitted closely, with darts in front and considerable spring over the hips. One shown us was of Richardson's linen, trimmed with a puff of linen cambric at the shoulders, with a band of Irish insertion of eyelets, and a Valenciennes edge. The very short sleeve was formed by a tiny puff and fluted lace. Price $13.

VARIETIES IN LACE.

Among the many pretty things that add variety to summer toilettes we are shown fancy aprons of black lace with bretelles and sash. They are looped at the sides with large rosettes of ribbon the color of the dress with which they are worn. They are made only in the French woven laces, that imitate admirably real thread lace. Most fastidious ladies consider it admissible to wear fancy jackets and aprons of imitation laces, since they are only a transitory fashion.

Coiffure mantillas, worn in the Spanish style, draping the head and bust, promise to supersede hats and bonnets at the watering-places. They are combinations of the hood and mantilla-scarf, and are exceedingly graceful. Pretty ones of private importation are of Brussels net embroidered with colored flowers.

Among veils a new shape is of embroidered tulle falling over the face like a mask, with long wide barbes that cross under the chignon and tie loosely in front, or are held together with a flower, bud, or bow below the chin.

Another style crosses in front as a fichu, and ties at the back of the waist, forming a sash. A novelty worn abroad is half veil and half fichu, and may be worn as an opera mantle. The veil falls over the face, but may be thrown back like the coiffure mantilla.

Thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN and VIRET; and Messrs. W. R. BOWNE; DEVLIN & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

A LETTER addressed to the proprietors of the Bazar, dated London, May 1, from SHIRLEY BROOKS, Esq. (author of "Sooner or Later," a capital story recently published by the Harpers), contains the following pleasant paragraph: "I have to-day a Philadelphia paper with the DICKENS dinner, given by the press. You will not need to be assured how cordially that hospitality has been appreciated here, and by the English collaborators of the American press; I mean 'all of us.'"

—ROBERT DOUGLAS, eldest son of the late STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, has been offered the position of Private Secretary to Governor HOLDEN, of North Carolina. Both ROBERT and STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, Jun., inherit much of the talent of their distinguished father. They were carefully and thoroughly instructed in the rudiments of French, Latin, etc., by the widow of Senator D. (now Mrs. General WILLIAMS), and subsequently went through the customary course at Georgetown College. The mother of the young gentlemen was a native of North Carolina, hence, perhaps, a disposition of ROBERT to commence the battle of life in that State.

—Washington society is in an agreeable flutter at the betrothal of Miss MARY FOOTE, the most admired of Washington belles, to Senator HENDERSON, of Missouri. As nearly as it can be done with types the lady is thus photographed: Miss FOOTE is a bright blonde, with large and lovely eyes, an exquisitely artistic mouth, and symmetrical and classic face. She wears a wealth of rich golden hair, arranged in tasteful tresses waving back upon her shoulders. The sweet simplicity and abandon of this feature of her toilette, coupled with her quiet tenderness, and vivacious naturalness of animation, render Miss FOOTE, in the opinion of connoisseurs of beauty, the most witchingly attractive young lady gracing the crème-de-la-crème of society at the capital. The Senator is a fine-looking gentleman of 42 (she is 24), and proposes that Miss F. shall "change her local habitation and her name," in December. She was born and brought up in Seneca Falls, New York, and is the daughter of ELISHA FOOTE, Esq., who is now one of the Commissioners of Patents.

—At the grand "Charity Ball" recently given at the "Grand Hotel," Paris, the most elegantly-dressed lady in the room (says a Paris correspondent of a London journal) was Mrs. FERDINAND SUYDAM, who had just arrived from New York, and brought her toilette with her. It was very rich, and in good taste, and went well with the superb diamonds which encircled her handsome neck. Mrs. SUYDAM is a daughter of the late STEPHEN WHITNEY, who left her, as they say in America, "no end of money."

—The Edinburgh Courant gives this spicy little anecdote of the QUEEN, who is most regular in attendance on divine service, and notices the absence of any of her servants. On one occasion, at Balmoral, last season, she asked one of her attendants on a Monday morning, "Why were you not at the Kirk yesterday?" He answered, "Please, your Majesty, the morning was wet." "Oh fie," said the Queen, "who could have expected a Scotchman to plead that excuse? It was not too wet for me."

—New York having given to the New and the Old World two first-class prima donnas, Philadelphia comes forward with the third—Miss EDITH ABELL, who debuted in that city a few evenings since with complete success in the opera of the "Bohemian Girl." She is a blonde, petite in person, with a fine figure, graceful and vivacious, has a fine soprano voice, well-trained, and possesses histrionic powers of such high character that it was difficult to free the mind from the impression that she must have had experience on the stage. Philadelphia is greatly delighted with its new star, and chirps over and about her with pardonable delight.

—The Rev. Dr. HOWLAND (a son of one of the old HOWLAND & ASPINWALL firm) is a gentleman of worldly possessions, and known among his brother clergymen as one who is very generous to his less-favored brethren. He recently purchased ground on Fifth Avenue for a new church, to be called "The Church of the Heavenly Rest," contributing thirty thousand dollars of the purchase-money himself. A friend of his gave twenty thousand. It is really a memorial to two of Dr. H.'s deceased children. The new church will be free to all who choose to come. It will be "High," but not of the St. Alban's stripe.

—Sir ROBERT NAPIER is the first engineer, indeed the first scientifically-trained officer, ever appointed to independent command in the British army. His success in Abyssinia was "short, sharp, and decisive." The Government would give him a peerage if he were not too impecunious to accept it; he has beaucoup de children and slender fortune—two things that, curiously enough, are often found in conjunction. Parliament, however, will give him the usual pension of £5000 per annum for three lives, upon which he and Mrs. N. ought to be able to rough it.

—WASHINGTON VAN ZANDT died at Sing Sing on the 4th of May, aged 60 years. He was formerly an Episcopal clergyman, and possessed remarkable ability as a preacher. Subsequently he became a writer for the press, and was at one time editor of the Syracuse Star.

—The Rev. WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON, the distinguished Methodist clergyman, recently from England, whose portrait has been published in Harper's Weekly, is thus described by a correspondent of the Methodist, as he appears in the pulpit:

"There he stands, simply a burly Englishman; height, say five feet eight inches; weight, above two hundred pounds, certainly; stout build, inclining to corpulency; chest and shoulders, deep, round, and massive, with a look of prodigious muscle there had it been cultivated; an arm like a blacksmith's, ended by a smallish but compact hand. Of neck, there is not much to speak of in length; but the sturdy thickness which gives English John the balance of his nickname. The head belongs with the body; it has a broad, deep foundation. The face is emphatically English. The eyes are probably a light blue, but seem small, deep-set, and can hardly be seen for a tendency in the red cheeks to rise up in a sort of intermittent puffiness behind. Over all is the hair—light brown, dry, thin to semi-baldness in front, long at the sides, and behind, rolling, and not even as well dressed as Beecher's. There's your preacher and orator, given in an 'untouched' photograph, severely true, as he stood for the first time before an American audience. Is it prepossessing? Not very; and yet, as your eye runs up and down the figure, and over his strong, yet pleasing head, the presence is impressive. You see, moreover, that the man is entirely at his ease, and betrays at once the well-seasoned veteran."

"His diction is marvelous, short, complete; nervous sentences leap after each other with increasing rapidity as he warms a little in his theme. The rhetorical and logical progression of his theme satisfies the justest rules of art, yet he is neither wholly rhetorical nor wholly logical. Now and then there is a deeply subjective introspection, but objectivity is the character of his thought. He deals in things mentally and morally actual, rather than speculative. The mind of speaker and hearer is directed to the real in Christian experience and work, rather than to the ideal. In fact, we almost wish a little more of the inner man poured forth. There is little of set and amplified illustration. The style is attractive and graphic, but not pictorial. 'To be brought to Jesus is equally the want of the man who knows but one language, and hardly that, and of the man who has graduated the stars and unbraided the light;' such sentences, polished, sparkle all along, yet not excessively. Allusions to the classics, short and apt, occur here and there. The preacher has remembered his Homer wonderfully well, and to good purpose; but his favorite exemplifications are scriptural, 'comparing spiritual things with spiritual.' His gesticulation is kept well in hand, rather 'close-reined,' but always appropriate and forcible."

—Among the signs of the times in England it may be mentioned that the Rev. Mr. BELLEVILLE, who is represented as having no superior in that country as a preacher, was the first Church of England clergyman to preach a sermon in favor of Mr. GLADSTONE's resolutions for disestablishing the Irish Church. His sermons every Sunday are said to be rare specimens of eloquence.

—Mrs. SAMUEL RUSSELL, of Middletown, Connecticut, has erected in that city, near the entrance of the cemetery, a chapel of Portland stone, at an expense of $30,000. In Greenwood Cemetery one of the largest, most substantial vaults, and one in the best taste, is that of Mr. CHARLES MORGAN, the cost of which was the same as the chapel mentioned above.

—Lord BYRON, a cousin of the person of that name who wrote verses, died lately at the age of 79. He succeeded the poet in the title, which he held forty-four years; but was not much known beyond the immediate circle in which he revolved. The new Lord BYRON is an old boy of fifty, eminently respectable and aristocratic.

—The wife and daughter of that remarkable potentate and exalted Indian, SPOTTED TAIL, who has given our troops so much bother, were recently boarders at one of the great taverns at Cheyenne. A servant of the establishment, who has a turn for statistics, informs the editor of a local paper, that recently they demolished sixteen plates of soup between them at dinner. They appear to be fond of soup.

—A gentleman writing to the Continental Gazette, describes the DIX-WALSH marriage in Paris, tells who were present, how the ceremony was performed, what the bride wore, etc., etc., in words following: "The impressive church-service and nuptial benediction of the Episcopal Prayer-Book were read by the Rev. Mr. LAMSON, of the American Episcopal Chapel of Paris. There were no bridesmaids or groomsmen; in a circle near the bridal pair stood General DIX and his family—Mrs. DIX, Colonel DIX, Mr. and Mrs. CHARLES DIX, Mrs. BLAKE and her two darling rose-bud daughters, and other friends—all of whom knelt during the prayers. The bride—(we are afraid we must resort to the hackneyed phrase, for nothing else will express it)—'the bride looked lovely' in her wedding raiment composed of a skirt of puffed tulle, with tunic and long train of rich white faille, trimmed with two rows of point d'Alençon, looped in front with bouquets of orange blossoms; corsage montant, with Alençon lace at the throat and wrists; wreath of orange blossoms as a coronal, and long tulle veil; diamond ear-rings and diamond cross. She also held a bouquet of natural orange flowers in her hand. Mrs. DIX wore a dress of dark shaded satin, trimmed with black lace; Mrs. BLAKE, a tunic of mauve silk over a white silk skirt, fichu Marie Antoinette of white blonde; Mrs. CHARLES DIX, a dress of light mauve satin, with black Chantilly fichu." The foreigners of distinction among the guests were Lord LYONS, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, the Turkish Ambassador; Mr. KERNE, Swiss Minister; the Minister from the Argentine Republic; M. MICHEL CHEVALIER, and M. SIMONIN. Many noted-Americans were also present at the ceremony."

Infant's Swiss Muslin Hood.

See illustration, page 497.

THIS hood is of double Swiss muslin. The trimming consists of Swiss muslin ruffles an inch and a half in width, which finish the front of the hood, the under edge of the cape, and the back of the gathered front. For the hood cut from Figs. 66 and 67 each one piece of double material. Then cut for the front two pieces of the muslin three-quarters of a yard long and three inches wide, and run in on the back a white covered wire fifteen inches in length; in the middle a similar wire sixteen inches in length; and in the front another seventeen inches in length, so that the front is gathered closely. On this pleat the crown, always laying \times on \bullet , and join this, according to the figures on the pattern, with the cape, which is pleated at the top. Bind the seam with a strip of the muslin, and hem the cape round the bottom. Trim the hood with ruffles, and a bow and ends of Swiss muslin on the back of the cape, and finish with muslin strings.

See illustration, page 497.

For this hood cut from Figs. 63-65 each one piece,

WALKING SUIT.

For pattern see Supplement to No. 30 of Harper's Bazar, No. I., Figs. 1-11.

Fig. 64 being of double material. Pleat the crown from \times to \bullet , then gather a strip of muslin in puffs, a little more than an inch wide, and cover the crown with these lengthwise. Run a wire in the front along the line as marked; the length of this wire is given in the pattern. The front is gathered by this means. Then join the front and crown according to the figures on the pattern, and put on the cape after having pleated it from \times to \bullet . Turn the front over along the line designated; bind the outer edge with silk, and trim this revers on the inner border with a pleated ruche of the material. Cover the seam which joins the front and crown by means of closely laid pleats, an inch in width, and border the cape with a somewhat narrower ruche. Finish with a bow of ribbon on the left side of the hood and blue ribbon strings.

Wall Pocket.

See illustration, page 497.

THIS pretty pocket is easily made. The material should, of course, be of a color which corresponds to the furniture of the room. The original is of brown woolen reps, ornamented with brown braid, and bordered with brown silk cord. Lambrequins, worked in the same manner, and finished each by a tassel, ornament the pocket. Cut, first, for the back, from Fig. 60, one piece each of pasteboard, woolen reps, and percale, then from Fig. 61 one piece of the material and lining, and from Fig. 62 five pieces alike. Having braided the material for the upper part, cover the pasteboard for the back piece; then trim the remainder of the pieces with the material and lining together. Set a strong wire on the upper part of the section of the pocket, Fig. 61, and lay in the under edge of the same part two pleats from \times to \bullet , as shown by Fig. 61. Sew this part to the back and edge with cord. Border the lambrequins also with a cord, with the exception of the upper edge; finish each with a tassel, and sew to a cord on the upper edge, fastening together at the corners. Sew this lambrequin piece, Fig. 61, on the pocket so that the cord stands out as trimming. The pocket is hung up by means of a brown silk cord, arranged as shown by the illustration.

Walking Dress.

THIS dress is of sultana red Irish poplin; the corsage is high, and the dress is trimmed with passementerie gimp of the same color. The skirt is gored and pleated behind. The pattern given for the Norderney walking dress, No. 30 of Harper's Bazar, Supplement No. I., Figs. 1-9, may be used for the skirt. The waist is cut from the pattern given in No. 15 of Harper's Bazar, Supplement, No. XV. The "Figaro" mantle is of the same material. For this mantle, the shape and style of which are new, a yard and a half of the material is required. Slope this at the upper part, and arrange in box-pleats, so as to reduce it to the width of sixteen inches at the top. Fasten this pleated part to a small cape which scarcely reaches to the shoulder, and fasten in front by means of a bow and ends of the material. Trim the Figaro mantle with passementerie gimp, an inch wide, and passementerie grolots. A hat of black tulle with strings and steel trimmings, and parasol of gray silk, complete the suit.

Summer Hood with Fichu.

See illustration, page 501.

MATERIALS: $3\frac{1}{4}$ oz. white zephyr wool.

In this hood and fichu the tabs cross in front and are laced together behind. The whole is bordered by a netted ruche. The fichu, together with the hood, is finished with a white woolen tassel four inches in length. The hood may also be worked of split wool according to the pattern given in the illustration. Another illustration gives a section of the design in full size. This is worked backward and forward, knitting all the stitches on one side and purling them all on the other.

1st round.—Alternately three stitches knitted together, and in the next stitch three stitches, knitting one, purling one, knitting one.

2d round.—Entirely purled.

3d round.—Like the first, taking care that the stitch in which three stitches are worked in this round shall be the stitch which resulted from knitting three together in the first round. This forms a figured design. The hood is cut from the patterns given in Figs. 35 and 36. Begin on the front of the hood by casting on ninety-two stitches on rather coarse knitting-needles, and knit as given above, making the shape like the muslin pattern cut from Fig. 35. When this has reached the size of Fig. 35, cast off and sew together from 8 to 9. Begin the fichu on the back corner with seven stitches. The three middle stitches are here knitted together as 1 stitch in the 1st pattern row. At the beginning and end one stitch is always knitted plain, and the work is widened as required by the pattern. When the knitted part has reached the height of Fig. 36, cast off the stitches from the middle toward both sides to \ast of Fig. 36, and knit each part of the fichu separately, gradually casting off stitches on the upper edge to 10 on Fig. 36, and adding on the under edge.

WAIST WITH SIMULATED FICHU.

For pattern see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 7-9.

From the 10 onward the stitches must be cast off, and the same number of stitches added to the other side, so that the tabs shall have the form of the pattern. Where the tabs widen add stitches on both sides, then cast off stitches to render it pointed. The fichu and hood are joined according to the figures on the pattern, and the seam bound with a white silk ribbon. The ruche consists of a netted stripe of the requisite length, which is worked in nine rounds on white zephyr over a mesh an inch in circumference, and bordered on each long side by a round of white filoselle silk.

This stripe is laid in box-pleats at the width of an inch apart and held together by means of a few stitches. Finish with tassels on the fichu and hood.

Summer Hood in Knitting and Crochet.

See illustration, page 501.

MATERIALS: $2\frac{1}{2}$ oz. zephyr wool, blue ribbon of half and one and a half inches wide.

This hood is knitted of white zephyr worsted. The tabs may either fall in front, or be crossed on the breast and fastened behind, or arranged around the neck as a scarf. The pattern is knitted with wooden needles, so that the work is in holes and very light. Around the outer edge the hood is trimmed with a crochet border of white wool, through the holes in the figure of which is run a narrow ribbon. Bows of blue ribbon, an inch and a half in width, form the other trimming. Begin on the front of the hood and cast three stitches on wooden needles of about three-fourths of an inch in circumference, and knit backward and forward twenty-seven entirely plain rounds, adding a stitch at the end of every round. In the 28th round cast on eighty additional stitches at each side of the work, and knit thirty-eight rounds over the entire row of stitches. In the next round cast off the stitches at each side of the middle fifty-two. With these remaining fifty-two stitches knit further thirty rounds, again adding a stitch at the end of every round, after which cast off. Lay together the corners of the work just finished and sew the side stitches together. Crochet on this, putting the needle through the side stitches one round, alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch. (chain stitch), passing over a requisite distance of the border.

2d round.—* 1 dc. in the next ch. of the former round; 1 ch.; 2 dc. separated by 2 ch. in the next ch. of the former round; 1 ch. Repeat from *.

3d round.—Always 5 dc. in the 2 ch. of the last round; between these 2 ch. separated by a sl. (slip stitch), this last always in the single dc. On the front of the hood the dc. are worked nearer together so that they form pleats; besides this, crochet a narrow border about eight inches in length, and sew it on the front of the hood. For this make a foundation of suitable length, and crochet 1st round, alternately, 1 dc., 1 ch., with the last passing over one foundation plating one of the most entertaining spectacles in the world.

Married people run more in a groove. Matrimony becomes a habit in a very short time; and though we do not say that there is not a very genuine love five times out of ten dictating every matrimonial movement, yet these movements are all so much alike that the history of one married couple will be generally found but a mere repetition of the history of hundreds of others. Now love—or, rather, that love which the French call the grand passion, and which properly belongs to the days of betrothals—never becomes a habit. It is full of the impulse of a variety of thought in a uniformity of passion. It is all testified, however, in so many various ways that to watch the conduct of engaged people in its multifarious gradations will be found a very entertaining, and, if you are a philanthropist, a very gratifying spectacle. It frequently happens that a very nervous man will fall in love with, and become engaged to, a very worldly young lady. This is the drollest type of all engagements. The obvious nervousness of the man, contrasted with the impulsive movements prompted by love, are almost ridiculous enough to make you sometimes wonder that the girl can see any thing to love in him. The jille de société knows too well the character of society to care to provoke its contempt by unblushingly spooning before it. She must be hopelessly in love, indeed, if she disregards her experience of the thoughts suggested to society by such sights. The man, if he were not so nervous, might be able to regulate his conduct by much the same consideration for the opinion of others. But the truth is that, restrained on the one hand by his nervousness, and urged on the other hand by his love, he will generally contrive to make a fool of himself at least ten times during an evening, and go to bed convinced, in the secret depths of his own mind, that he has fallen ineffably in the estimation of her at whose feet he has laid his heart. The manoeuvres of such an engaged couple as this are exceedingly enjoyable to watch. The many heart-burnings that come out painfully strong in the expression on the man's face; the exultation in the eyes of the girl who knows how desperately the man loves her, how acute are the pangs which she communicates to his heart by her waltzing and talking with the tall, bewhiskered gentleman with the velvet collar to his coat, all combine to form a study which only a very superficial individual indeed can contemplate without deriving from it very material instruction.

The types of engaged couples are, of course, inexhaustible. There is a type, however, not less droll than that which we have just indi-stitch. 2d round.—In every ch. of the last round 6 tc. (treble crochet); after every 6 tc. 1 ch. 3d round.—Alternately 1 sl. in every single ch. of the last round; between that, 1 ch. By this the 6 tc. figures form regular pleats. Having sewed on this border, run through the dc. round of the hood blue ribbon half an inch in width; lay the knitted crown in a few pleats from the seam toward the front point, and finish this, as also the front middle of the hood, by a bow and ends of the wide ribbon. On the lower corner on the back fasten a white woolen tassel of about four inches in length; and fasten in a point the ends of the tabs by means of similar tassels.

Knitting Design for Hoods, Todies, etc.

This design may be used as foundation for covers and curtains, and worked in split wool also for hoods. Knit on a foundation row of the requisite length, in backward and forward rounds, always making one side knitted and the other purled. 1st round.—Slip one, * knit three, throw the thread around; repeat from *. 2d round.—Purled. In every stitch which was formed by throwing the thread around in the last round knit three stitches—one being purled, one knitted, one purled. 3d round.—Knit entirely plain. 4th round.—Purl entirely. Continue by repeating all from the 1st round, taking care to turn the work at the beginning of every pattern row.

ENGAGED PEOPLE.

THERE are other signs of betrothal between two persons than an engaged ring. They are very numerous, but they are also very amusing. Ways of making love are just as various as the characters which love has inspired. A new Wheel of Life has yet to be made which shall include better designs than those hitherto contrived for this curious toy. Let the little black figures of different types of lovers be made to revolve, and then you will be contemcated. We mean the engaged couple impersonated by the gushing girl and the staid man who is terribly conscious of the laughter-provoking condition of being into which he has suffered himself to glide. It is very natural for the gushing girl who is full of her new love, and who wants to show her real lover off before her admiring friends and relations, to have recourse to a thousand petty subterfuges to provoke him into even a temporary "spoony" demeanor. But the staid man will never descend into such puerilities of conduct. He may love the girl very much; but, in order to escape ridicule, he has made up his mind that nobody shall know that he loves her but herself. Of course the gushing girl experiences no end of disappointment and doubts as to whether Charley, or Willie, or Harry, or whoever he may be, really loves her. But, to do the staid man justice, he makes up for his apparent coldness the moment the backs of the relations and friends are turned. Still, what the gushing girl wants is to let these very friends and relations see how much she is loved by the man whom she is going to marry some day or other. Surely nothing can be more natural or more harmless. An engaged girl has a sense of triumph upon her in letting her papa and mamma, and brothers and sisters, see how devoted her lover is to her. It is the triumphant expression of the young heart, which says, "Hitherto I have only been a young girl at school, or a young lady at parties; now I am going to be a wife. Now I am Somebody." All this eloquence is aided, of course, by the lover, when he chooses to offer his support. But the staid man never does choose. His is always the consciousness of the whole family being in conspiracy against him. If he meets the eyes of his future mother-in-law, his first thought is that she is conjecturing his real banking account, and summing up his character by estimating the value of his clothes. He objects to the sisters and brothers because he is convinced that they regard him as a kind of needy fellow who has crept into the family merely to take what he can get. Why should he make a fool of himself before such critics? He loves his little girl—very much; but if she thinks he is going to be let in to spooning with her before her family she is very much mistaken—for he won't. So one-half the enjoyment of being engaged is gone from the gushing girl. It is almost as bad as if she had no one to whom she could tell her love.

If we thought, for a moment, that engaged couples were ever in a state of mind fit to have solid advice communicated to them, it would afford us infinite pleasure to lay down a regular code of what we should call "betrothal laws" for the regulation of their conduct not only toward each other, but toward society. But our experience assures us that the best thing a person zealous in the happiness of an engaged couple can do for them is to leave them alone. So this we do, merely indicating engaged couples as a very humorous study for such of our readers who, like Mr. Jingle, are observers of men and things.

MAY.

To forest and meadow-land, April-green,
She has journeyed, a joyous comer,
And gladdened a realm for its future queen—
The loveliest vassal of Summer!

She rouses the timider violets up,
She has brightened the cedar's dark fringes,
And painted the hyacinth's waxen cup
From the withering tulip's tinges.

The flame of her sunset gauds burns,
The light of her gloaming fingers;
She has opened the plumes of the velvet ferns
By a touch of her fairy fingers.

With plenteous roses, in clustered pomp,
She has wreathed the trellised porches,
And lit in the depths of the lonely swamp
Her marigold's fiery torches.

And last, on the lute of her gentlest breeze,
She has called to their fragrant plunder
Those bacchanals of the flowers—the bees,
With their boom of mimic thunder.

But kindlier still, the poet's dream
She has brooded with threads of fancy,
As bright and rich as her butter-cup's gleam,
Or the dawn of her purple pansy!

THE STORY OF PAULINE.

"DARLING—I found your letter last night, buried as usual in our trysting-tree, and read over every word a dozen times. How can you expect me to agree with or acquiesce in it, who love you so dearly? Little one, you don't know, you can't guess, in that sweet innocent heart of yours, what I feel for you—what it would be to me to lose you. I would rather a thousand times be dead and cold in my grave, blind and deaf to all the things that are so dear to one in youth and strength, than live to know I must do without my darling in all the weary years to come. Not to look into your eyes, not to feel the touch of your dear hand—ah, child! if you only realized the dearth and famine those words contain for me, you would never write me your dutiful maxims and pious pruderies. I don't blame you, you dear little saint; it is not because I'm a world-worn sinner myself that I should laugh at the goodness and purity of a little white dove like you. You did not see me in church last Sunday—the first time I have been for years—I never took my eyes off you. I almost smiled to see you staggering under a gigantic prayer-book with an enormous cross on the back. You can't think how I strained my ears to catch the sound of your voice as you uttered all the responses; and when you sang, it seemed to me I heard your sweet voice above all the rest. I haven't been a good man, Pauline; they've taken care to let you know that, haven't they? but for once I was in love with religion, when I saw your upturned face, with its rapt, devout expression, looking like some cherub's, in its frame of curly, auburn locks. Think, child, how it lies in your power to reclaim a sinner! If you were mine, mine altogether, I should never want to be bitter or wicked any more; you might make me so good—I dare say in time I should be quite a different man; and you know there's something said—somewhere in your Bible—about leaving father and mother, and cleaving to your wife or husband; and so you know, dearest, if you were only once mine, it would be your positive duty to give up every thing for me. Who loves you as I do? If you gave me up to-morrow, and promised all your life-long to see me no more, what could make up to you for losing me? Don't think me vain for saying this, Pauline: I'm only judging your heart by mine. I know that the whole world would be nothing to me without you; I know there would be no sunshine, no brightness, in life for me—nothing but one great heart-eating care—if you were lost to me. Child, if every thought of your days and nights were full of me, as mine are full of you, there could be no hesitation in your mind as to which you would give up—your family or me. Go to your father, tell him how we love each other, tell him what our lives would be asunder, and then—if he still refuses—darling, it would be no wrong—such disobedience could not be sin in God's eyes. Decide for yourself, and trust in the heart that is too full of you, even to the very core, ever to fail you.

"GEORGE STANLEY SCARLETT."

I read that dear letter twice, thrice, kissed it, laid it lovingly against my bosom, while the great tears, that were not all for sorrow, welled up into my eyes. Ah, how true! if I lost his love, gave him up, what would all the world beside hold for me? I was only eighteen then. Ah, me! how incontrovertibly, sweetly true were those loving sophistries. For such love as ours, was it not well to give up all else, friends, ties of family, worldly goods? "It could not but be well."

I was in love—heart and mind and soul; there was a passing cloud over my happiness, because my father had refused his consent to my marrying the man who in my eyes seemed most dear, most noble, most worthy; but in my secret thoughts I had faith—the faith of youth in all things working right at last.

They said he was a scape-grace, a vaurien! that he was extravagant and poor. What cared I? If they had brought me a whole catalogue of crimes and sins signed with his own confession it would not have made me love him one whit the less. He was my darling. I had given up all my heart to him, and I would have said stanchly, "Let him be all you say—and still I love him." What is love worth without that blind confident devotion? He was not one of the big black giant heroes of fabulous girth, with Satanic flashes in his "bold bad eyes;" no, he was slight, rather tall, with a bright handsome face and kind laughing eyes. Perhaps his mouth was weak. Sometimes I saw that when he curved up his chestnut mustache above the lip, and twisted it with lithe impatient fingers when he could not answer one of my "dutiful maxims." People were very hard upon him, I thought—very cruel, very unjust. Has one to shake one's head at him because he had been expelled from Eton for some boyish escapade: or has one to frown in virtuous indignation because he had done the same as fifty men in his set, and then, having a mean, cross-grained old father who would not pay his debts, been obliged to sell out of the Riffles? Not that he went about like a big atheistic hero cursing his fate and family, and hating every one who was more fortunate and less tempted. Not he. He was frank, and kindly, and generous—open as the day. "Little darling Pauline," he would say to me, "I'm not half worthy of your love. If I wasn't such a selfish fellow, I should go away and leave you for better men than me; but, darling, if I didn't have you I should die." Ah! was it not something to be loved like that—something for a little simple girl who had never known what it was to be loved, and praised, and flattered before? I had run wild all my life, untamed, unchecked. I was not a beauty like my stately, black-haired sister Doris. Papa and mamma did not expect any thing of me. She would sustain the family honor, be presented at Court, and make a grand match. So the little pale-faced girl with the wavy auburn locks and strange big eyes might roam at large, and race her pony over the broad fields and through the green lanes, might feed her birds and romp with her dogs, and follow her own wayward will much as she listed. I had been very ill once when a child, and the doctors had said, "Give her plenty of fresh air—let her run wild." Their prescription had been followed faithfully enough. And I was very happy. I loved the country, and the birds, and the dear wild flowers. When I was seventeen Captain Scarlett came home (his father's place was next to ours), and he loved me—loved me in spite of beautiful, stately Doris. Men had never had eyes for me before when she was present. Ah! was it not sweet flattery to my simple soul to be loved—ay, more than loved by a man who had mixed with all the loveliest women of the day? But when my father saw it he called me gravely to him, saying, "Pauline, this must not be." And I had cried in a frightened voice:

"Must not? Oh! papa—why?"

He answered, quite kindly: "My child, there are a good many reasons which little girls do not understand. Captain Scarlett is a man of expensive tastes, extravagant, with not the best reputation in the world."

"Oh, papa!" I cried, with hot flushing cheeks, "I don't believe it."

"Hush, dear!" he said, gravely. "I am not speaking from hearsay; what I say is distinctly, undeniably true. And, Pauline, I tell you now, earnestly and seriously, I will not allow you to see him any more. You must now, and here, give me your faithful promise never to see him again without my consent."

I implored and protested; I shed many bitter tears; but my father was firm, and with a sore heart I yielded at last. But "Love will find out the way," and the dead heart of the old oak-tree in the woods received our written confessions. We had not even the poor consolation of Pyramus and Thisbe, telling our love through a chink in the wall. I was faithful to my promise. I would not hear the sound of his voice, or look in his face again. And morning and evening, when I knelt to say my prayers, my heart was heavy with the thought of this transgression against my father's wish. The Sunday before—that Sunday George spoke of in his letter—my better angel had had a great struggle with my wavering heart, and in the end had conquered; so that, with much bitterness and yearning of soul, I had written a last letter, beseeching him not to hinder the obedience I owed my father. In quick answer came his letter, that dear letter I have told you word for word. It changed the current of my thoughts. I could not give up my darling. I would go to my father, would implore him pitiously to let us love one another; and if he should still be hard and obdurate, I would—ah! I knew not what.

There was a slow footstep on the lawn, then a crunching of the gravel, and I heard the click of the latch on the little gate opening to the wood. I looked down—it was my father smoking his after-dinner cigar. I took a sudden resolution, and with hot cheeks and fluttering heart I caught my hat from the little white bed, and ran down the broad polished staircase, and out into the wood. Papa heard my quick step. He turned and smiled upon me.

"Well, Miss Lightfoot," he said, kindly, "are you coming to bear me company?" My cheeks were dyed with painful crimson. I could hear the quick beats against my side, and I was silent, gasping for breath. "You should not run so, Pauline," my father said, anxiously. "You are none too strong that you should play these mad pranks with yourself. Stand still, child, and get your breath." A little farther on there was a great oak trunk that had been recently felled.

"Papa, come and sit down with me, please," I gasped, and again I felt dizzy with the great rush of blood to brain and heart.

He acquiesced silently, and we sat down side by side. I tried to speak, but could not force out the words, only sat shivering from head to foot. Presently he turned and looked at me with a long, searching gaze. I was white and sick now.

"Tell me, Pauline!" he uttered, gravely, taking the cigar from his lips.

Sudden courage came to me, and I cried: "Papa, I can not give him up!"

Surely there seems no harder thing than to tell a father that one loves some man very dearly; all one's instinctive delicacy seems to shrink back upon one like the curling leaves of the little sensitive plant. I went on, desperately:

"If you only knew how we cared for each other. We don't want money, papa; and why should you mind for what we do not value?"

There was a grave silence that seemed an eternity of torture to me.

"You don't want to break my heart?" I sobbed.

My father laid his cigar down beside him, and turned to me.

"Pauline," he said, kindly, but with a sad, earnest expression in his face, "I do not think I am one of those men who thwart their children's wishes, and refuse their prayers from tyranny or motives of worldliness. You and Doris have not had much hardship to complain of from your father—have you?"

"Oh no, papa!" I cried, quickly.

"If I see your heart set upon a thing—if I know that, by granting what you ask, I should make you very happy—do you think I should refuse unless there were some grave cause?"

I hung my head; that argument seemed unanswerable.

"My child, very few people marry their first loves, and well for them they do not. It may seem harsh and unfeeling to you now, but take my word for it, if you obey my wish and give up Captain Scarlett, you will see men more suited to you than he is, and some day you will be very thankful you did not have your own way."

"Never!" I sobbed, indignantly.

"You think so now, dear—it would be strange if you did not. But you are a mere child, younger even than your years. Come, be brave, Pauline. Trust your father."

His calm words seemed to be taking my dream, my hopes, stealthily away from me; and like some sleeper weighed upon by nightmare, I made a mighty effort to rouse myself. My cheeks were burning until the tears forced themselves into my eyes. My hands and feet were icy cold. For a moment I thought of taking the precious letter from my breast, and placing it in papa's hands; surely that would move him; but then a vague dim sense came over me that what was so sweet and touching to me would seem different in the eyes of a man who had outgrown all sentiment. Do we ever give our parents credit for knowing the meaning of the word romance by practical experience?

"Papa," I said, trembling greatly, and yet with unflinching resolve, "I will never give him up. If you brought some great crime against him, then I should have to do as you commanded me, if it broke my heart. He has no fault, only the fault of being poor. I am not like Doris. I don't want to be a great lady. I don't care a bit for fine clothes and carriages; it is he who makes the sacrifice—not I."

"You are quite right, Pauline," answered my father, gravely; "it would be Captain Scarlett's sacrifice—that is my very objection to your marrying him."

"Papa!" I exclaimed, with wide open eyes.

"If I could give you a fortune the case would be different; but you know that is impossible. For the position I am obliged to keep up I am a poor man; the most I could afford to give you would be a hundred a year. Captain Scarlett has four hundred a year left him by an aunt. This I know from his father—an income barely sufficient to keep him like a gentleman in his own set. I know the sort of man he is well—good-natured, unstable, selfish, weak as water, who would promise and swear every mortal vow under the sun to get what he wanted for the time, and probably intend to keep his vows. But it is not in his nature to sacrifice himself for others. I don't want to pain you, my poor little girl, but if you married him he would in time feel you a weight and drag upon him, and be ready to curse, perhaps to your face, the day he ever saw you."

The indignant knot rose in my throat. "You don't know him, papa."

"I can not expect you to believe me, my dear; but you must trust my judgment. Now let us say no more about it."

I rose to my feet, and stood before my father with streaming eyes, my fingers locked painfully together.

"Papa, I do not want to be undutiful or ungrateful, but I will not give him up. You may lock me up or send me away, or do what you like with me, but I am resolved. I love him with all my heart. I will marry him."

There was no anger in my father's kind eyes at my rash words, only grave compassion.

"You will know better some day, Pauline. Go in now, child; it is getting cold. Some days hence I will talk to you again."

I turned away, half ashamed, half regretful, leaving my father still sitting on the fallen oak, and went slowly through the deepening shades to my room. How bitterly I cried! With what wickedness, what bitter ingratitude, my heart reproached me! To have spoken those proud rebellious words to my father—my father, who had been so patient and gentle with me. But I could not, I would not give up my darling.

A week after papa sent for me.

"We have decided what to do with you, Pauline," he said. "You are to promise us that you will not see or hold any communication with Captain Scarlett for a year; and if at the end of that time you are still of the same opinion, we shall not oppose your wishes any longer."

My eyes glistened with delight. What was a year? Was it likely we should change in twelve little months?

"Meantime," continued my father, "you are to spend a couple of months with your Aunt Catherine in London. In a fortnight, when your mamma has had time to equip you, I shall take you to London. I will see Captain Scarlett myself, and tell him of our determination."

"Papa," I asked, wistfully, "may I not see him, or write to him once?"

"No," answered my father, quickly. "I will explain every thing."

I went to London, to my aunt, Lady Nugent, and she took me to all manner of grand entertainments. I enjoyed it thoroughly. I was very happy, for had I not profound faith in the future? Sometimes, when we drove round the Park in my aunt's grand barouche, I saw him standing by the rails with a knot of men, or lingering by some carriage full of aristocratic beauties. He did not raise his hat, or even seem to let his glance fall upon me, but when I turned my head, from a sudden impulse as I passed, I caught the full bright gaze fixed tenderly upon me. Once at a ball we met too, and it seemed so hard that he should not ask me to dance or come to speak to me. But late in the evening he was standing opposite me in a quadrille, and as he passed me he whispered, with some bitterness, "Is it too long to wait?" and I answered, quickly, "Not if it were ten years, instead of one." I knew what he meant; my partner was Viscount Heronmere, and for the last three weeks he had followed me every where, like my shadow. He was kind and generous; youth, good looks, and money were his; perhaps, if I had never seen George, I might have come to care for him. He proposed for me to my father, and I was implored, entreated by my family, not to refuse such a marriage. Papa absolutely forbade me to mention Captain Scarlett to him, and Lord Heronmere, believing he could make me love him by kindness and perseverance, would not be daunted by my first rejection. In the shooting-season papa asked him down, and he put off a grand party at his own place to come. I might have made a grander match than beautiful Doris—her lover was only a baronet; but what cared I for wealth and titles in comparison with my own handsome George Scarlett? I be false to him! I break his heart, because father, mother, sister, urged, scolded, and entreated perpetually! I loved them all—I would have given up any thing for them—but him. One afternoon the shooting-party passed me on their way home as I rambled through the woods alone. I did not offer to join them, but Lord Heronmere stopped at my side, and the rest passed discreetly on to the house. How vexed I felt! it was in my heart to be pettish with the poor fellow, but I thrust the cross inclination from me, and turned to him, smiling. "Have you had good sport?" I asked.

"Not very," he answered; "I shot awfully badly—missed my bird half a dozen times. I suppose I was thinking of something else."

He stood still, and I was forced to glance upward. He looked so brave and bright standing there, his gun across his shoulder and the setting sun slanting through the boughs upon his stalwart frame, I could not help but feel a little touched at the wistful look in his kind eyes.

"Miss Pauline," he said, "won't you have pity on me?" It seemed so odd, this big strong man asking pity at the hands of a poor little forlorn maiden like me, that I half smiled. He took my hand and said again, "Won't you try to love me?"

My face grew quite grave in a moment, but I did not take my hand away—left it trembling with his clasp tightening upon it.

"Lord Heronmere," I said, faltering, "I must tell you—they forbade me, but I owe all your kindness some better return than silence now. If my heart were not quite full of some one else, so full that I have not a thought or wish away from him, I believe I might have come to care for you; but I am engaged by every tie I consider sacred and binding, by the whole strength of my love, to some one I am not allowed to name to you."

The kind brave face turned so white—it was his hand that shook now—mine that clasped his.

"It was hardly fair to me," he uttered in a low voice.

"But papa does not consider me engaged; he has refused his consent—I am not even allowed to see George—to see—"

"Thank you for telling me," Lord Heronmere said, sighing.

"Will you keep my secret?" I pleaded. "Ah! if you would only be so generous as to pretend you care for me no longer, to go away and seem as if you had forgotten me. If—"

He was silent for some moments, his mouth working and the broad open brow contracting as if to keep back the signs of a passing weakness. Then he looked at me, and seeing my wistful eyes, said:

"You ask me a hard thing."

"But you are generous," I pleaded, and in that moment I felt I loved him like a brother.

"I will show how I love you by obeying you," he uttered, in a low, shaken voice. And then the color flushed into his face as, still holding my hand, he looked into my eyes and then downward at my lips.

"Let me kiss your hand," he said at last, in low, pleading tones.

I had understood his glance. I felt that great, surging pity for him that I think any good-hearted woman would feel for a man who held her in a great hopeless love. I put up my face quite simply to him. If George himself had been there, and known my heart, he could have taken no exception to the impulse which prompted that action. For a moment the keen light flashed into Lord Heronmere's eyes; then it died away, and he stooped and kissed me gravely on the cheek, as he would have kissed a dear sister. "Thank you," he said, in a low voice, and without another word he walked on to the house.

Months rolled on, the year came to an end, and George and I met again. Shall I ever forget that day? My life has not been a long one—not very long, I am only twenty-four. Ah! if it would please God to let me die soon, to drift away out of this great lonely world, where no one cares much for me, where no one would greatly miss me! Hush! I am forgetting; my story is not done yet. I have had some very, very happy days; shall we have good at the hand of the Lord, and not evil? That day, of all others, is to be marked with a white stone.

I think papa and mamma must have forgotten what anniversary it was, for they had gone away on a visit, and I was at home alone. Doris had been married a month.

It was a bright spring day with a hot sun, and I adorned myself in white muslin, with the peach-colored ribbons in my hair that George had loved to see me wear. I knew he would come; I had a keen presentiment that I should meet him in the woods, and thither I went. Standing there, leaning against the broad trunk of an ancient tree, I saw him come toward me with the quick, impatient step I knew so well. I could not move, my heart beat so thick and fast; a strange faintness crept over me. A few minutes and he had caught me to his breast with an eager, passionate cry, and was raining kisses upon my shrinking face and trembling hands. The great glad tears poured down my cheeks; his voice was shaken too as he said:

"Little darling Pauline—my own at last!"

We were married; and ah! how divinely happy we were! how we loved each other!

One can not be quite satisfied in this world; there is an alloy in our greatest pleasures, perhaps to mould our characters into firmness and truth, as base metal hardens the plastic gold into endurance. Papa was bitterly angered at the marriage, but he had given his promise and would not depart from it. He had trusted that the year of absence would have been too hard a test, for George's truth at least; he had fancied that a glimpse of the paradise of fashion and luxury would have given me new ideas on the value of wealth and position. In vain is a snare set in the sight of any bird; we had seen through it all, we were not one whit altered.

We were living in London, in apartments. I did not mind the least that the house was not in a very fashionable neighborhood, or that the rooms were furnished in the gimcrack style known to cheap furniture-vendors as the Louis Quatorze—oh, the unutterable sacrilege of fathering any thing so vulgar and tawdry upon the Grand Monarque! But I think it grated a little upon George, who had been used to luxury and pomp from his childhood up. Of course, it was natural that he should chafe at genteel poverty, which he vowed was more degrading than absolute beggary. I felt keenly what it must be to him to come from his luxurious club to the little musty sitting-room, and be compelled to dine off greasy steaks, or worse still, the stringy baked biped dignified by the name of chicken, which alternated our untempting fare. I did not mind one whit, but I thought regretfully as I looked, with the happy pride of possession, at the handsome face opposite to me, I thought how he must miss the recherché, sociable little club and Richmond dinners, and began to reproach myself with selfishness in wanting to have him always with me. At last, with a heart-breaking effort, I resolved to sacrifice my pleasure to his comfort. So I besought him to dine now and then at his club, and to mix a little in the society he had been used to. I could not expect his friends to come and see me in those inelegant lodgings—he did not even care for them to know where he lived. He refused to leave me at first, but yielded when I pressed him. I was very miserable on the evenings when he dined out. I drank my solitary cup of tea, having no heart to eat, and looked wistfully out of window at the dull street. George did not like me to go out alone. Sometimes I cried a little, but then I comforted myself that he was happy, and I loved him so dearly that I would have given up every thing in the world for him. If it crossed my mind sometimes with a shadow of pain that he could be happy away from me, I checked the thought, arguing to myself that men and women were different. Ah, would I not rather have dined day after day on the most miserable burnt-up chop with him beside me than have partaken of a banquet in Olympus that he could not share? It was hard when he began to stay out late, not coming home until one or two in the morning; but I always sat up for him. How I listened for every cab-wheel, to every footstep in the deserted street, until I was almost mad with apprehensions for his safety. What should I do if I lost my darling—if he were taken from me? I thought sometimes he would be: I idolized him so. But then when he came I could welcome him with a glad smile, and if he was vexed with me for sitting up I declared I had been reading a book it was impossible to put down. Now and then I wondered a little that he accepted my stories so readily, that he did not notice how invariably I sat up until his return, that he did not see my cheeks were pale and my eyes hollow. But we were very happy. Sometimes he took me to the Park, or we went down to Greenwich or Richmond in a hansom and dined there; these were grand gala days. I gave him all my money, pretending I did not care for dress, and learned to be a wonderful seamstress, turning and refurbishing up my wardrobe that he might not notice how shabby my clothes were getting.

A little girl was born to us—born dead. I grieved sadly at first, but was consoled. It was all for the best; if she had lived she would have taken me too much from him.

One autumn we went to Homburg. George seemed to enjoy the place thoroughly; he met so many friends, the life suited him; and if he was glad, was I not thoroughly, unfeignedly happy? If he would only have kept away from the tables. Lord Heronmere was there; he came and spoke very kindly to me, but George did not like him, and so I assumed a cold reserved manner when we met, and he, being sensitive, ceased to talk to me. One afternoon—one miserable afternoon—ah, how well I remember it!—George came into our little entresol at the hotel, moody and miserable.

"I don't know what I shall do, Pauline," he groaned. "I've lost five-and-twenty pounds at that cursed table, and I have only five pounds to pay our bill and take us home."

My heart froze within me, but I loved him too well to reproach him. What could we do?—there seemed no escape from the awful abyss of impecuniosity yawning at our feet. To borrow from his friends would be a frightful humiliation: it was no use writing home. Suddenly he glanced at my hand, and, with a thrill of pain, I understood the glance. I wore the diamond ring he had given me before we married: it was my sole possession of value—the one thing I prized. Slowly I drew it from my finger and passed it over to him. He put his arms round me, kissed me a thousand times, called me his darling wife, and I was consoled.

He was my idol: for his sake I broke God's Commandment daily: did I not deserve my punishment? Ah me! it came swiftly enough.

One winter evening I sat alone. We had a house of our own now—very small it was, but still our own. The rain pattered dismally on the windows, the wind howled in the chimney—a miserable night, when one thought remorsefully of the poor and homeless, and felt it almost a sin to sit with drawn curtains and bright fire by the hearth. There was a loud peal at the bell: a sudden fear crept over me: voices in the hall: the door was thrown open and papa came in. I had not seen him since my marriage.

"Papa!" I cried, running toward him; "what is the matter?"

He took me in his arms and kissed me very kindly.

"Poor child! poor child!" he said, pityingly.

"What is it?" I muttered, in agony, my white lips almost refusing their office.

"You are to come with me at once, Pauline; the cab is at the door."

"Where is he?" I moaned. "Oh, papa! he is not dead?"

"Would to God he were!" said my father, between his teeth.

He was not dead—then nothing on earth could hurt me much.

"What do you mean?" I asked, quietly enough now.

"You are not his wife, Pauline."

"Not his wife?" I gasped, staggering with sudden sickness. "Not his wife?"

"No, my poor child; his wife is living in Italy. Her brother came to me yesterday. They have been trying for years to discover the blackguard."

The room swam, a mortal sickness came over me, and I fainted. When I came to my senses my father and the two servants were bending over me.

"Let them fetch your bonnet and cloak," papa said; "we must go at once."

"Where?" I asked; but he made a sign to me to remember the servants were present. I sent them out.

"Where?" I said again, faintly.

"Home with me, dear, to your mother."

I shook my head. He glanced at me in surprise.

"What do you mean, Pauline?"

I felt sick and giddy, but nerved myself for a great effort.

"If he had fifty wives I would not leave him—"

"Pauline!"

"Papa! he is all the world to me!" I cried, in a broken voice.

"My poor child, I pity you from my soul; but choice is not open to you—you must give him up, and leave his house with me to-night."

"I will never leave him."

"Pauline! do you know what the world will call you?"

"I do not care so long as he is left to me."

Papa urged, entreated, commanded me—all fell alike on my impassive ears; at last, in great anger, he left me.

The weary hours rolled on; an anguish almost more than mortal overshadowed me. That he should have deceived me—my darling, my idol! should have brought me into shame and dishonor; made me nameless, a reproach among men. Even in this hour my love fought against all condemnation of him. "Perhaps," I said to myself, with painful effort to believe him less guilty, "perhaps he believed her dead; when he comes all will be explained." But whatever the result—let every thing be black against him—I would stay. My lips framed themselves into a prayer; then I stopped, shuddering—I pray with the resolve to sin against God firm in my heart! ah, what mockery! "I shall never be able to pray any more," I cried, in the depths of my great despair; "never be able to go to church—never talk to him of good things, and try to lead him in the right way again." And then I sobbed, with a sudden and great pain that pierced my shrinking soul: "If he lets me, I will go."

Then, after my long waiting, I heard his key turn in the door—he had come. I could not go to meet him as my wont was: in shivering pain I stood quite still by the dying embers on the hearth. The door opened; my husband—oh God! not my husband—came in.

"The fire out, Pauline?" he said, impatiently; "and it's a cursed cold night."

Then, seeing that I made no answer, nor moved toward him, he came up close and kissed me. A great shiver ran through my frame.

"What is the matter, child? Are you ill?" he asked, anxiously.

A choking sob rose in my throat. How should I ever tell him?

"Poor little wife!" he said, tenderly, putting his arms round me. Then I burst into a great passion of tears, and laid my head upon his shoulder.

"Oh George! is it true? Am I not your wife?"

I felt the quick start as I lay upon his breast, and my heart died within me.

"Who says so?" he muttered. "What have they told you?"

"Papa has been here to-night. He came to take me home."

"Pauline, my darling, you won't leave me? Oh, child, don't think too hardly of me! I swear to you I believed her dead when I married you; and afterward I had not the courage to tell you the truth. It was years ago, when I was quite a boy. She was an intriguing Italian, old enough to be my mother."

"George, if I stay I shall lose my soul."

"And if you leave me I shall go headlong to the devil! Oh, Pauline! if you make this sacrifice for me I will be every thing to you—more than the most loving husband—only don't go away from me, darling."

With his arms round me, his entreating voice that was more than all the world else to me ringing in my ears, what could I do but yield?

But life was never the same to me again; there was no gladness in my heart, no peace in my soul. Only my love for him absorbed my whole being, increased and strengthened with each new sacrifice I made to it, until it grew into one great agony of apprehension lest I should lose it. His wife—that I should have to write the bitter word—did not prosecute him. She was leading a life that would not bear inquiry, and only wanted money. So we were poorer than ever. Ah me! what that life was for me, who in all that had befallen me had never known what it was to doubt him! A time of terror, of anguish, of remorse; and yet when I look back from this present to that past, it seems heaven to me, because I was still with him. But there were no longer any gala days, no drives to Richmond, no boxes at the theatre. I hated to go out, lest I might meet some contemptuous glance, some cruel sneer. For I never forgot that I, whose life had been chaste and pure, whose sin was loving too well, might and would be classed with those who lived in open vice; might be swept past with cold disdain by the less unhappy, less sorely tried. In the days when people had called me pretty I had never felt any pride in my good looks, except when George praised them. Now I looked with anxious inquiry into my looking-glass, watching with as eager pain the dawn of a wrinkle or the deepening of a line as any beauty in the world of fashion, fearful of a decreasing sway, might have done. I could no longer have that happy confidence of young wives that says to itself: "We shall grow old together; as we live day by day in sight of each other he will not notice if I change: I shall be his wife always. Ah, that was the scorching bitterness—I was not his wife—and some day he would look at me, perhaps, and see that I had grown old and faded; and then when he met young fresh girls, like I was once, he would remember that no real tie bound him to me. I had loved my God and my church; now my shrinking feet dared not tread the sacred porch. My trembling knees dared not bow before Him whose law I transgressed. Could I hope he would grant a prayer of mine, though my tears were blood?"

And as time wore on, I saw with painful keenness that a change was coming over George; that he was growing moody and discontented. He was not unkind to me; but there was no longer the tenderness of the old days in his manner. He did not care for my caresses now, given in trembling, given despairingly, in a mute agony lest they wearied him. He was often out: when he came home not saying, as in times past, where he had been; what he had seen and heard: almost he seemed to resent my questioning.

Fifteen months passed. One day a letter came for me in a handwriting I did not recognize. The contents were these: "Do you know that Captain Scarlett's wife is dead, and that he might marry you lawfully to-morrow if he chose? Ask him who the beautiful heiress is, by whose carriage he stands every day in the Park?" A great trembling seized me—the paper fell from my shivering hands. Then I reproached myself vehemently for putting any faith in an anonymous communication. I waited in an agony of impatience until George's return; then without a word I placed the letter in his hands. As he read he grew white to the lips, and his hand shook. He remained staring at the paper without speaking.

"George!" I gasped, and in that moment of mortal agony my voice sounded strange to me, like the voice of one dying.

"It is quite true," he answered, doggedly.

"Is it true you love that woman?" I asked; a bitterness for which there are no words creeping toward my heart.

"Yes, that is true, too; but of course I shall marry you if you wish it."

Oh, my God! was ever a sin punished like my sin? I stood gazing at him with fixed burning eyeballs that were dry of tears—my tongue clove to my mouth—my heart died in mortal agony within me. Then I moved away to the window like one in a dream, and he left the room and the house without another word to me.

I have never seen him again. It is two years since that day when I died—died and went into the Hades where the soul suffers torture. And he—he lives happy, they say—is prosperous—has a name in the world. Would I have it otherwise? Would I know him suffering, haunted by an anguish of remorse? Nay, that would I not; for it was him I loved, not my own self. Surely my sin is expiated; surely mercy will not let this torture last. Daily, nightly, through my bitter tears, I cry with Thekla: "I have lived and loved—let me die!"

THE TOWN AND COUNTRY BEAUTIES.

LOUNGING all the morning, dreaming
O'er the novel's witching page;
Interest in her dark eyes beaming,
Fancied woes her heart engage.

Then abroad when fashion streameth,
In gay marts she shines an hour,
Choosing what rich dress besemeth
That young form, to aid its power.

In the Park where steeds are prancing,
See her curb her own so bold;
Habit sweeping, eyes bright glancing,
Hat on locks of sunny gold.

Now where voices sweet are gushing,
As if seraphs dropped below,
Charmed she listens, cheek soft flushing,
And her jewels all aglow.

Or in halls of pride and splendor,
Slow she moves, and lights the scene;
Dazzling lamps more dazzling render Beauty's stately, peerless queen.

Then she dances, graceful, swimming,
Soft, rich cloud her robes of white;
Sure her heart with bliss is brimming,
Maid so envied, star so bright.

O'er that ball joy, on her pillow,
Flushed and wearied, now she sinks,
But her bosom—restless billow—
Knows not sleep; it aches and thinks.

Country beauty—softly blowing,
Morning's roses prank the sky;
Up—her cheek as fresh is glowing,
And as bright her clear blue eye.

With light foot and dark-wreathed tresses,
Out she trips where flow'rets shine;
And her heart earth's glory blesses,
Drinking fragrance—Nature's wine.

Now she stays where boughs are sighing,
Near the plashing waterfall;
Round her birds are chirping, flying,
Gathering at her well-known call.

Noon upon the hamlet sleepeth;
See her there among the poor.
Soothing many a heart that weepeth,
Like a sunbeam at each door.

Eve in crimson drapes the mountain,
Warms the rose-decked, ancient pile,
Turns to gold the garden fountain,
Earth and sky one peaceful smile.

Hark! her pure, sweet song is swelling,
Each entrancing, liquid note,
Bosom thanks for mercies telling—
Sounds that up, like incense, float.

Virtue forms her robe of splendor,
Jewels—see her sparkling eyes!
Fancy scarce might lovelier render
New-born Eve in paradise.

Spirits kind, to earth descending,
From each harm that maiden keep!
O'er her pillow viewless bending,
Kiss her into balmy sleep!

COSTUMES OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

MASKS were first worn in France during the reign of Francis I., and they were not without their use in after-times of civil strife, albeit, like most other things, subject to abuse. The first pair of silk stockings in France was worn by Henry II., consort of Catherine de Medicis, although it was not until a later date that a manufactory for stockings was instituted in the Bois de Boulogne, which locality had long been a favorite resort both of princes and penitents. Before stocking-making became a matter of French trade it was customary for ladies to knit hose; and previous to the time when hosiery was thought of in an elastic form it was customary for people of rank to case their legs with stuffs—more or less costly—bound on by bandelettes, such as those worn by Charlemagne.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NINIE M.—Long loose sacques or redingotes are worn of the same material as the dress. These should always be belted in at the waist. We have already given numerous illustrations and descriptions of these articles. Scarf talmas, such as we have illustrated and described, are worn. Shawls are always suitable for elderly ladies. Mohairs and alpaca for traveling dresses can be bought at fifty and sixty cents a yard. Buff linen may be bought as low as twenty-five cents. Serge is $1 25.

ANNIE.—Will find all the information she desires about riding habits in this Number of this paper. Our arrangements will not permit us to give a pattern at present.

Mrs. THEODORE COX.—We can not recommend any thing as certain to restore the hair.

Mrs. F. N. H.—Seven-eighths is the proper width of dotted Swiss muslin for curtains. There are two widths to each window. The fluted ruffle is about three inches wide. It should surround the curtain, except at the top, and is made of plain Swiss muslin. The bands looping the back are of dotted Swiss, double, an inch wide, with the fluted ruffle on either side. Some use wide linen gimp, but the ruffled bands are prettiest. A pretty fashion for the country is to line the curtains with soft pink or very light blue silk.

A. A. B.—It is customary to gore all the widths of a short dress, but the back widths are sloped less than the three front widths. Muslin skirts are gored. You will find directions concerning them in this Number of the Bazar. Gros grain is corded silk. Poul de soie is also corded, but is much softer than gros grain.

Mrs. DENNIS.—You can adapt the pattern you speak of by changing the contour of the front.

Riding Costumes.

Fig. 1.—Lady's riding dress, composed of a black hat with low crown and flat brim of average width, trimmed with a broad black figured galloon confined by a gold buckle. Loose jacket, coming a little way below the waist, with the corners rounded in front, and trimmed up the front and above the arm-holes with gold buttons. Broad pocket lapels. Sleeves somewhat loose at the elbow, and trimmed from there to the wrist with a row of gold buttons. Vest buttoned to the throat with gold buttons. Long skirt, plain in front and full behind. Standing collar and blue cravat.

Fig. 2.—Gentleman's riding dress. Low-crowned hat, with flat brim of average width. Maroon jacket, closed with one button, cut away and rounded in front, and adjusted to the waist; with square pocket lapel under the hip, and somewhat loose coat-sleeve, with cuff. Vest with standing collar, and long pantaloons of light Havana cloth, in narrow vertical stripes. Orange cravat, turned down collar, straw colored gloves, and high riding boots.

Demi Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—Dress of light green foulard, with low bodice, worn over a puffed Swiss muslin under-waist. Over-skirt caught up on the left side of the front with a large satin bow, and trimmed with long rounded tabs, bound with green satin, which simulate a sort of peplum. The waist and belt are trimmed in the same manner. Under-skirt of white foulard.

Fig. 2.—Dress of gray poplin, trimmed with bias folds and buttons of gray silk. Marie Antoinette fichu of the same material.

Fig. 3.—Dress of brown cretonne, trimmed with brown satin piping and buttons, extending from the throat down the right side of the skirt to the bottom, as shown in the illustration.

Fig. 4.—Dress of lilac alpaca, trimmed with bias folds of satin of a darker shade, which simulate a scarf on the right side of the skirt, and are finished with passementerie grelots.

Fig. 5.—This black silk dress is very effectively trimmed with rouleaux of violet silk, which form a heading to the flounce on the bottom, and trim the waist and sash as shown in the illustration.

SEVRES PORCELAIN.

IN any and every discussion of French porcelain, the Imperial Manufactory of Sèvres must always claim primary consideration. It is from this establishment that France derives so large a portion of the ceramic objets de luxe which adorn her palaces and the mansions of her nobility and wealthy classes. The Sèvres porcelain would be out of place wherever it was not surrounded by befitting accompaniments in the way of costly furniture and splendid decorations. In its soft yet brilliant coloring, its glowing landscapes, its gay figure-subjects, often set in a frame-work of gilding, it not unfrequently almost rises to the dignity of Fine Art. It must be borne in mind that in its production a very large staff of most skillful and thoroughly-educated artists are employed; and it would be strange indeed if, with such aid and with all other essential means and appliances at command, the most successful results were not attained. But though the Imperial Manufactory unquestionably takes the lead in certain qualities of its ware, there are other producers, both in France and elsewhere, who have proved themselves not altogether unworthy to rank with it.

How far the ornamentation to which porcelain of every kind, and of most countries, is frequently subjected—we refer especially to pictures of the Boucher and Watteau class, and to figure-scenes generally, as well as to landscapes—is the most suitable and most in accordance with strict propriety and refined taste, must be matter of opinion; it is, and has long been, the fashion, and therefore, it may be presumed, has passed the bounds of criticism. The Etruscans and Greeks certainly decorated their pottery with figures; but they had not learned the art of applying the painter's pharmacopœia to their productions; and if they had so learned, we may reasonably doubt their using it for such purposes.

Where beauty and magnificence are the objects aimed at—where perfection of design, and the gorgeousness of color, and purity of material, and delicate workmanship are sought after—whatever the cost may be, it is only reasonable to expect that the examples exhibited in the Sèvres court should be what we found them. And yet the productions of to-day are scarcely an advance upon those which were sent out from the factory a century ago: they had even then reached a point of excellence which no subsequent scientific knowledge and practical experience have been able, greatly, if at all, to surpass. We recognize in the recent productions better, because more elegant and symmetrical, forms, and improved taste in the decorative paintings introduced; but beyond these qualities of refined progression there is little to distinguish old Sèvres porcelain from new.

They who are unacquainted with the nature of the ceramic arts should know that there are two kinds of porcelain—one made of soft paste, and called by the French pâte tendre; the other of hard paste, termed pâte dure. The materials differ in each; the latter being made of powdered granite and feldspar, the former of a combination of chemical substances; the hard porcelain requires but one firing, the soft is subjected to two bakings. The result, when each has passed through the artist's hands for painting, is, that the surface of the latter, when painted, is somewhat rough under the touch, while the former is perfectly smooth. At Sèvres they make both, though the examples of soft porcelain are of secondary importance; in England, our principal manufacturers use the other. Old Sèvres may be distinguished from modern by the difference just explained, inasmuch as it is almost without exception made of pâte tendre; and the colors, if less brilliant, are softer and richer, because they have sunk into the glaze of the materials used. And as in a picture on canvas hard coloring produces in the distance what artists know as hardness of texture, so does it also when employed in ceramic wares. Speaking of color, we must not omit to mention the beautiful and delicate polish green of some of the Sèvres porcelain; it would be impossible to produce any tint so agreeable to the eye, and so adapted to the requirements of good taste, as this.

RIDING COSTUMES.

DEMI TOILETTES.

PERSONALS.—STATION D.

"BUT, dear Mr. Lumpkin," cries Jenny Jenks. "I want to make my own experience, you know." And then I sigh and say to myself, was ever any thing else so costly in the buying, and so worthless in the giving, as this same experience? And then my wife lights the gas, and we all go to dinner, and the dinner is excellent; are not Mrs. Lumpkin's dinners always excellent? And still I find myself pondering on the case of Jenny Jenks.

Miss Jenks is of the kittenish order of girls. She is round and plump. She has a baby face and innocent eyes. She can be sweet and tart and perverse and bewitching, just as a child is, all at once. In fact, she is a full-grown child; physically a woman, mentally a baby. Baby likes what is bright and glaring. So does she. Baby is sublimely superior to reason. So is she. Baby has a diabolical ingenuity in getting itself caught by the neck and skirts and fingers. She has the same ingenuity for what she calls "scraps." Baby is afflicted with an evil spirit of research into every place or thing that can bite, pinch, nip, smash, and, in one word, hurt it. So is she, metaphorically. Baby is always trying to put its fingers into the "pretty candle." So is she; metaphorically again! But here the parallel ends. Baby can be taken away and quenched in bed, or in nurse's lap. Miss Jenks has the liberty, as well as the stature, of womanhood. We may shout till we are hoarse, "naughty candle! Burn Jenny! Burn me once!" and she can still say, as she did to me,

"But I want to feel what a burn is like, for myself, you know."

Now, in such a case, what is a man to do? Jenny is visiting my niece Clara, who is as much of a baby as herself. They crimp each other's heads, and wear gowns cut from the same piece of goods. They both wear frills, and rosettes for skirts, and ribbons, and a flower for bonnets. They are tightly girt in at the waist, and have short curls, and long curls, and dog-collars, and high heels, and a Grecian bend, and nice ankles, and ribbon by the piece, and distracting little veils. They are rosy and saucy and coquettish; very pretty, in fact, excepting the Grecian bend; and they go strolling down Fifth Avenue and Broadway, and think that every fine-looking man with good gloves and shoulders is a hero, and christen every woman in absurd train and inaccessible bonnet "splendid." Fancy letting loose two such infants in a city like New York! You know that extremes meet, and that few old sinners are more reckless than a baby. And these girls say and do things, in the innocence and ignorance of their hearts, that make me, a fifty-years-old uncle, shudder. Still, what am I to do about it, fast in my shop, while Mrs. Lumpkin is equally fast in her kitchen?

You ask, what things? Here is an example. For a week they have been shut up in the house, for no good cause, you may be sure. Busy over some enginery of mischief—"walking suits," I was told—and only appearing at meals, with hair in crimping pins, and threads and snippings of some gray stuff sticking all over them; still they were safe in the house, and I breathed freer; till on a certain Friday I heard a bouncing and rustling outside of my door, and, opening it, behold Jenny and Clara!

Now I have no more eye for details of millinery than a beetle; but I always experienced from my youth up a vague approving consciousness of white frills and cuffs, trim boots, fresh hats, gloves, and faces, dainty collars, soft curls, flowing outlines, and flimsy things of lace. Consequently, though I try to look grim, I feel myself softening, and the irreverent minxes find me out at once, and kiss me, and dance about me, and go away flushed, no doubt, with this their first conquest, and leave me confounded. Full of malice against my unlucky sex they get into a stage and ride about. Somebody looks at them; somebody like me from "my youth up," only he is in his youth yet, and has not arrived at the "up." Jenny discovers him—a woman who can not see through her eyelids is unworthy of the name of woman—steals a look at the looker, and observes that he has a dark mustache. Stranger looks away. Jenny, very curious to know if he will look again, steals another glance, gets caught in the act, and blushes crimson. Clara finds it out by this time, and takes notes. Stranger is curious to see if Jenny is looking. Jenny is curious to see if stranger is looking. Both steal glances, and their eyes meet. By this time stranger's companions have found it out also. Jenny is quite resolved to look that way no more, but does so want to know if he is looking still. Looks toward the glass at the upper end of the stage. A similar brilliant device has occurred to the stranger, and their eyes meet in the glass. Jenny pouts, turns her back squarely, and for the rest of the ride looks indistinctly down Broadway. And the next morning Clara finds in the paper the following advertisement:

"Will the shorter of the two young ladies, dressed alike in gray poplin walking dresses, trimmed with gray satin, and who rode on Friday afternoon from Tenth to Canal streets, in a Fifth Avenue stage, favor the gentleman who sat on her left with her address, and oblige an ardent admirer? X. Y. Z., Station D Post-office, N. Y."

Clara read and re-read the advertisement. They did wear gray poplin. It was trimmed with gray satin. They did ride from Tenth to Canal streets. Jenny was the shorter, and the gentleman who stared at her so did sit at her left hand. Clara flew up stairs, her finger on the advertisement. Jenny was brushing out her crimps before the toilette table. Clara thrust the paper under her eyes, and cried, "Read that."

"Will the shorter of the two young ladies," commenced Jenny, wonderingly, and then broke off to giggle. "Now, Clara, I don't believe it."

"Don't believe what?"

"That this is intended for us."

"Intended for you, you mean."

"Of the two young ladies," continued Jenny, "who were dressed alike in gray poplin, trimmed with gray satin, and who—Why, Clara, they are not gray. They are nearer a cream tint."

"Well, do you expect a man to know about shades and tints?"

"It is very odd," observes Jenny. "There certainly was a gentleman."

Clara, sarcastically—"I should think there was."

"And he did stare so at us."

"You, you mean."

"I could not even look that way. Impertinent creature! He wore a light coat."

"No, it was dark."

"Oh yes! I remember. Do you suppose he thinks I will answer him?"

"If he does not, I should say that he was a fool to advertise."

Jenny tossed her head.

"Then he is mistaken. I shall do nothing of the sort. Not that I think there is any harm in it, but I don't choose. Let him get an introduction."

"But people can not always get an introduction."

"Let him haunt the theatres and churches, then," replied Jenny, despotically, "and go to half a dozen receptions a night to meet me. That is what I should do."

Clara said nothing. Jenny brushed her hair, and read the advertisement again.

"It is very respectful."

"Yes, and well written. He is a gentleman."

"Oh, of course. But I will not write, though I could write, and still he need never know who I am."

"Certainly not." Clara evidently sided with the advertisement.

"But then, if I did write, what could I say? Address N., Station D. Post-office. No harm could come from that. Suppose we try."

Clara bridling.

"Oh! I have nothing to do with it."

"Then I can not write it. I could never do such a thing alone."

And of course I need not say what happened next. You see already that the two young simpletons wrote the letter and posted it.

It happened about that time that Clara received a letter from her mother (Mrs. Standish), in which was a message for her aunt (Mrs. Lumpkin), and at dinner Clara recollected that she had received a letter, also that it was from her mother, also that it contained a message for Mrs. Lumpkin, but forgot the message, doubtless because of the more important business that she had on hand. Great events turn on little hinges. It happened that I was just going up stairs, and I was commissioned to bring down the letter from the pocket of Clara's gray walking suit which hung in the clothes-press.

I hate fumbling in pockets. First, I can never find the pocket. Next, when found, I can never get into it. I went up stairs smarting with a keen sense of personal injury. I dashed madly into the pocket of the first gray suit that I saw, ran my finger on one of their horrid needles, found the letter, came down stairs in a pet, opened the letter in a fume, and read out,

"Dear Miss N—"

"What?" said Mrs. Lumpkin. I looked again.

"That is the way it reads," said I. "Dear Miss N—"

"Oh, Mr. Lumpkin! That is my letter," exclaimed Jenny, coloring furiously and springing to seize it; but mean time I had made out certain such suspicious words on the page as "warm admiration," "sense of honor," "grant," "meeting," "cruel," "confidence," "distrust," and all this from an individual with no better account to give of himself than X. Y. Z. Therefore I made bold to retain it, on which Miss Jenny burst into tears.

Some men are always to be overcome by tears, while other some have a sort of aqua scutum temperament. I am of the latter order, and I waited. When her tears were done, Jenny turned sulky; but I am not afraid of sulks, and by a little more waiting and some cross-questioning I had at last the whole story about the stranger in the omnibus and the advertisement in the morning's paper, after which came up the question with which I started, What could I do about it? Jenny had intimated, with some tartness, that I was not her uncle, thank Heaven; and if I had been, still I should have hesitated. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church, and there is no such guano for any sort of a crop as persecution. While I hesitated the girls sat as if expecting a sentence of doom. Indeed Jenny and Clara were both crying, and Mrs. Lumpkin evidently thought that I was a perfect brute.

"Confound it!" cried I, in a sudden passion. "I might as well have a couple of year-old babies toddling and balancing on the sill of an open window in the third story, and be forbidden to lay a finger on either of them."

"But I do not see the harm," sniffed Jenny.

"Don't suppose you did, my dear, else you would not have done it. But it does seem as if you should understand without being told that respectable and agreeable people never need to take trouble of this sort to enlarge their circle of acquaintances."

"But I am sure I am respectable and agreeable," answered Jenny, slyly; "and I have taken trouble of this sort."

"Because you are a little fool," said I, seizing my hat to get out before I should say any thing stronger. I was in a rage with myself. To tell a young lady that she is a fool is not to convince her of the fact, and the only argument that I had advanced this unreasoning creature had knocked in the head. More than this, I had established for myself the reputation of an ogre. At supper my wife waited upon me with a sort of scared attention, and pressed upon me a fine Sally Lunn, which I wrathfully felt had been prepared to appease me, while the girls appeared with red eyes and hair tucked behind their ears, and said "yes, Sir," and "no, Sir," and ate about half an inch of supper, and drooped visibly before me, as if I had been a Nero or Caligula. And of all feminine artifices I vow this is the vilest which treats a peace-loving man, and an humble servant of the whole sex like myself, as a ferocious despot till he is half convinced of his own brutishness. And all because I had dared to insist that the moon is not made of green cheese.

I came home intending to make peace; but finding myself regarded in the light of a monster resolved to be at least a consistent monster, and retired behind my newspaper with a face worthy of Blunderbore himself. My wife slipped away to visit a neighbor. The girls had vanished long before. I read my paper as brutally as possible, and then, as rain was pattering against the window, began to think of bed, when the door-bell rang.

"Tom Wilkins," said I to myself, and Tom Wilkins it was; come, of course, on the night of all others on which I could not introduce him to the girls; and, as I knew that they would not be visible, and the sitting-room was down at the heel, in looks I mean, and the drawing-room given over, as it always is, to the dumps and blackness of darkness, I took him straight to my Den.

My Den, or Pen, as it is variously termed by my womankind, is really a cozy little room, where I keep a writing-table, a lounge, my books, and a fire; and on either corner of this lounge was curled up Jenny and Clara, hair down about their shoulders, and in slippers, sacques, and skirts. They were sure of no company, because of the rain, and sure of me, because I never entered the Den after I had once commenced my paper. Also, they felt much more wretched in disheveled hair and sacques than they could possibly have done in braids and tight-fitting waists; and so, curled up, as I have rehearsed before, were holding an indignation meeting, when they were startled by the tramp of boots and my voice saying,

"This way, Tom. Here is the Den!"

Both sprang to their feet in utter horror. There was but one door to the Den; that on which I had my hand even now. There was no deep window; no curtains. I abhor curtains as in a conspiracy with the doctors. No possible place for hiding, in short, except a shallow closet, and no time for hesitation. As they huddled into the closet the Philistines, Tom and myself, were upon them.

"Nice Den, this," said Tom, looking about him. "Have you any writing things here? The fact is I dropped in to write a letter that I had forgotten, and that I must post at station D to-night."

"Station D!" I echoed, involuntarily.

"Yes," scribbling his note as he talked, "I have a fair correspondent there; at least I suppose she is fair. How does this read?"

"DEAR MISS N.,—I have heard nothing from you, though I have called twice at the office. This suspense is too painful. I am sure you will not willingly prolong it. Yours, X. Y. Z."

Should you think that was sufficiently distracted to bring an answer?

Here, then, was Jenny's correspondent, Tom Wilkins, a fine friend for such a piece of simplicity!

"What do you think?" insisted Tom.

"Hum!" said I, very much afraid lest I should say what I did think. "I really can not say, Tom; but in my day we were more careful of a correspondence with a lady friend."

"Friend!" echoed Tom, with an indescribable intonation. "Why, this Miss N. is no friend of mine. I hardly know more about her than you do. In the stage the other day I saw a couple of pretty girls. You can see such girls any where. It is the ribbons and the back hair and the little hats that does it, you know: makes them pretty, I mean. There is no particular expression in such faces. However, the shorter of the girls caught me looking at her, and then she looked again, and then I looked again. You know how that is; and the other fellows chaffed me. Jim Morris offered to bet that she would not write to me; and so of course I put in a personal. Got a shade for this gas?"

"Yes, in the closet," and turning in my chair I pulled the door, but it stuck fast.

"Never mind," said Tom, carelessly; but I was curious to know why the door should stick that never stuck before, and I got up and pulled the handle. The door gave, but did not open. A third pull, and I heard a faint squeak; the door opened partially, and I saw Jennie and Clara, holding on by their nails, poor souls! and quite white with terror. I shut the door, muttering something about the shade, and sat down.

"Never mind," said Tom again. "As I was telling you, Jim bet that I could not get her to write, and I put in a personal to see if she would write; and by George, Sir, she did write sure enough!"

"Ah!" said I. In fact I could say nothing more. There are shower-bath laughs when somebody pulls the string by a joke, and you laugh instantly; and can not help yourself. And there are inundations of laugh; coming steadily; rising higher and higher, and on which you can speculate with a perfectly grave face, even while you feel its first thrills and ripples, and know that it will surely overtake you. This was my case. Thus far, when I thought of the girls holding the door with their nails, I had given a convulsive gurgle which could be turned off in a cough. For the future I could only pray that Tom would say something funny or go quickly.

"She wrote in a neat, little, school-girl hand," continued Tom, "and there I suppose the matter would have dropped, but Jim was not satisfied, and offered another bet that I could not get her to meet me. So I am bringing her up to the point, and she is coming on nicely. Says she could not think of such a thing; but they all say that. I am aware of the money as if Jim had paid it over."

"Yes," said I, somewhat irritated by these cool calculations about my little Jenny; "but have you ever thought of the other side, Tom? Suppose it was your sister on whom Jim Norris was betting?"

"An impossible supposition," answered Tom, coolly, closing his letter. "My sister, in fact, any one that I could like, could not be found in such an unwomanly position. Miss N. may be a very nice little girl; but—I can not put it in words—never could sermonize! but my ideal is a sort of girl that you would know when you looked at her could not accept a 'Station D.' admiration. That is all. Good-night. Much obliged. Good-night."

The door closed! I went back to the Den and there were the girls dancing about on the rug in such a rage that they forgot their hair and their dressing-sacques. I threw myself on the lounge and laughed till I cried.

"The villain!" cried Jenny. "The wretched cheat! I do not think it is gentlemanly! do you, Mr. Lumpkin? The matter would have dropped, but Jim Morris was not satisfied! oh! it is outrageous!"

I thought so too; but her looks and gestures were so inimitable that I could do nothing but laugh on.

"And 'we are all alike!' Did you hear that, Clara? It is our back hair and ribbons that makes us pretty. I suppose his ideal looks like a rail and knows a dozen languages."

"I hope when he marries her that she will scold him in every one of them," said Clara, viciously; "and at least he will lose his bet."

"I wish it would ruin him," chimed in Jenny; "and I declare, Mr. Lumpkin, you are too bad. You do nothing but laugh."

Which was true. But could mortal man do less?

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

THERE has been a great deal going on here among us all since I last wrote. In London this is our busiest and most exciting time. As soon as the Easter holidays are over the greater part of the gay world come back to the metropolis, and remain there until the middle or end of July; or perhaps the beginning of August, if the Houses of Parliament are still sitting, as they mostly do until about the 9th of that month. They generally contrive to get their business there over before the 12th, for on that day grouse-shooting begins in Scotland, and they most of them like to be there by that time. Just now Hyde Park is full morning and afternoon. Gay weddings, concerts, and balls are the order of the day, together with horticultural fêtes, the Opera, and all the other amusements of the season. With May-day the weather came in so warm and summer-like that it might be June or July almost, and those who know from sad experience the fickleness of our climate will understand how much sun and warmth have to do with our enjoyment. But in my letter to-day I do not mean to tell you about London and its doings. I want you to follow me to our sister isle, Ireland, toward which all eyes here are now turned, in consequence of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales, which has been attended with such a hearty welcome and so much Imperial pageant as we have rarely seen even in England. Before I begin on this now all-absorbing theme I must, however, tell you a little about the great Volunteer Review at Portsmouth, which is quite a national event.

Every Easter-Monday for the last nine years a Volunteer Review of some kind has taken place in England—sometimes at Brighton, sometimes at Dover, sometimes at Wimbledon, and elsewhere. This year Portsmouth was chosen, situated at a greater distance from London than any of the places before selected, but possessing many advantages which none of the others have had; for being a sea-port town, nearly opposite the Isle of Wight, some gun-boats and men-of-war were able to add their quota to the day's pageant. Of course the great difficulty was to bring down from London and elsewhere about 28,000 men within a short time, the distance from town being over seventy miles; this, however, was accomplished without the smallest difficulty, and the Portsmouth Volunteer Review of 1868 remains recorded on the pages of history as the grandest and most effective we have yet had. Every body seemed to be pouring down to Portsmouth during the Easter week, and you heard of nothing else for the time being but of this said Review. The inhabitants of the worthy town seemed to keep open house for ever so long; balls, concerts, and dinner-parties were going on day and night; and lodgings were scarcely to be had for money, certainly not for love.

The troops were reviewed by Sir George Buller, a Major-General, a C. B., and a K. C. B., who has served with much distinction in the Kaffir war and elsewhere. A variety of corps were engaged in it—cavalry, artillery, and infantry. By ten o'clock they were all assembled on the review ground. The march past on Southsea Common began about eleven; here stands had been erected for ladies, and the spectacle was in every way worthy of the occasion, much enhanced, too, by the extreme beauty of the weather and the surrounding scenery. The great event of the day, however, was the sham-fight, to be seen from Portsdown Hill, some four or five miles distant. The idea on which the plan of the mimic battle was founded was that the attacking force had landed on our shores, and had taken possession of the hill, and were further trying to seize the fortifications, which the defenders strenuously opposed. The gun-boats crept up the creek, the artillery roared, the troops manoeuvred, and at last, after some two hours' struggle, the attacking force were repulsed. Some hour or so afterward the invaders and the invaded made their way amicably homeward, save those who remained for the festivities in honor of the occasion. A great ball was given, under the patronage of the Duke of Wellington, Admiral and Mrs. Wellesley, Lord and Lady Constance Grosvenor, the Prince and Princess of Leiningen, and others of our nobility, besides many private entertainments. Portsmouth never yet had worn such a gala appearance; there was nothing but flags flying, illuminations, mottoes, and flowers to be seen every where. There wasn't a fault to be found in any way; it was a perfect success.

But now to turn to the Emerald Isle. The Royal visit has grown from a very small beginning into one of the grandest events of the present reign. It originated in a simple invitation from the Lord Lieutenant, the Marquis of Abercorn, to the Prince of Wales. At first little hopes were entertained that the Princess would accompany him; for you know another little princess or prince is expected to arrive sometime during the summer, and the doctors did not advise her Royal Highness to undertake the necessary fatigue; but she herself waved all difficulties of the kind, insisted on going, and went, to the intense delight of the Irish people. No mere words could convey the wild enthusiasm shown by them in her honor. They climbed up the wheels of the carriage to shake her by the hand; they cheered her till they were hoarse, and blessed her with a fervency truly Irish; flowers were literally showered upon her, and more than half the official addresses were filled with her praises. "Sure, did yer ever see such a Princess out of fairy-land?" said one. "Yer must stop with us forever, and never, never lave us," said another. They called her on all sides Countess of Dublin, the Irish title to which she has a right, and indeed there was nothing that they could do that they didn't do. If ever a woman was fairly worshipped it was the Princess Alexandra, and in truth no wonder. You can not help loving her: there is something so inexpressibly graceful, so lady-like, so gentle, so gracious in all she does and says, that what with her beauty and her winning smile she is altogether irresistible.

The visit extended from the 15th of April until the 24th. Their Royal Highnesses left London on the 14th, accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge, the Queen's cousin, and his young, handsome brother-in-law, Prince Teck, who married the popular favorite Princess Mary. Of course neither of their three little children went with them; the youngest remained at Marlborough House, and the other two went over to Osborne to stay with the Queen. On their journey the royal cortège stopped at Chester, in order to dine. This is a quaint old cathedral town of ours, full of remnants of old days, not the least curious of them the grand old wall that surrounds the city. A most enthusiastic reception greeted them here, and although they only remained an hour, crowds assembled to greet them, and an address was presented by the Mayor. The Princess, as is her wont, desirous not to disappoint those who seemed so anxious to see her, voluntarily walked round the coffee-room after dinner, in full view of the mass of people assembled in front of the Queen's Hotel.

From Chester they proceeded to Holyhead, and there arrived by half past ten. Here rockets were fired in their honor, volunteers turned out to greet them, and amidst deafening cheers they entered the Royal yacht the Victoria and Albert, accompanied by the Enchantress and various ships, such as the Achilles, the Warrior, the Defense, the Helicon, Minotaur, and others. They set sail at four, and arrived at Kingston Harbor by half past nine, and remained quietly on board until twelve, when a most wonderful reception was prepared for them. They landed on the very spot where the Queen did some years back, as recorded on a stone near by and very conspicuous. More cannons, more cheers, wilder and louder than ever, more red cloth, flowers, and crowds. So under the escort of the Twelfth Lancers—a regiment, by-the-by, very unpopular there on account of the part it was compelled to take against the Fenians—they made their entry into Dublin. The whole route was one mass of people; every house showed some sign of welcome; flags and mottoes and warm-hearted Irish blessings in untranslatable Irish language; blessings that flew from mouth to mouth, and mingled with the deafening cheers which resounded on all sides. Nearly every great town in England has at one time or other prepared an ovation for the heir-apparent and his beautiful wife, but they have never had a warmer welcome. The Princess did not look at all tired; she wore a pretty blue poplin dress the Prince had bought for her in Ireland when he visited the Dublin Exhibition; and the bonnet was white, with a little blue about it.

In time they arrived at the Castle, the ground-floor of which had been gorgeously prepared for them, the Lord Lieutenant and his family contenting themselves with the upper floor. Loyal and flattering addresses were then presented by the Lord Mayor; and the Royal party were left to a little rest and quiet, to prepare them for the hard work of pleasure before them. There was a dinner-party at the Castle in their honor in the evening.

The next day was the Punchestown races; and the Royal party, including the Princess, were present. They traveled by train to Sallins, and then in an open carriage made their way to the race-course, where a very pretty stand had been erected for them. I wish I had space to dwell upon the scene; knowing the humor innate in the Irish character, you may imagine the numerous scenes that must have arisen on a like occasion which would have delighted a wit. The Irish people were literally wildly delirious, and their anxiety to see the Royalties was unbounded, and as was their delight when they did see them. The racing was good, but that was only a secondary consideration; happily there were no accidents. It was a raw, cold, windy day, which by-and-by was enlivened by a little sun, which showed to full perfection the bright green pasture-land of the Emerald Isle. The next day was brighter and finer, and the Prince was again present, the popular enthusiasm being in no way abated. One young girl on a gray pony contrived, through the kindness of those about her, to make her way to the Royal carriage. "Oh, thank you all, and now I'll go home quite happy," she said, as she rode off again, kissing her hand as she went. The Princess did not accompany her husband, but reserved herself for the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress's ball in the evening, where all the Irish nobility, together with many of the English, seem to have been present. The Mansion House was beautifully decorated, especially the King's Room, which was hung with scarlet and mirrors; flowers and evergreens twining round the pillars, and bringing back visions of fairy-land. The Princess, though pale, looked lovely: she was dressed in a pink satin dress almost covered with a founce of Irish lace, presented by the ladies of Ireland. A tiara of diamonds and a necklet of sapphires and diamonds completed her attire, and hanging from her left shoulder was a glittering mass of stars—the orders of Victoria and Albert and of Catherine of Russia. In the first quadrille the Lord Mayor danced with the Princess, the Lady Mayoress with the Prince, the Lord Lieutenant with the Marchioness of Caermarthen, and Prince Teck with the Marchioness of Abercorn.

But the great event of the visit was the installation of the Prince of Wales as a Knight of the Order of St. Patrick, which took place on the following day, Saturday. The order was founded in 1782, and includes in its body the flower of the Irish nobility. George IV., when Prince of Wales, was invested with it, but scarcely with the splendor which characterized the present proceedings. The installation took place in the fine Cathedral of St. Patrick's, the interior of which has been lately restored by Sir B. L. Guinness. It is situated in the poorest quarter of the town, but was admirably fitted for the display of this grand pageant. It is needless to say that every nook and corner of the building was full. It presented a sight which will never be forgotten by those who saw it. The ceremonial took place at a little past three, and at one the streets were filled by the military, whose presence was to add to the pomp of the hour, and the crowds either pouring toward the Cathedral or watching those who were going thither. At three the procession set out, consisting of the state carriage of the Prince and Princess (a magnificent affair, the horses caparisoned in scarlet and gold) and their suite. On their arrival the Princess and Lady Abercorn were conducted to the dais; Her Royal Highness, with a bright flush on her face, dressed in a mantle and dress of sky-blue silk, and a bonnet of blue tulle with feathers and lace. The glimpse she must have had of the whole building must have been grand in the extreme—judges in their wigs, ladies in the newest and brightest toilettes, officers in bright scarlet uniforms, all mingling with the decorations of the Cathedral; the helmets and banners of the Knights, and the little chapel in the distance with its mauve coloring. As soon as the Princess entered the music began, and the Prince took his seat dressed in the uniform of an officer of the Guards. On the table beside him were the sword, mantle, and banner appertaining to his knighthood. Then the Dean read Her Majesty's commands for the holding of the Chapter, the Knights marched in procession, and at last took up their positions in their separate stalls. The Te Deum was sung by two hundred voices, an effect impossible to describe in words. Then the Usher, Genealogist, and Secretary led the Prince to the table; the senior Knights girded on the sword, the same worn by George IV. on a similar occasion; while the Archbishop of Armagh read the admonition; and then the mantle of bright blue silk was put on, and the Archbishop added another admonition; then the Prince knelt while the Grand Master invested him with the collar; then the Ulster King at Arms, St. Bernard Burke, under whose directions all the preparations have been made, proclaimed his titles, names, style, and dignity. The banner of the new Knight was deposited within the communion rails; the organ pealed forth Handel's "In the beginning;" the procession re-formed, and this magnificent pageant was over. That evening a grand banquet was given at the Castle to all the Knights of the Order.

On the Sunday the Prince and Princess attended divine service at Christ Church, a cathedral which must have been peculiarly interesting to Her Royal Highness, in that it is entirely of Danish origin, and contains many Danish monuments.

Monday was the great review in Phoenix Park, which threatened to be marred by a steady down-pour of rain, but luckily it cleared off by mid-day. After the review was over the Royal party were entertained at luncheon by Lord and Lady Mayo in the Secretaries' Lodge, and there planted two Wellingtonia gigantea in honor of their visit. It was a magnificent sight, concluding with a sham-fight, and all Dublin seemed to be there to see it. The Prince of Wales, Prince Teck, and the Duke of Cambridge all appeared on horseback and in uniform. In the evening a ball took place at the Castle, in St. Patrick's Hall. On Tuesday the Prince and the Duke were sworn in members of the Privy Council of Ireland, and afterward visited the Irish Academy and the Catholic University. On Wednesday His Royal Highness went to Maynooth to see the great college there, and in the evening the magnificent ball at the Exhibition building was given, the grandest affair of the kind ever seen in Ireland; fountains, evergreens, and flags combined to produce such a scene of dazzling beauty never to be forgotten. Banners hung from the roof; the lighting was perfect; gold and scarlet glittered every where. A canopy of velvet, surmounted by gold, was erected for the Royal party, beneath which were thrones, and on each side trophies and figures in old armor.

On Thursday they all went to see Lord and Lady Powerscourt, some miles from Dublin. On Friday they visited the Horticultural Society and the Mater Misericordiae Hospital, and at quarter to eight took their departure amidst more ovations, making their way home by Wales, where fresh honors awaited them, and by Trentham, the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland's home in Staffordshire. On the 27th they were once more in London. At Caernarvon the melancholy intelligence reached them that Prince Alfred, the Queen's second son, had been shot in Australia by a Fenian. The sensation this has caused in England is great beyond expression. The national anthem was sung at all the theatres when it was known that he was recovering, and addresses are pouring in to the Queen from all sides. He is an open-hearted, frank sailor, a popular favorite, and the news of the dastardly attempt on his life was received with universal execration.

There is so much to tell about this wonderful Irish visit that I have been obliged to give you only the outlines. One result is, they say, likely to spring from it, viz., that the Prince and Princess, in compliance with the often expressed wishes of the Irish people, will have a home there, and will three months with them yearly. Castleton, near Colbridge, is talked of as a suitable residence. The uncovering of the statue of Burke by the Prince in presence of the Princess, in front of Trinity College, is an event not likely to be forgotten by Irish people; he is one of the most beloved of all her heroes.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

NOTWITHSTANDING our cold and backward season the Central Park is unfolding its rare beauties to multitudes of delighted visitors. And those who have neglected to visit it while robed in its spring garments of delicate green have lost a charming sight, which will not be on exhibition again for a whole year. Every week now makes a marked change in the general aspect of the Park. Nature is very busy and swift in her work. The buds are bursting into blossoms, the foliage is thickening, and the emerald carpets on the lawns are deepening in hue every day. Lovers of the beautiful will find no amusement more healthful and refreshing than a walk or drive in Central Park, at least once a week for months to come. It is wonderful how, at every visit, no matter how often that may be, something new turns up to be admired—a new walk, or bridge, or bower—something in art as well as nature—which we have never seen before. The rustic play-house for the children will be a special attraction this season, as well as the children's sward, appropriated to the exclusive use of the little ones. The Belvidere, near the Reservoir, gives promise of completion, and will be surmounted by a tower, from which a fine view of the Park can be obtained. It is a matter of interest to watch the progress of various artistic improvements, among which the paneling of the passage underneath the Terrace is worthy of special notice. This structure when finished will be most beautiful, and a favorite resort. The work of the florists and landscape gardeners is going on in every part of the Park, and new and agreeable surprises are in store for us.

One of the most interesting of the Anniversaries last week was that of the Howard Mission and Home for Little Wanderers. Seldom has an evening entertainment of any kind attracted such an immense throng as surged through the vestibules of Pike's Opera-House on Monday evening; and hundreds went away unable to gain admittance. Perhaps the "Little Wanderers," attractive though they be, can not claim the entire credit of drawing such a multitude together; the new Opera-House undoubtedly exerted a magnetic influence. Be that as it may, they were fortunate who secured even a standing-place in any way available for seeing or hearing, while a vast crowd were obliged to content themselves with working their way through the halls only, and looking at the heads of those who blocked up the doorways. The exercises of this, the sixth anniversary of the Howard Mission, were very interesting, consisting chiefly of addresses, reports of the society, and singing by the children—about one hundred and twenty-five in number. This institution has received into its charge, since its organization, no less than 7581 children. The number brought under instruction during the past year is 1438. The average number in attendance at the school is between five and six hundred. Ladies of culture and refinement have conducted the school, and have been unwearied in their devotion to it. During the past year one hundred and forty-eight children have been placed in Christian homes—adopted as children, with fair prospects of being trained up to usefulness. To appreciate the good work of this Mission the ruin and wretchedness from which the children have been rescued must be remembered.

The London Times contains an article of some length in regard to scarlet-fever, which at certain seasons prevails so extensively. Among various directions in regard to measures for preventing the spread of this disease, it remarks: "If care were taken to cleanse thoroughly and disinfect all articles of clothing, bedding, and furniture; and if all persons, acting upon the golden rule of loving their neighbors as themselves, would abstain from traveling by public conveyances, or entering hotels and lodging-houses, while there is reason to believe that the germs of the disease are still clinging to them, we should hear much less than we now do of the sorrow and suffering occasioned by this formidable scourge."

A very pretty incident is related of a canary-bird by a Georgia paper. The door of the bird's cage was occasionally left open that he might enjoy the freedom of the room. One day he happened to light upon the mantle shelf whereupon was a mirror. Here was a new discovery of the most profound interest. He gazed long and curiously at himself, and came to the conclusion he had found a mate. Going back to his cage he selected a seed from its box, and brought it in his bill as an offering to the stranger. In vain the canary exerted himself to make his new-found friend partake, and becoming weary of that, tried another tack. Stepping back a few inches from the glass he poured forth his sweetest notes, pausing now and then for a reply. None came; and moody and disgusted he flew back to his perch, hanging his head in shame and silence for the rest of the day; and although the door was repeatedly left open, refused to come out again.

It has been very justly remarked that woman's sphere—just as man's—is precisely that situation in which she is doing the highest and best work of which she is capable. All have not the same gifts; and education should be of such a nature as to discover and develop the talents and faculties which exist, and to aid each one in making a judicious choice of her life-work. Discretion is needful lest a woman undertake too many matters, and so fail to do justice to any of them or to herself. Quiet waters are often very deep. And the mother who, in the sanctity of a home made happy by her influence, rears her children in ways of purity and truth, may justly feel that she is doing a work for God and for humanity than which there is none nobler.

A story is told in connection with the introduction of the manufacture of fine lace into Brussels which is pleasant in itself, and carries with it a lesson worth learning. A poor girl named Gertrude was deeply attached to a young man whose wealth precluded all hopes of marriage. One night, as she sat weeping, a lady entered her cottage, and, without saying a word, placed in her lap a cushion, with its bobbins filled with thread. The lady then, with perfect silence, showed her how to work the bobbins and how to make all sorts of delicate patterns and complicated stitches. As daylight approached the maiden had learned the art, and the mysterious visitor disappeared. The maiden grew rich by her work, and married the object of her love. Years afterward, while living in luxury, she was startled by the mysterious lady entering her house—this time not silent but looking stern. She said: "Here you enjoy peace and comfort, while without are famine and trouble. I helped you; you have not helped your neighbors. The angels weep for you, and turn away their faces." So, the next day Gertrude went forth, with her cushion and her bobbin in hand, and going from cottage to cottage, she taught the art she had so mysteriously learned, and comfort and plenty came to all.

At a recent meeting of the Cincinnati Horticultural Society the subject of selling all kinds of fruit and vegetables by weight, instead of by box, basket, or barrel, was discussed with considerable animation. Measure is not always a true indication of quantity. There is light and heavy wheat, and there are light and heavy fruits of the same varieties. A peck of grapes, or a quart of berries, of one kind, may be heavier or lighter than the same measures of another variety—so that weight is the true standard. The public are so systematically defrauded, especially about strawberry time, by short measure, that a change to the scales would be desirable for that fruit, if for no other. Consumers would doubtless have to pay just as much by weight, other things being equal, as by measure; but one had rather be robbed outright than to be the victim of tricks.

A very singular accident recently occurred near Lexington, Missouri, by which a little child lost its life. The child was playing about the fire-place, and, strangely enough, got a small piece of burning coal into his mouth. Before it could be removed it passed into the windpipe, causing convulsions, and producing injuries which resulted in death three days afterward.

GIPSY EYES.

Gipsy eyes, so dark and tender,
Read not thus my inmost soul.
Gipsy Beauty, in thy splendor,
Of this heart accept the whole.
Dark as wine thy silken tresses,
Twined with braids of varied dyes—
Thou who spurnest my caresses,
Drink't my soul up through thine eyes.
Fair Gitana, gipsy Beauty,
Thou art queen, it needs but seeing.
Since to love thee is a duty,
Drain not thus my whole life's being!

Gipsy eyes, so deep and earnest;
Turn their gaze, sweet maid, from me.
Since to ashes thus thou burnest
This poor heart unpitifully.
Spare me, gipsy—I adore thee—
Dream of thee by night and day.
As I bow me here before thee,
Droop those lids and spare to slay.
Fair Gitana, gipsy Beauty,
Thou art queen—there's no gainsaying.
Since to love thee is a duty,
Spare thy lover, humbly praying.

Gipsy eyes—your soul-lit beaming
Fills my spirit night and day;
Gipsy maid, amid my dreaming
Thy sweet presence haunts me aye
Through the dance's wildest measure
I should seek to fly from thee,
In the midst of mirth and pleasure
Thy dark glance would follow me.
Fair Gitana, gipsy Beauty,
Thou art queen—I must adore thee.
Since to love thee is a duty,
Low my spirit bows before thee.

Gipsy eyes, why ever haunt me,
Wheresoe'er my steps may stray?
Naught on earth could ever daunt me
Could I bask 'neath you for aye:
Pride might flaunt me—wealth might shun me:
I no fairer fate would ask
Than that your pure light should sun me,
While in your sweet rays I bask.
Fair Gitana, gipsy Beauty,
As your dark eyes burn above me,
Since to love thee is a duty,
In return, I pray thee love me.

Gipsy eyes, in gipsy archness,
Reading thus this soul of mine—
Driving hence all worldly starchness,
You—and nature—are divine!
On some breezy spread of heather,
Scorning all the world may say,
We will clasp our hands together—
Live and love for good and aye!
Fair Gitana, gipsy Beauty,
Subtle witchery possessing—
Since to love thee is a duty,
Sure to wed thee were a blessing!

BY THE RIVER.

Choose her fairer face, I do not reckon
Man's love such an estimable prize;
Others are there who, did I but beckon,
Would see all earth's pleasure in mine eyes.
Choose her, an thou carest,
If her face be fairest,
Lo! my hatred groweth, and love dies.

GIPSY EYES—"GIPSY EYES, SO DARK AND TENDER, READ NOT THUS MY INMOST SOUL."

Yet remembrance one day like a painter
May limn for thee such a scene as this;
Were the odors of that May-time fainter?
Was there less of passion in my kiss?
On the stream reclining,
See the lilies shining,
As they shone through all those hours of bliss.

Can I pity her? A fate scarce brighter
Than my fate awaits her in the years:
Now she deems thee true, when no heart lighter
Ever played upon a maiden's fears.
Ere her doom be certain,
Shall I draw the curtain,
Show her all the future's endless tears?

Rather would I have her never know it;
Love, while love is lasting, is divine:
I have lived and loved, as sings the poet;
I can see thee change and make no sign.
Hold the spring-flow'rs o'er her,
In the years before her
May she taste no bitter cup like mine!

AN OLD VENETIAN SKETCH.

When last rays of sunset have merged into splendor,
And faded behind the Euganean hills;
When balmy the breeze in the twilight so tender—
The whisper of love then more easily thrills!

The voice of the lover is yet more ecstatic,
As, changing from golden to silvery once more,
The soft summer waves of the blue Adriatic
Scarce dimple the sand on the Lido's white shore.

Oh, gay as the prismatic pearls of Murano
Are songs that we sing by the light of the moon;
More sacred than relics in old San Stefano
Are words that come wafted across the Lagoon!

On white marble steps—the brave work of Scamozzi—
I watch her eyes glitter and glow in the dark;
Now gloomy and sad as the depths of the Pozzi,
Now bright as the banners afloat o'er St. Mark.

Carissima mia, I don't mind confessing—
While raven-black tresses you ripple and twine—
Tho' eyes proudly flash, I could scarcely help pressing
A soft little hand were it folded in mine!

I'll sit at her feet, though my passion is burning,
And worship her beauty with deeply-drawn sighs;
Nor dream of the dull, sober daylight returning,
While basking in love and the light of her eyes.

Then, oh! for the rapture to whisper through tresses
Soft-scented, atwine round those shell-tinted ears!
Away with all doubts and away with distresses,
And perish the fancy of sorrow and tears!

Ah! dwell in my heart now, oh! sweetest of creatures!
You'll live in the future of forthcoming days;
For splendid old Titian has painted your features,
And gay Aretino has sung in your praise!

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN Dr. Dalmager reached the old man's bedside he found himself anticipated by the professor of spiritual therapeutics. Kledda had come into Owlville with her husband, and, being the devout member of the family, had gone for the minister, while Perro called the Doctor. Mr. Pulpiduster, a good and earnest if not a strong or brilliant young divine, imploring his Master that even at this eleventh hour the poor soul might be saved, accompanied the servants at once on their return, and had been by Seibert Kearney's pillow for two hours when the Doctor arrived there. The old man's right side was paralyzed, and he could not speak, but his eyes were open, and he had given repeated signs of comprehending all that was addressed to him by gestures of impatience with his gaunt, great-veined left hand in answer to the prayer, Scripture-reading, and fearful exhortations of the sincere young pastor. Further than restiff contempt, Mr. Pulpiduster had spiritually failed to move him; but, speechless as he was, a life-long habit of using other men for his own purposes still clung to him, and he had contrived to move Mr. Pulpiduster. By pointing to a set of hanging shelves on the opposite wall he had induced the young minister to bring him a bundle of papers. He had motioned him to untie them, and indicated that he wished their indorsements read aloud. One by one Mr. Pulpiduster obeyed him. The old man stopped him with a bony clutch, and made a sign in imitation of writing, when the minister came to a paper with this superscription: "Cuthbert Kearney, Melleville, Massachusetts." "Brother of yours?" said Mr. Pulpiduster. Seibert Kearney thrust his poor tongue sideways and gasped in the vain struggle to speak—frowned with one eyebrow, and slowly moved his head leftward in token of negation. "Son?" Mr. Pulpiduster ventured again. The old man's face relaxed into a grotesque grin—that terrible paralytic mockery of smiling—and tried to nod affirmatively, his head in the effort nearly rolling off the pillow as the minister added, "Want me to write to him?" "Shall I say," he went on, "that you wish to see him?" (another smile of assent) "before you—" Mr. Pulpiduster did not say "die," for Seibert Kearney, forerunning his meaning, grew so horribly livid, and such an abject, unutterable terror appealed from his glassy, straining eyeballs—from the convulsed chest and clutching, talony fingers of the man, as of one who sees strands untwisting and snapping, a fibre at a time, while he hangs at the rope's end half-way down a slippery steep—that the word stuck in the young minister's throat quenched in a very agony of compassionate tears.

By the time that the Doctor arrived Perro had been again dispatched to Owlville with a telegram, calling Cuthbert Kearney to his father immediately. When Derrick Dalmager heard that this had been sent, the gleam that came into his eyes was so momentary, so subtle, that to read it aright would have required some woman who had made their beautiful deeps the joy and study of her life—there was none such there; but whatever it meant it was not like that of the earlier morning—it was not satisfaction. He saw for the first time nigh at hand the man who was synonymous with his life's chief incommutation and disappointment, but his manner was as thoroughly gentle—he was the sympathetic healer, the kind medical man—as if he had been tending a sick girl in love with him. He made a careful examination of his patient—cross-questioned Kledda minutely—wrote a couple of prescriptions—in a musical, caressing voice bade the paralytic take stimulants, as if it would be the greatest of surprises to learn he had ever used them, and cheerily told him to take courage, for "we would have him as good as new in a day or two"—then slipped noiselessly out, and with a light laugh told Mr. Pulpiduster in the entry that the old fellow might "pass in his chips" to-morrow, but would probably make out to potter along any where from a fortnight to six weeks. In his agony of earnestness for souls, with the tears running down his cheeks, Mr. Pulpiduster at once comprehended and overlooked the bit of slang he had never heard till now, and asked if there was no chance. Not a ghost—this was the last of him—he'd never walk again. Speak? Yes—he might—after a fashion. Hear? Oh yes! Heard now—as far as the tympanum. "But oh, my dear Sir—his precious soul—a soul to be saved or lost!" "Really you're charitable, my dear parson," answered the Doctor. "So you think the d—d old beast's got one, do you?"

Excuse the oath—I usually respect the cloth—forgot just then—good-morning!" And Derrick nonchalantly loitered down the staircase to his gig.

After that, often finding the faithful young clergyman there, Dr. Dalmager called at his old birth-right daily. The long-suffering constitution of Seibert Kearney really seemed trying, despite his sixty-eight years, to make another effort for him. He got so much better that he could sit up in bed propped by pillows. His dead side made no sign of any revival, but he recovered his tongue sufficiently to make known his wants in a broken utterance, and his mental strength enough to scoff at death, and put judgment far away from him. His son had answered him. He was coming as fast as steam could carry him—his wife and only child, a little girl, were with him. The day before their arrival was expected, during the Doctor's morning call, he bluntly told him that he didn't like the idea of doing things on credit. Dalmager had been working for him ever since he fell sick, and the sense of obligation was unpleasant. Dalmager concealed under one of his musical, airy laughs his displeasure at the misanthropic churlishness of Seibert's manner, and his style of approach on money matters so derogatory to his professional and family pride—so like the way one deals with a tinker—and amused himself by tying under his chin the jetty fringes of his great silken mustache, while Perro obeyed his master's orders, and brought out of a drawer in the closet a heavy japanned cash-box. The old man had it set before him on the coverlet, and after a few moments' painful fumbling unlocked it with his live hand and a key taken from beneath his pillow. "There!" said he, presently, flinging out a hundred-dollar bill before the Doctor less gracefully than the Doctor would have thrown a bone to a dog, "is that enough?" "That will do," said the Doctor—the subtle gleam coming into his eyes again—"Here, Perro! You and Kledda were always good servants when you belonged to me; perhaps I'll buy you again some time; take this, and use it till that time comes. There are a good many comforts you need now, I've no doubt." For all his habitual self-control his lip curled just perceptibly as he said these words. Perro took the note with a torrent of thanks which threatened to excite the patient. "You disturb—your master; go away now," said Derrick; and Perro in an humble transport stole out of the room to tell Kledda of his luck. There was no danger of Perro's disturbing Seibert—he was perfectly swallowed up in astonishment at the act of the young Southron.

"Young man," said his poor, thick, one-sided tongue, when stupefaction suffered him to find it, "throwing hundred-dollar bills to niggers isn't the way to succeed in this world—'tisn't the way your father succeeded, nor the way I succeeded. It's a mighty fine way to make fools talk about you—an open-hearted fellow they'll call you—empty-brained they ought to."

Derrick smiled considerably, making every allowance for a patient, but the gleam came into his eyes again, and a good judge of character would not sleep well if he thought that when that gleam came it was he of whom Derrick had been thinking.

"Not the way either to get such a place as this,"

"WHEN THEY REACHED THE OAK THEY FOUND THE CHAIR TIPPED OVER UPON THE GRASS—THE OLD MAN LYING INSENSIBLE," ETC.

continued the poor blundering-paced tongue, as Seibert Kearney looked around with a money-loving self-approval on "this Great Babylon which he had" bought, not "built." "No, young man—no such place as this 'll ever be yours at that rate."

"Well, no! I suppose not!" said Derrick, with the airiest of all his airy laughs, and the gleam again coming in such a wise that the good-judge of character might have shuddered to read it; "but, my dear Sir, what on earth could make you suppose I wanted it?"

"Ye couldn't help it!" said the old man, with a hard, coarse, self-gratulatory chuckle. "It's worth all I paid for it, and God knows that was a mint of money! No, no, no; ye couldn't look at it and help it. That's how, I suppose."

With this he set his nervous fingers to fasten the box again. But it was running over with notes and papers, and in the tremulousness of vulgar glee, which showed itself in his ghastly, twitchy grin at the same time, he tipped it a little to one side. A small file of indorsed slips spilled over its edge and fell upon the floor. "Quick! quick! hand me! hand me!" he cried, grasping at it like a hungry kite. Doctor Dalmager overlooked his peremptoriness and bent down at the bedside—partly to recover his patient's papers, but mostly to hide that gleam which came again into his eyes—this time after a fashion which no inscrutableness of life-long habit could have veiled, for it was the blossom of a hate still kept waiting for its fruitage, but having roots which reached to the very dividing of joints and marrow—soul and spirit—the thoughts and intents of the heart. Picking up the papers he had time both to glaze his eyes again with a cheery kindness, and, ere he averted them, to pretend that they had not caught the indorsement as he handed back the file, to read "Reuben Dalmager in acc't with Seibert Kearney—Receipts for pay'ts on Garnet Run estate."

Derrick called Perro up stairs again and took his leave, so far as that dusky face was concerned, in the reverence and glory of a departing god. All the afternoon, when he was gone, Seibert Kearney kept the cash-box on the bed beside him, and lay with his skinny talons hooked about its brass handle, to the visual sense in a doze, but muttering to himself, "Unsafe young man! Don't believe has any principle; unsafe—unsafe—b'lieve he'd steal—lie—murder—unsafe—unsafe," with endless repetitions. At length, just before sunset, he called to him Perro and Kledda. He was almost well, he said—so much better that he was going out to look at his place and take some fresh air. He cut short their remonstrances and cautions with an oath out of the old repertory they knew so well, and made Perro, with another man-servant, take him down stairs in their arms to a great chair on the veranda. This, after drinking a full tumbler of raw Bourbon, he had them carry out under a noble old oak near the middle of the lawn—the most venerable tree on the Dalmager demesne. He rode in ghastly triumph between them, his one live hand still hooked around the cash-box on his lap; and reaching the oak, "Set me down," said he—"so. Now go into the house—both of you—into the back kitchen—out of my sight. I shall know if you don't stay there! The one that comes out here—before fifteen minutes' up—that one 'll get nine-and-thirty on the bare back, and won't get a hundred dollars to plaster it either—d—n him! A quarter of an hour, remember, by the kitchen clock!" Of sheer compassion Perro made as if he would utter one final remonstrance to his poor broken despot, but another fearful imprecation cut him short. Downcast and despairing the faithful black carried his comrade away to the kitchen, and literally obeyed the command to keep out of sight, sighing in a corner with his eyes fixed on the great eight-day time-piece. With the last moment of the quarter hour Perro and Bronzy started for the lawn anew, taking Kledda with them for fear that the fatigue might have made their despot so much worse again as to call for woman's tact and tenderness.

There was enough need. The frightened servants had only got round to the front of the house when they saw a sight which quickened their motions to a run. When they reached the oak they found the chair tipped over upon the grass—the old man lying insensible—with its back resting across his bruised and bleeding face, and the cash-box gone. Tenderly as if he had been one of the kindest, most paternal of the mythical Southern patriarchs, they bore him back to bed in their arms and tucked him in. During the night as they watched him—waiting for the Doctor, who had been called to a midwifery case ten miles off—he proved that the fall and not another "stroke" had rendered him insensible, by opening his eyes and moaning with parched lips for the water he had again lost all power of asking for in articulate speech. After they gave it to him he lay till daylight dozing with half-shut eyes; in the full sunlight he opened them wide, and seemed to recognize them. But he did not speak again. In the forenoon the Doctor came—gentle, musical, caressing as if he had not been up all night with the suffering of another and his own anxiety. His astonishment at Perro's revelation of the disappeared cash-box knew no bounds; but strangely, it did not seem at all to trouble Seibert Kearney. All the more strangely because the loss of speech again was apparently all the injury which the shock of last evening had done him. His senses seemed as steady and acute as they had been since his "stroke." Yet he gave no sign of having had any misfortune happen to him. Perro mentioned the word "cash-box" before him tentatively; the ghastly grin which was his smile grew more hideously lined along his poor one-sided mouth; he sighed, as if a great weight in some mysterious way had been taken from his mind, then closed his eyes and dropped into another doze. Had a stranger looked at both the men he would have supposed the loss not Seibert Kearney's but Derrick Dalmager's—for the eyes of the latter, in spite of himself, looked full of feverish anxiety. About an hour after he had gone a barouche from Owlville brought up to the door—followed by a cart full of baggage—Cuthbert Kearney, his wife, and little girl.

From that afternoon Dr. Dalmager paid his visits twice a day. The old man had known his kindred, but neither to them nor any did he speak more. Night after night he waned into a deeper feebleness, until the Doctor saw signs on the occasion of one morning visit that his patient would scarcely outlast the following day. That day, as I have said, he promised to pass by the dying man's bedside; and, in fulfillment of that promise, he came to the porch, where we have left him standing in the lovely sunshine during the progress of this chapter.

When Lily saw that it was the Doctor she ran through the kitchen to meet him at the front porch; because, being a Northern-bred child, she had not learned that opening doors should be left entirely to "niggers." Kleda, roused from her lethargy of superstitious terror, jumped up instantly to follow her. Lily had lived in the house only a month, but the servants had acquired a devotion to her which bordered upon worship, and obeyed her least behest as if she had been the angel which she looked.

"Come in, Doctor!" said she, standing on tip-toe to turn the knob; "I thought you were God. Mamma's in the sitting-room—papa's with grandpa yet. Please, won't you let me go in there when God does come?"

The Doctor could not answer her with the look and the laugh of badinage he would have given in reply to such a speech from an elder person. He stooped till his long jetty locks fell on her golden curls like midnight mixing with morning, and kissed her lovingly on her rose-bud of a mouth. "I wish I had such a little girl as you—I'm sure I'd let her do any thing!"

"That would spoil me," said Lily, wisely. "But please let me see grandpa once more—by-and-by, when He comes?" and putting one little hand into the Doctor's she drew him into the broad saloon, which had been the favorite family assembling-place in old Dalmager days, where the dying man had passed so many a horrible night with his stupefied retinue, and where now Mrs. Kearney sat alone by a window opening on the veranda. The book she had been trying to read, with the intent of diverting her mind from that slow-creeping shadow of death in the next room, had fallen on her lap—the heavenliness of the day doing that office for her better—and, leaning upon the arm of her luxurious great wicker-chair, she sat dreaming her soul away into the morning's sunlight and fragrance, with her beautiful cheek resting on her beautiful palm, and the soft wind fluttering back the gossamer muslin of her flowing-sleeve to show a no less beautiful arm bare to the dimpled elbow. The Doctor entered noiselessly, the door already being ajar, and made his footfall even lighter than that professional sick-room step which was his habit, when he saw that Mrs. Kearney had her back toward him and was unaware of his coming in. He could have lingered for minutes to feast his eyes on her unconscious loveliness, made still more lovely by the meditative grace of its attitude and its perfect harmony with nature's sumptuous surroundings. But Lily bounded to her mother's side and recalled her from her reverie with a kiss. "The Doctor, mamma!" said she, and Mrs. Kearney suddenly looked around—turning her head, not abruptly, but with the little, graceful motion of a listening deer—then rose, and with cheeks faintly flushing like the inner pink of an Indian shell, said:

"You've caught me dreaming! How kind of you to come back so soon!"

"Kind to myself," answered Dr. Dalmager, taking her hand with frank Southern cordiality, though he had only left her a couple of hours before, and holding it with an air of chivalrous sympathy for the household grief in which she was supposed to share, longer than is usual in the common meetings of acquaintance. "I could not bear to stay away from you a moment when you might need me." His manner admitted the construction of warm medical solicitude, but no professional motive was required to explain the earnest yet respectful gaze which he bent on the exquisite face upturned to him. It was Lily's face, with its weird spirituality replaced by the tenderness and tropical fervor of the very highest type of sensuous life—a face whose every feature, from its dimpled chin to its sunny crown of abundant hair, was Lily's over again—but a face which, even in the ripening summer of full womanhood, Lily's never could become. Lily, if she lived till thirty, would scarcely have looked so young as did her mother now—her eyes would have been oftener dimmed with tears, her forehead lined with many more serious questionings. The mother, though she was born by the icy Kennebec, was a true daughter of the sun—the consistencies of nature would have been better maintained had palms yaved and lories flitted above her cradle. "Never, in this country nor abroad," thought Dr. Dalmager, "have I seen beauty to be compared with this!" Many a man must have thought it; but few men, looking straight into Mrs. Kearney's eyes, would have dared to reveal as much of the thought as Derrick Dalmager, who relied for forgiveness on the physician's privilege of exhibiting an affectionate interest, on the magnetism of his own manly beauty, and the tolerance of admiration which exists in woman's heart.

"Nothing new since I have been gone?" said Derrick, gently, releasing Mrs. Kearney's hand as the pink bloom rose again in the gaze of his earnest black eyes.

"Nothing," answered Lily's mother; "except that once he grew more restless for a few minutes, and seemed trying hard to speak. Oh, if he could speak again! It would be such a comfort to Cuthbert. He's with him now, poor fellow, hoping he may revive enough to say one word before he dies."

"Indeed! and what's that?" asked the Doctor, with interest. "Oh, yes—of course—any word, you mean. It would be a comfort to a man's son under such circumstances. I was thinking you meant some word in particular, perhaps—some explanation, might be, of that strange business about the cash-box."

"I did mean some particular word. Cuthbert has often said that he would give up all hope of ever receiving a cent from his father—though the poor fellow's seen many a time when the old gentleman's monthly income would have seemed a princely fortune to him—if he could only have him put his arm round his neck—once more as he used to when my husband was a boy, and hear him say, 'I forgive you.'"

"Forgive! May I ask for what?"

"For having married me," answered Mrs. Kearney, leaning her forehead against the window-frame, and looking out into the sunshine with beclouded eyes.

"The wretch!" said Dr. Dalmager. "If I knew a remedy that would open his lips this minute he should die dumb! Forgiveness for that? The very word is a brutal insult!"

"It has been very hard for Cuthbert all these years—seven or eight now—on my account. I was not rich; I had no great family connections; and when he disobeyed his father he found himself at once thrown entirely on his own resources. It was a great change that—from being the petted only son of a wealthy man, with a good university education, but no professional training, and brought up to draw on his father's bank-account for the gratification of every desire, to the alternative of starving with a woman to help him or take the principality of a country academy at a thousand a year, and teach every thing but the lowest elements so as to avoid the expense of a college-educated assistant."

"When I was little," said Lily, gravely, "mamma used to cry, all by herself and me, very often. Now I know what it was for—the Lord didn't make me a boy so I could grow big and help papa teach. But I will teach, won't I, Doctor? Kleda knows all her letters but Q now, and she says that's a pumpkin, and Perro knows five times, and I only know seven times myself. Doctor, isn't there any thing you can give to cure little girls and make boys of them, so I could grow and learn a great deal, and when I'd done teaching Kleda I could teach great large young men for papa?"

The Doctor showed his magnificent teeth in a laugh whose mirth dismissed all memory of the sick man—then, with a glance of significant admiration at the lovely mother, caught the little girl in his arms, answering as he kissed her:

"You'll be teaching 'great large young men' for yourself before long, Beauty! Then you'll be glad little girls can't be cured—except by growing into angelic women who look just like them."

"I know what you mean," said Lily, laying her curls against her mother's cheek, and hiding its heightened color with her mist of sunshine. "You mean I shall be loved and married like mamma—and the young man and I will be sworn at and driven off, and we shall be very poor; and his father will run away hundreds and hundreds of miles and die, and the moon will turn into blood. I don't mean that—I wouldn't like that—I'd rather be an old maid with hair that takes off, like Miss Mingles at home, and help papa."

"Precious love!" said her mother, hugging her tightly to her breast, "you would have helped papa well enough, I'm sure, if your grandfather had ever seen you."

"And did he never?" asked Derrick.

"Never till we came to Kentucky. From the day Cuthbert married me he forbade him the house. He would not look on our faces. I can not bear to believe it; but we were told that when he heard we had a little girl he cursed us all three, because there was one more to go to the poor-house with the family-name to disgrace. But if he did it never hurt us. Why didn't it, darling?"

"Because I was the Lord's blessing," said the child, simply.

"So you were, my sweet bird, and the moment you came you put new strength into us all. I was never stronger or able to be more help to Cuthbert than I was after she was born, Doctor, and Cuthbert, who used to be so pale and haggard, sitting up all night sometimes to correct piles of exercises a foot high, grew stout and well, just because he could run to her little crib every fifteen minutes, and take what he called a fresh drink of Heaven, kissing her as she lay asleep, with his study lamp shaded from her eyes. I think the sight of her made other people love us; for an old friend of my husband's family, after he had called on us, and held the baby in his lap, went away and got Cuthbert the principality of the academy in Mellenville, where old Mr. Kearney lived—worth six hundred a year more than where we had been. It was terribly hard for my husband to live right in the same town with his father, and meet him every now and then, without being able to speak to him, or ever go to the house where he was born; but we felt as if we had no right to refuse such a chance of bettering our lot. We had only been in Mellenville three months when Father Kearney sold all his property there, and left without a word. He had heard so much of our baby that perhaps he was afraid his heart would soften some time if he saw her by accident. After that we never heard of him nor from him—never had so much as a rumor where he had gone to, nor whether he was alive or dead, till Mr. Palbidiaster's telegram reached us a month ago. I don't know how I come to speak to you so frankly of all this family trouble, Doctor—but you have been very kind to us!"

The lovely creature looked into his face with an innocent confidence which made Derrick doubt whether old Seibert Kearney could have feared to expose his obdurate heart to Lily—unmelted by the full sunbeam, why did he dread the little star?

"Will you always be very kind to us, Dr. Dalmager?" said Lily, lifting her great sweet blue eyes to his with that inmost scrutiny which all the more, because they meant no inevitable reading of mysteries and challenged no attempt at concealment, seemed to scale the brink of those deep, dark wells of his, and drop through them to the very bottom of his heart. He answered her with the first blush that had tinged his pale olive cheeks since childhood, and another kiss which hid it in her curls.

"And will you be kind to dear papa, and to poor old grandpa, and please not let the moon turn into blood when He comes?"

While the Doctor was pondering his reply, another door from that which he had entered opened softly, and a pair of slippered feet stole on tip-toe into the room. Their owner was a man not far from the Doctor's age, but as different in personnel as well might be. He wore neither the drooping, silky mustache nor beard of any kind, and the smoothness of his face being that of one who little needs rather than too vigorously uses the razor, assisted his comparative smallness of stature and willowy slenderness of build in giving him an air of what at first sight might have been pronounced insignificance. A closer second reading would have corrected this estimate, calling attention to a pair of eyes which, if not alarmed into averting themselves with the shy consciousness of submitting to inspection, must at once be recognized as belonging to a marked individuality—an abundant capacity either for doing or suffering—large, out of all proportion to the pale, thin face below them, very mobile and expressive, and of a dark hazel almost femininely soft. They were fringed by long, drooping lashes; delicate, but strongly lined eyebrows overarched them; and though in themselves prominent, the heavy, pent-house brow and high white dome of forehead above them made them seem sunken and cavernous. Cuthbert Kearney looked like a man who had watched, waited, and worked hard all his life—a man to whom many things in that life had brought pain, and who had endured much lately. His curling, brown hair already began to be grizzled upon the temples, and the great prominent forehead, which seemed to make up more than half his face, was ruled with fine lines which the graving tool of ten years more would follow and turn into wrinkles. His head was that of the most sensitive, intellectual temperament—his eyes undeniably handsome—below these there was not a feature less than inordinately plain; his nose was very large, with coarse, flaring nostrils; his chin was poverty-stricken; his mouth a meagre-lipped slit, cut long and straight across his face.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS FOR HOUSE-KEEPERS.

WHAT ARE PUDDINGS, CREAMS, &c., without their appropriate flavors? Truly they are "stale, flat, and unprofitable."

BURNETT'S

PERFECTLY PURE AND HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLAVORING EXTRACTS supply this want.

LEMON, VANILLA, ROSE, CINNAMON, ALMOND, PEACH, ORANGE, CLOVES, CELERY, NECTARINE, GINGER, NUTMEG.

FLAVORING EXTRACTS

are of primary importance in cookery; and of all articles of this description the highly concentrated prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO. are pronounced by leading cuisiniers—Professor Blot among the number—the purest and best.

STANDARD EXTRACTS

A STRONGLY SCENTED

EXTRACT OF VANILLA

is manufactured by a mixture of the Tonqua Bean—the fruit of the diplexis odorata, a product of Guinea—with the genuine Vanilla. The Tonqua is a cheap bean used to perfume snuff, and is utterly unfit for culinary purposes; yet its strong scent and coloring properties give an appearance of strength well calculated to deceive. The pure Vanilla, as found in yields a true and delicate flavor easily recognized by the experienced.

BURNETT'S STANDARD EXTRACT,

NONE BUT STANDARD GOODS

ISSUE FROM THE HOUSE OF

JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.

Their FLAVORING EXTRACTS are pronounced by all consumers PERFECTLY PURE AND HIGHLY CONCENTRATED. They preserve the true flavor of the fruits and spices from which they are prepared. The cheap extracts which interested parties endeavor to force on the market can only impose on the inexperienced. The best judges know them to be not only unpleasant to the taste, but positively injurious.

MANY HOUSEKEEPERS are not aware of the deception practiced in the manufacture of Flavoring Extracts for culinary use. Many of them are highly deleterious, the flavors of the fruits and spices they represent being imitated with pungent oils and acids.

"BURNETT'S STANDARD EXTRACTS"

(THREE SIZES)

are made from the finest specimens of the fruits and spices they represent, and are perfectly healthful.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.
First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.
Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.
Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.
Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.
Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lots at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.
Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.
Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.
Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.
When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us. Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves. Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.
Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.
We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND
Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND
CURES
Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.
POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

FACETIÆ.

COURTSHIP is often made up of the fact that the girl calls her beau a noble youth, a hero, a genius; while he calls her a paragon of beauty and gentleness; and so they keep tickling each other till they get married; and then comes the scolding.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Ice.—What, to break, often lets a man into hot water.
Ideal.—Concentrated essence of Narcissus—and Hercules.
Idiot.—The philosopher who keeps his wit till he wants it.
Idleness.—A common, very pleasant to stray over, but on which only geese and donkeys live.
Imagination.—The photographer of the mind.
Impertinence.—A weed cultivated by downagers and waiting-maids.
Impression.—The Pythoness of woman's oracle.
Impulse.—A creator who has sent many sins into the world.
Inconsistency.—The opal in Psyche's girdle.
Industry.—The privilege of the poor; without that we should have none of those pretty Expositions.
Ink.—The black slave who drops tears enough over the lies he writes to make a second Black Sea.
Innocence.—The card left by angels on their visits.
Inspid.—Wanting in taste—e. g., if I praise Blondina's chignon to Brunetta, she naturally finds me inspid.
Interest.—What she takes in any one possessing capital.
Inviolable.—The secret she would not for worlds let any one but you know.
Invitation.—Ground-bait.
Jealousy.—The deformity of imperfect love.
Jet.—The coal who aspires to become a diamond.
Jilt.—A short word of the feminine gender. When used in the masculine is generally translated into "Breach of Promise with heavy damages."
Jointure.—The glue used for splicing.
Justice.—What she is always thirsting for, and consequently never has to give away.
Juvenile.—An epithet only applied to those who forget their old age.
Key (latch).—The sceptre of the kingdom of Home.
Kiss.—The electric spark which cooks a pair of souls.
Kneel.—The ne plus ultra of devotion.

Little Mary was discussing the great hereafter with her mamma, when the following ensued: "Mamma, will you go to heaven when you die?" "Yes, I hope so, my child." "Well, I hope I'll go too, or you'll be lonesome." "Oh yes, and I hope your papa will go too." "Oh no, papa can't go; he can't leave the store!"

A little boy had lived for some time with a peevish uncle. The latter was one day walking out with the child by his side, when a friend, accompanied by a greyhound, addressed him. The little fellow, never having seen a dog of so slight and slim a texture, clasped the creature round the neck with the impassioned cry, "Oh, doggie, doggie! and do you live w' your nuncle, too, that you are so thin?"

A rural pastor prayed fervently for rain during a severe drought, which began to fall in torrents just as the services closed, when two farmers, walking home together, were getting wet, and one remarked to the other, "The parson does pray with a good unction." "Yes," replied the other, "but he lacks judgment."

A DISH FOR AN OGRE.

In the menu of a court banquet, given in the Galerie de Diane, on the occasion of the marriage of Prince Humbert with the Princess Margaret, one of the items is that of "filets d'innocents à la Princesse Marguerite." What can filets d'innocents be? The nearest things that we can fancy, even for the banquets of people who were once believed to eat frogs, and actually do eat horse, are slices of sucking-pig.

MRS. LYON'S FAVORITE HEIR—
 "Home, sweet home!"

Half-bred horses make capital sandwiches.

HOW DOETH THE LITTLE BUSY BEE?
 —Very indifferently, we should imagine—seeing how often it is to be found in the "cells."

Uxborough, who eloped with his wife, always speaks of the golden symbol which he then placed on her left hand as a runaway ring.

"SCIENCE GOSSIP."

The proper thing to use with gun-cotton is shot silk.

A patent has been taken out for making pens with cocoa-nibs.

Ladies will be pleased to hear that a process has been discovered by which they can electro-plait their hair.

Many persons have burnt their fingers by dabbling in petroleum.

A scientific ghost-story will shortly appear in fortnightly numbers, founded on spectrum analysis.

NOBODY'S CHILD—Joshua (the son of Nun).

Mrs. Partington has been reading the health-officer's weekly reports, and thinks that "Total" must be an awful malignant disease, since as many die of it as all the rest put together.

AN INTERESTING GIRL—One whose money interest is ten thousand.

CAPITAL BEGGAR.—One of the importunate juveniles who solicit pennies was asked, "Where is your mother?" She answered, diffidently, "She is dead." "Have you no father?" "Yes, Sir, but he is sick." "What ails him?" continued the questioner. "He has got a sore finger, Sir." "Indeed!" "Yes, Sir." "Then why don't he cut it off?" "Please, Sir," responded the little maid, "he hain't got any money to buy a knife."

When is a man thinner than a shingle?—When he is a shaving.

HISTORIC DOUBTS.—An auctioneer, at a late sale of antiquities, put up a helmet with the following candid observation: "This, ladies and gentlemen, is a helmet of Romulus, the Roman founder; but whether he was a brass or iron founder, I can not tell."

TO EPICURES.—The best man to consult on the "Art of Laying the Table" would be the notorious Mr. Home.

A lady in New York recently sent a request to a friend to accompany her to Grace Church. The reply came back, "Sorry, but I'm dressed for St. Paul's."

A SWEET PLANET—The honeymoon.

At a collection lately made at a charity fair a young lady offered the plate to a rich man who was noted for his stinginess. "I have nothing," was his curt answer. "Then take something, Sir," she replied: "you know I am begging for the poor."

A young lady who was reading a novel was asked by a gentleman how she liked the style. "The style? the style?" was the answer: "oh, Sir, I've not come to that yet."

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

BRIDAL DRESSES AND COIFFURES.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Bridal Dresses.

Fig. 1.—BALL DRESS FOR BRIDE. Under-skirt of white taffetas, covered with a tulle robe, trimmed with four bouillonées and a flounce. Over-skirt, likewise of tulle, caught up on each side by two white ribbons terminated by bows, ornamented with bouquets of orange blossoms. Low corsage of tulle and white taffetas, with tulle and of the same materials. Pearl comb and sprays of orange blossoms in the hair.

Fig. 2.—BRIDAL DRESS (FOR CHURCH). Dress of white tulle, trimmed with three bias folds of terry velvet, with a cordon of orange blossoms in the middle; two similar bias folds are set on each side, en tablier; these folds slope backward toward the bottom, and become narrower as they approach the waist. High corsage, trimmed with a cordon of orange blossoms, with sprays falling behind so as to form little basques. Tulle veil, and wreath of orange blossoms.

Bridal Coiffures.

Fig. 1.—Cluster of orange blossoms, diminishing on each side, and forming a sort of flat diadem, with chignon adorned with curls of different lengths.

Fig. 2.—Hair brushed back above the ears, with a braid across the front, covered with a thick wreath of orange blossoms; the veil is fastened at the back of the braid.

Fig. 3.—Hair brushed backward and slightly pulled, en auréole. Comb of large pearls set on the outside of the veil, which begins above the forehead. Orange blossoms scattered over the head and in the curls.

ARTIFICIAL SINS.

THE natural sins, as they may be called, might be supposed to be quite numerous enough and of sufficient difficulty of eradication without devising artificial ones. Parents, however, are daily most busily engaged in this work of supererogation in the bringing up of their children. The Ten Commandments were once supposed to contain a pretty full summary of what ought and ought not to be done, and when man and child were tolerably faithful in their obedience to the commands of the Decalogue, they were wont to be regarded as pretty fair examples of virtue. This, however, does not seem to be the prevalent opinion nowadays.

Mamma, to gratify her own vanity, dresses her pretty May or graceful Laura Matilda in silks and satins, and hence forthwith a new command: "Thou shalt not spoil thy frock." The command, of course, is disobeyed. Miss Laura Matilda, in spite of her silk and satin, is a child, and, obeying the instincts of her age, runs, falls, tumbles about, and in giving full and natural play to her elastic young muscles, finally rends the beautiful and expensive strait-jacket within which her mother has striven in vain to confine her irrepressible limbs. "There's a naughty girl!" is of course the maternal verdict which is at once followed by condign punishment. We venture to reverse the decision, and would, if we could, the penalty also. It is the mother and not the child who has been guilty. It was an absurd vanity which impelled her to put upon her child an inappropriate dress, and to command that it be not spoiled. It was while acting in strict accordance with a law of her nature that the child burst her silken bonds and disobeyed the maternal mandate.

Again, mamma, from staying too late night after night, at Mrs. A's, Mrs. B's, Mrs. C's, and at every other party of the season, from want of outdoor exercise, eating too much pie-crust, or reading too many novels, or from any other abuse of the laws of health, has become nervous. Hence another command from mother to child: "Be quiet." She might as well order the birds not to sing, to do which is no more natural for them than for children to make a noise. "Cry! shout! bawl! stamp your feet! let the whole house ring with your merry voices, ye little ones!" say we, for these are the means a wiser Parent than the irritable mother of modern luxury has ordained for the proper physical development of infant and child. There is no other way of giving full expansion to the lungs, breadth to the chest, and that tension to muscles and nerves so essential to health of body and mind.

Four-fifths at least of the so-called faults of childhood are really so far from being faults that they might be considered virtues were it not impossible, in consequence of the injudicious commands of parents, to practice them without filial disobedience. Many a household is kept in a constant state of anarchy by too much law. There are parents who at every hour of the day are issuing new edicts in regard to the eating and drinking, the dressing, the moving, the talking, and the very expression of their children, who in many cases are unwilling, and in most unable, to obey them. Thence come pains and penalties, weeping and gnashing of teeth, family jars, disaffection, and a generally disorderly and unhappy household.

If parents were less inventive of commands there would be more obedience and domestic virtue as well as peace.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Jane.

MY DEAR JANE,—So you are really about to see if you can earn your own living, and the luxury and splendor in which you have been bred have wholly disappeared! I heard of it only yesterday, when I met sweet little Kitty Clover, in a new spring bonnet, which I may call a mere touch-and-go of daisies and lace, and she said to me, "Think of it, dear Mr. Bachelor, our poor friend Jane is obliged to do something for her living!" As she spoke she looked so rueful, and squeezed her exquisite handkerchief so ardently, and turned her soft little eyes upon me so sadly that I felt as if I were talking with a sorrowful hamadryad. For I could not feel as if sweet Kitty Clover knew exactly what she was talking about; and when she said she was "so sorry," and at the same moment smiled sweetly and nodded to Harry Diamond, who passed by, I was sure that it must be only the grand-daughter of Undine, not yet in love, with whom I was chatting.

As I looked at the young woman, dear Jane, I thought of you. For you, too, have been always clad in touch-and-goes of daisies and lace, and Harry Diamond has been your cavalier, and life has been little, outwardly, but a long and lively holiday. "Actually obliged to do something for her living!" said Kitty Clover, as if the trial were quite beyond mortal endurance. And how comical and tragical it is that the world in which she moves is of Kitty's opinion, and thinks it the most melancholy fate that can befall a young woman, the necessity of supporting herself. You may test the value of this judgment for yourself. For I know, as other people do, that you have had the very best opportunities of making "a satisfactory settlement," so far as money and all that money procures are concerned.

It is no secret, dear Jane, that the Honorable Robin Gray asked you in marriage. Every body knows him, by name at least. Every body knows how rich he is, how generous, how well-mannered, and of what a pleasant family. It is my opinion, although I would judge no fellow-creature harshly, that Kitty Clover, aged nineteen, would marry the Honorable Robin Gray, aged sixty, to-morrow, if he would only give her the opportunity. And Kitty is a fair example of the young women with whom you have grown up. The Honorable Robin was open, he was flagrant, in his attentions to you. He pursued you with flowers. He lay in wait for you with surprises and pleasures. I shall not deny that you gave him no encouragement. You kindly, but decidedly, declined what it was possible to decline, and neither by word nor look did you authorize him to continue the sweet chase. Dear Jane, he did continue it, and I did not wonder. Ah me! ah me! The spectacle was like the scent of apple-blossoms to one who told his love under an apple-tree in some dear old June. No, I did not wonder that he would still persist. Have not you women learned—not even you women of this youngest generation, enriched with all the experience of all the generations gone—that Daphne fascinates most in flying, that despair for Diana is almost sweeter than the caress of Venus? "High-born Helen, round thy dwelling," sings Charles Lamb, "these thirty years I've paced in vain." But if she had not made him pace—if she had descended and opened the door, or beckoned him from the window, to enter, twenty-nine years ago—the fervor of the feeling, the devotion, the longing, where would they have been?

It was known that your father had lost all his fortune, and that there was no chance of his recovering himself. Old and worn and wearied, believing in his later day that money was the substantial good, and that the feelings of youth were often illusions, I do not wonder that he was most anxious to see you the wife of a rich and honored man. It is supposed, and I for my part believe, dear Jane, that he earnestly urged you to consider every thing; that he told you piteously how he was to be thrown upon the world in his age, poor and comfortless, unless you succored him; that he appealed to you for your mother's sake, whose pride would be broken and whose life must be wretched, suddenly cast down from her throne, unless you intervened. I do not know that he actually said all this in words, but I am sure that he suffered you to know that he thought it and felt it, and that he implored you by marrying a man whom so many of your companions would gladly marry to avert all these sorrows and save your family. I do not know, nor do I suspect, what your mother said. But I know how carefully she had always contrived to throw you among the most "desirable" young men. I know what kind of young gentlemen she invited to pass a week or to spend the night at The Convolvulus and Hybrid Honey-suckles, your father's summer-place upon the Hudson, named by her. Young Diamond and Turquoise and Ruby relieved each other, so to say, in her summer invitations; but never to my knowledge was Richard Whittington, nor any of his family, invited. Therefore, you knew what she felt, what she wished; and the burden laid upon you was very heavy.

Your education had made it so—for you were immorally educated. I mean you were bred, as so many American girls in large cities are, as if you were born in the purple and had nothing to do but to do nothing elegantly. A man who was born of poor parents, who has seen his mother and sisters hard-working women, comes to New York, makes a fortune, buys a fine house, gives carte blanche to Marcotte, and insists only that his daughters shall dress richly and treat their talents as Chinese women treat their feet. What can the poor things do but marry the men who are able to provide the conditions to which their helplessness is accustomed? And when one breaks out of the rut and says that she prefers to be of some use in the world there is a distinct shudder, as if she were a very eccentric, if not worse, young person. Do you know, my dear Jane, that I should have more patience with Tom Noddy and Solomon Grumb when they rail at women's voting as unladylike, if the same fellows did not regard every thing that women can do, except nursing children and dressing in the fashion, as unladylike? They sneer at scholarly women; they shrug their shoulders at women who are artists; they stare at women who have serious opinions; and they patronize and pity women who are sensible, industrious, and skillful enough to earn their own living. The tomfools are complaining all the time of the expensiveness of living—they say, with the German song, Life is lovely, but it costs so much!—and when you suggest pleasantly that the better half of creation is paralyzed, and that if they did their share the cost of life would be diminished one-half, you are told that you hold extreme and impracticable views, and that you wish to abolish Heaven's own separation of the sexes. My dear Jane, is it this world that is called the Paradise of Fools? Do you seriously think that there can be two of them?

When you told the Honorable Robin Gray that it was not to be thought of, that it was preposterous, and that it was very unfriendly to insist upon urging it—all of which I have no doubt you did tell him, although I was not hidden, like Miss Clack in "The Moonstone," behind the drawing-room curtain—you did something which, although it was what you ought of course to have done, was yet, under the circumstances, heroic. And I hope your father and mother then saw what I meant when I spoke of your immoral education. I hope they saw that the manner in which you had been brought up made it horribly difficult for you to resist marrying a man whom you did not love, and who was old enough to be your father.

My dear Jane, you will not find it an easy task to earn your own living, and for that in a great degree your parents are responsible. You have no taste for music; you are not a scholar; you are not skillful with the needle; you know no trade. Indeed the prospect is as unpromising as it would be with dear, sweet Kitty Clover herself. Nobody is more successful than she when all that is necessary is to wear the prettiest dresses with the prettiest grace, and to match the color of her gloves with that of her ribbons. Yet all that bright glamour of dress and society has no surer foundation than speculation in Broad Street. A mistake there, a sudden and grave public event, and away fly riches, and woe for the airy touch and go! They only are really rich who are masters of a useful calling. I remember old Cardinal Thomas, the only American Cardinal—or am I mistaken, and was he only Archbishop?—saying to me once, "I shall be always a rich man." And when I looked at his Eminence's scarlet cape and smiled, he smiled too, and said, "No, not because of the revenues of the Church, but because I was bred a baker. There is no part of my trade of which I am not master, and bread is the prime necessity of man." How often, as I look at the scarlet cape of her Eminence, Mrs. Tilbury, or of Mrs. Pound, or of Mrs. Hundredweight, I ask myself, "Is there a baker under that Cardinal?" How often, dear Jane, as I have seen you—beautiful, admired, superb—I have asked, "Is there a useful woman under that fine lady?" And now you are about to prove it. You were not, indeed, a practically useful woman before you were a fine lady, as my ancient friend was a baker before he was a Cardinal, but you have the character and the resolution that will make you what you wish.

I do not disguise from you—as I did not from myself when I said farewell to sweet Kitty, and walked meditatively to my room—I do not disguise that it is a very weary way upon which you enter. But so it is for men. It is the hard battle of life. It requires such wariness, such constant self-sacrifice, such pertinacity! The first point of all is to see that nothing honorable is to be refused which you can really do. The second is to summon all your courage to endure the strange inhumanity which you must surely encounter. Yet, Jane, you may be very certain that you have not failed until in your loneliness and bareness of life, in the dull routine and unsmiling perspective of ill-paid work, of mortified taste, of baffled expectation, you wish in your heart that you had listened to the Honorable Robin Gray. Remember then, dear Jane, that his ancestor was successful, and that the Jane he wooed he won. But remember also that if your heart which refused him aches, her heart which accepted him was broken.

Your faithful friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BRIDAL TOILETTES.

WE are reminded by our readers that a few hints about wedding toilettes and the selection of a trousseau are timely at all seasons of the year. The suggestion is made also that we relate what is attainable by people in that golden mediocrity, neither very rich nor very poor, rather than the elaborate and extravagant outfits selected for wealthy brides. To the latter class any information we can give is useless, as a carte-blanche to their modiste and milliner relieves them of all care in the matter. It is to the careful young woman with but a few hundred dollars to spend that we hope to give some assistance.

What shall the wedding dress be is the first question. With those who can afford it satin is the usual choice. A white satin dress has hitherto required considerable expenditure for lace and jewelry, but a pretty fashion coming into vogue in Europe dictates that the bride be simply dressed, with little lace, and no ornaments but orange flowers. Unless very fine lace is used it is better to dispense with it altogether, and trim with soft illusion and hand-made satin trimmings.

A bridal dress of rich white satin made lately had the trained skirt simply but effectively trimmed with a ten-inch box-pleated flounce. On the front width was an apron trimming of tulle caught in honey-comb figures with orange blossoms. The satin corsage was low under the arms, and filled out to the proper height with a chemisette of tulle trimmed like the apron. Long tulle veil with puffed border.

Skirts of wedding dresses are seldom looped in the panier fashion. Simplicity of style is affected almost to severity. Long trains go flatly in front, with fullness at the back, are prescribed as more appropriate.

It is a matter of fancy as to whether the corsage is high or low. Grecian folds of Lyon's tulle are made into berthas for both styles, and thick quillings of the material of the dress surround the shoulders. A tiny fichu, not more than three inches wide, is formed of folds and lace, and is sewn on the dress instead of the bretelles so much worn during the winter. This is only suitable for dresses that open in front, as most evening dresses are now made.

If the corsage is low the sleeve is merely a fold of satin or fall of lace caught together with a bouquet. Narrow coat-sleeves accompany the high corsage.

The price of satin varies from $7 to $15 a yard. The popular quality, twenty-seven inches wide, is sold at $8. A very good article, all pure silk, but narrower, measuring only twenty-two inches, ranges from $5 to $7. Faille and soft poult de soie are the next choice after satin, and cost about the same. Very handsome corded silks may be bought at from $4 to $6. Plain taffetas are as low as $3, but these require an over-skirt of illusion that adds considerably to the outlay.

An inexpensive wedding dress is made of corded silk. As the material is not very heavy the skirt is lined throughout, the train being faced with silk. The trimming consists of three folds of silk headed with satin piping, arranged in two crescent-shaped groups on the front width, and curving down the sides, where they are finished with a large rosette of satin. As economy was consulted in this dress it was found best to dispense with sashes and trimming on the back of the skirt where the veil would suffice for ornament. The corsage is half high, with folds of silk over the shoulders and a pendent ornament at the end of each fold. Illusion neckerchief at the throat, with orange flowers instead of buttons down the front. Easy-fitting sleeve, rather wide below the elbow.

Very pretty veils are furnished by the dress-makers for $12 or $15. They are made of soft illusion, entirely untrimmed, but are cut in graceful style. The selvage edges of the tulle, with a wide hem, form the top and bottom of the veil, which should fall almost to the end of the train. The short veil over the face reaches nearly to the waist. This simple illusion veil is very much admired. Lace, satin pipings, and wide ruches of tulle add greatly to the expense of the veil, making it cost often $100. Clematis, jasmine, and white lilies occasionally take the place of the traditional orange flower for bridal wreaths. The bridal dress should be worn frequently during the honeymoon, and not often afterward. It is then a compliment to the hostess; but as it is the dress worn on the most conspicuous occasion of the wearer's life it attracts attention, and soon becomes familiar.

It is scarcely necessary to speak of the tulle and illusion dresses over taffeta skirts sometimes worn by brides, as they do not differ materially from many of the evening dresses already described. At a quiet wedding lately the fair young bride and her maids looked very lovely in dresses of white organdy, simply adorned with fluted ruffles of the same. Such a dress will come within the bounds of the most modest income, as the finest organdy is only $1 50 a yard, and is two yards wide.

We must advise our readers of the fact that silks are cheaper now than they will probably be at another season. They have already advanced ten per cent. in Europe, and the increase will soon be perceptible here. A novelty, suitable for the reception dresses that form part of the trousseau, is called moiré serge. It is as thick as satin, but soft and pliant like poul de soie, has a thick diagonal reps, and is beautifully watered. It is brought out in a delicate shade of lavender, Metternich green, flesh color, and blue. There are ten yards in each pattern. The price is $125. It is the most decided novelty of the season, and only to be found at one house.

We think also that it is safe in buying a silk dress to select one of the chameleons, in which several tints are blended together in a way that looks equally well by gas and sun light. They are greatly worn in Paris now, and are growing into favor here. From $4 to $8 a yard is asked for them. The lilacs and gray shot with white are especially appropriate for brides.

A correspondent asks if there is any prescribed street costume for a bride. We answer in the negative. There never was a time when such matters were left so entirely to the taste of the wearer. Even the conventional white bonnet gives place to one appropriate to the dress with which it is worn. The most approved toilettes are those in which the dress, wrapping, bonnet, parasol, shoes, and gloves are of one color, and as nearly as possible of one material. A handsomely dressed bride appeared at church for the first time in a short suit of mauve silk. The dress has an upper skirt looped en paniers. The scarf-mantle had a deeply-pointed hood. Silk bonnet in the Watteau shape, with coiffure and barbes of point appliqué. Mauve parasol with lace cover. Another pretty suit, designed for bridal visits, is of pearl and blue changeable silk, trimmed with light blue silk.

A morning dress of cashmere is always seasonable in our changeable climate. It is better to have this of a delicate color, either lavender, light blue, or pale amber, as it gives variety to the bridal wardrobe in which white is always apt to predominate. It should be made loosely, falling in large pleats from the shoulder. Shell puffs of silk and the new worsted guipures are suitable trimming. Alpaca frays easily, and is no longer in favor. Morning Gabrielles of white muslin are included in the trousseaus furnished at first-class houses. They are of nansook, of Swiss muslin, and of piqué. When only one is made it is best to have it of nansook, as it is not so thin as Swiss, and washes better than piqué. Striped linens, the pretty French jaconets with colored figures at forty cents a yard, and the American cambrics at twenty-five cents, make neat breakfast dresses, and seem to have entirely superseded the sheer lawns once so much worn.

For afternoon dresses there are the poplinettes, a silk and linen mixture, the grenadines, and the light silks, stripes, checks, and chinés, sold at $2 a yard. A stylishly made black silk is also serviceable on many occasions, and is always lady-like and in good taste.

A gored skirt and polonaise, plainly trimmed, is all that is required for the traveling dress. There is a perplexing variety offered from which to select the material. Silk serge is considered the most distingué, but is expensive, and instead we choose a serviceable poplin or woollen serge, that costs only half the money, and will better endure the hard usage of travel.

UNDER-LINEN.

The preparation for a trousseau begins properly with the under-linen, as it requires longer time for completion than the outside garments, and is more usually made at home. Moreover, the styles of under-clothing do not change often, and dresses should be left until the last to have the benefit of any novelty in fashion that may arise.

We can not, of course, prescribe the number of garments necessary. Much depends on the supply already on hand. Orders given at the furnishing houses usually include a dozen linen and a dozen cotton of the principal articles of under-clothing. Half of each dozen should be handsomely trimmed. The others are intended for constant use, and should be simply made.

Lace and linen cambric are soon worn out or torn out in washing. Valenciennes lace is the most suitable for trimming, but a fine thin lace thickens up in washing, and looks no better than a coarser and more durable article. Very sheer linen cambric is expensive, and is so frail that it is not worth the tedious needle-work required for puffs and ruffles. A good firm quality sold at $1 25 a yard is wider, looks quite as well, and lasts longer than that sold at $3. Appliqué embroidery, or transferring as it is sometimes called, must be sewn on very securely, or it will be roughened and torn off by the smoothing-iron. Thick needle-work is the most substantial of all trimmings. The eyelets and compass work, once so fashionable, are seldom seen now. Hamburg embroidery is inexpensive, as it is done by machinery, and is always in pretty designs. It is best to choose patterns without any reverse work or herring-bone.

Richardson's linen is selected for the best outfits. In muslins it is requisite that the threads be closely woven, and the selvedge even. French percale and New York Mills are serviceable for articles that require a heavy material, such as gowns and drawers. Wamsutta is preferred for chemises, and Lonsdale for skirts. Jones's cambric and French nansook make the more handsome gowns. Jaconet is but little used.

The chemise and drawers should be trimmed to match and worn en suite. Chemise bands are very wide. Many ladies prefer them closed all around. The sleeves are merely a row of lace and embroidery. A deep fall of trimming is sometimes attached to the band, reaching to the waist to form a corset cover. Half a dozen low bodices with short sleeves are provided for corset covers. Some of these are entirely formed of puffs and gathered into a belt, while others are made of pleats, or are tight-fitting.

A dozen night dresses is considered a sufficient number. The favorite pattern is a deep yoke, pointed before and behind, with three widths in the skirt. Bands around the neck look neater than turn-down collars. Coat-sleeves are used altogether. The best half dozen gowns are of linen or nansook. If Valenciennes is used for trimming it should be stitched in with a narrow band of the material.

Petticoats of different lengths must be arranged to suit the skirts of street dresses, demitains, and trains. They should be gored almost flat in front, and gathered at the sides and back. Tucks and ruffles are the trimmings for short petticoats. Embroidery and lace and elaborate trimming is lavished on trained petticoats, as they are often worn with short jackets for breakfast dresses. Several petticoats to be worn under the crinoline are also essential. These are short and narrow, containing only three widths of muslin, and are gored to fit the figure about the hips. Flannel skirts should not be made too full. Half a dozen at least are necessary.

Short dressing sacques are convenient to dress the hair in. They are made of percale or of cambric, and are ruffled, or plainly trimmed. Long dressing-gowns are made with body and skirt in one. The fullness is laid in pleats and held by a cord and tassel at the waist.

Ladies usually have their favorite style of corset. We can safely recommend the Glove-Fitting Corsets, both for durability and good shape. They are made of the best materials and are very moderate in price, ranging, we believe, from $3 to $7, according to the embroidery upon them.

It is necessary that two crinoline skirts be provided—a short one for street dresses, and a trained one for full dress. If steel skeletons are worn there should be half a dozen muslin covers for the bottoms of them. These are made of thick white muslin, half a yard wide, covering the crinoline inside and out, and buttoned together at the upper edge. They are prettily trimmed with a fluted ruffle. The Lace Imperial Skirt lately introduced does away with the necessity for these covers, as the mesh of the lace is woven thickly toward the bottom; and the whole skirt may be put into the water and washed without injuring the steel hoops. The only style of panier skirt for sale in New York is a French skirt imported by but one house, and sold at $20. Ladies contrive devices of their own for giving the full appearance now in vogue, such as puffs of horse hair, or crinoline worn beneath the hoops.

The supply of handkerchiefs should be very liberal. The neatest style for morning use is of sheer linen with a wide hem, and the initials, monogram, or given name, embroidered in a corner. Two or three tucks above a hem are also pretty. Ladies who are very neat with the needle make their own evening handkerchiefs at much less expense than they can be bought ready-made. A twelve-inch square of linen cambric is rolled at the edges, and bordered with Valenciennes insertion and lace. The material should be basted on paper to keep the proper shape. The cambric should be thin and sheer, and the lace very fine.

Plain cuffs, collars, and under-sleeves of linen and cambric may also be abundantly provided. It is best, however, to have but a few lace collars as the shape changes, and they are very expensive.

A few words of advice in conclusion. Do not buy ready-made under-clothing except at a first-class establishment. If the outfit is made at home do not attempt to do every thing with the sewing-machine. This is the fault with many furnishing houses. No matter how nicely machine-sewing is done there are seams that can be more neatly sewn by hand, such as joining selvages, and hemming on the bands of chemises. It is better to have a few things of good material than a great variety of poor ones. Retrench rather in the outside garments than in under-clothing.

It is impossible to say any thing definite of many of the accessories of a trousseau, such as lace shawls, mantles, furs, parasols, etc. These things are discussed incidentally in the Bazar, and their presence in a trousseau is regulated by circumstances, and limited by the means of the bride.

Thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN, VIRFOLET, and BAILLARD; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.

PERSONAL.

THE career of the Sorosis threatens to be something like that of a meteor. Several of its most prominent members, the Misses ALICE CARY (the President), PHOEBE CARY, KATE FIELD, and LUCY GIBBONS, have already seceded from the Sisterhood and tendered their resignations. Rumors are afloat of a new and select private organization, where there will be no lunches and no newspaper reporters.

At Madame POURTALE's ball, lately given in Paris, where none but short dresses were allowed to be worn, some of the ladies came in at a late hour with a frowning countenance. It was WORTH, the man-dressmaker, that had aroused their ire by his lack of punctuality. The Duchess de Castries, for instance, had not received her white dress, trimmed with lilies of the valley, till one o'clock in the morning, and even she was more fortunate than Madame de HANSFELD, whose dress of yellow tulle, trimmed with rose-buds and lilacs, did not reach her till half past two; but these ladies made a sensation, coming in as they did with their fresh costumes when all the rest were worn and faded.

A gentleman who has diverted himself at the Methodist General Conference at Chicago by making little pen-sketches of notable members, gives the following of one of the most scholarly and versatile men of the time: "One of the most eloquent debaters is Dr. MCCLINTOCK. He is a small man, with a round head, shining gray hair and eyes, and shining ruddy countenance, small mouth not unlike Dr. FOSTER's, but much more nervous and vitalized. He can talk like a bon vivant, study like a professor, debate like a Congressman, and preach to the admiration of camp-meeting and cathedral. He is probably the most versatile man in the Church, with the rarest commixture of a luxurious gentleman, severe student, brilliant speaker, and solid man of affairs. Full of energy, enthusiasm, and progress, as fresh and bold in new projects as if nearer twenty than sixty, he keeps the life-blood of youth and grace dancing happily in unwithering veins.

JAMES M. McLEAN, Esq., was, on the 18th instant, for the third time unanimously re-elected President of the New York Board of Fire Underwriters—a deserved compliment to one of the most intelligent and successful underwriters in the country.

Mr. WESTON, whose speed and endurance in walking have sent his name through the papers, advises persons who wish to emulate his fame to commence by swinging the arms by the side, keeping the mouth shut, not to run down hill, to wear laced shoes and linen stockings, and now and then to pour a little whisky into the shoes.

Mr. BURLINGAME seems to be greatly beloved by the native members of his embassy. While in San Francisco he went out to Alameda and remained three days. On his return the Chinese knelt around him in the public parlor of the "Occidental," with heads bowed to the ground in token of their thankfulness at his safe return.

Lord LYTTON is reported to have written a play for Mr. BANDMANN, the German and English actor, who has had so much success in this country and in England.

Much interest is being manifested in the forthcoming memoir of Mrs. DEL BAL, the accomplished lady who fell a victim to the yellow-fever at Panama last summer, which is being prepared by her mother, Mrs. RHODA E. WHITE, and will shortly be issued by Mr. DONAHUE, of Boston. The Viscount DE CHABROL, whose pleasant visit to this country last year will be remembered by many, and other distinguished Frenchmen, are anxious to promote its circulation in France; and Archbishop McCLOSKEY, of New York, writes to Mrs. WHITE: "I hope what I hear is true, that a memoir is being prepared by yourself, or under your immediate supervision. It will, I am sure, be most acceptable, not alone to the large circle of friends who, like myself, still remember the gifted and exemplary little JENNY WHITE as she was seen and known under the parental roof, or who, at a later date, were witnesses of her saintly virtues and daily acts of heroic charity in the country which, after marriage, became her home, but it will be acceptable also to very many besides of the general public, especially to those of her own sex, to which she was so truly a pride and ornament in life, and to which, in death, she has bequeathed such a beautiful example." The memoir is one in which all creeds will be interested, as affording a brilliant example of what a lady in the world can do who understands her duty to society and in society.

Miss CUSHMAN and Miss HOSMER are coming back to make the U. S. a little visit some time during the month. Miss C. has a neat place in Lenox, Massachusetts; not the kind of place owned by an Irish friend, who described it as "a mud cottage situated in a fine bit of bog."

On Wednesday, 3d instant, the remains of Senator DOUGLAS were removed to the sarcophagus under the monument. It was the anniversary of his death. The monument is one of the most picturesquely situated in the United States, amidst a grove of forest trees on the very margin of Lake Michigan.

The SULTAN has a powerful good time when he goes to the Opera. His last visit to the Nunn Theatre lasted from seven until twelve o'clock, during which time he heard the whole of the "Barbiere," and an act of each of "Robert," "Linda," "Martha," and "Norma." At the close of the performance he sent the manager a present of $5000. The man probably thought it was cheap at that.

It has been stated that Mr. DICKENS, during his stay in this country, made a very handsome present ($1000) to the mother of the late EDGAR A. POE. Genius, in our day, makes considerable money—gets well paid by the line or column; but "it was not ever thus." HOMER was a beggar; PLAUTUS turned a mill; TERENCE was a slave; BETHUS died in jail; PAUL BORGHESE had fourteen trades, yet starved with them all; TASSO was often distressed for a few shillings; CERVANTES died of hunger; CAMOENS, the writer of "Lusiad," ended his days in an almshouse; and VANGELAS left his body to the surgeons to pay for his debts. In England, BACON lived a lifetime of meanness and distress; Sir WALTER RALEIGH died on the scaffold; SPENCER died in want; MILTON sold his copyright of "Paradise Lost" for £15, and died in obscurity; DRYDEN lived in poverty and distress; OTWAY perished of hunger; LEE died in the streets; STEELE was in perpetual warfare with the bailiffs; GOLD-SMITH's "Vicar of Wakefield" was sold for a trifle, to save him from the grasp of the law.

A casual glance at Mrs. FANNY KEMBLE would satisfy most people that, once on the back of a horse, she would be able to manage him. In fact, you might bet on it. To illustrate: In 1857, Judge HENRY BISHOP, of Lenox, Massachusetts, where Mrs. K. has a country place, had a very vicious horse, which, among other bad habits, had that of lying down with his rider, kicking and biting in a most violent way. So the Judge sold his horse; but not many days afterward he was surprised to see him standing at the hotel door at Lenox with a side-saddle on his back. Having learned that FANNY KEMBLE was proposing to ride him, the Judge felt it his duty to remonstrate with her. So he waited until she came down, and then informed her plainly as to the characteristics of the animal, and hoped she would not think of mounting him. "There is a great deal of difference between you and I, Mr. BISHOP," said the lady. "When you are on the horse's back he knows you are afraid of him; and when I am on his back, he knows he is afraid of me." At another time Mrs. KEMBLE was a passenger on a train from Boston to New York. Just behind her was seated an elderly lady who became greatly annoyed by the sparks and dust that came through the open window raised by Mrs. K. In a lady-like manner the old lady closed the window, when the reader of SHAKESPEARE turned around and exclaimed, in such startling emphasis as roused the attention of every one in the car: "Woman! if you do that again I'll break the glass! Up went the window; and the old lady, trembling with affright, took a back seat.

We are quite sure that the following extract of a letter from Germany, describing two daughters of the royal family of Denmark—the Princess of Wales and the Grand Duchess of Russia—will be perused with interest by the lady-readers of the Bazar. If all our young women were as carefully and simply brought up, we should hear less of "the girl of the period" and more of matrimony among the young: "A lady who knows well the royal family of Denmark, and particularly the Princess of Wales and the Grand Duchess of Russia, speaks of them with the deepest interest and affection. She tells me they were educated in great simplicity and prudence, and so care-taking for the happiness of others, that in the simple pleasures they enjoyed, they wished the servants of the royal household to have some participation. Before the marriage of the Princess of Wales, after the betrothal, there came weekly to the palace at Copenhagen a box of elegant presents for the Princess—and she was not satisfied until the old nurse and upper servants had seen them. The dress of these two young girls, destined to fill such lofty stations, was simple in the extreme. Not until they were to go, at the age of fifteen years, to confirmation, were they permitted to wear silk—and as it is the custom to dress in black at the receipt of this sacrament, of course they must follow the customs of their country. The Queen of Denmark is a highly educated woman and a religious woman—she had never a thought of sharing a throne, and when her husband was called to succeed his uncle upon the throne of Denmark, she reluctantly left her simple and happy home; but in her new position she has been as true to herself as before, and as earnest in a faithful discharge of her more extended duties.

"When Prince ALBERT looked abroad for a wife to share the throne of England with his son, his choice fell upon the young ALEXANDRINA, and she was educated thereafter by a clergyman of the English Church in Copenhagen—that she might learn to fill her high destiny as Princess of Wales—perhaps as Queen of England. The house of Russia is devoted to the Grand Duchess DAGMAR, or, as she is called in Russia, by her other name of MARIA—and the Emperor is devoted to her, as he is to all his children. We have a young lady here who often has been a guest at the palace of St. Petersburg and is at home in the privacy of the domestic circle. She tells me the gentle influence of the young Princess is appreciated, and she receives the most devoted love."

PETER CARTWRIGHT, now eighty-three years of age, a remarkable man in many respects, witty, outspoken, very Western, and a true specimen of the old-time circuit-preacher, is in attendance at the General Conference of the Methodist Church, now in session in Chicago, and on the 3d inst. preached in one of the churches of that city. For sixty-four years he has been a preacher of the gospel.

CHARLES KEAN, shortly before his death, made a remark which may be borne in mind with advantage by gentlemen of the cloth. Said he: "You can have no idea what we actors suffer in hearing the noble church service murdered by bad reading. Fancy a man beginning a prayer, 'O Gawd,' instead of with the short, round, Saxon 'o.'"

Incidents like the following are so rare in this, or, for that matter, in any country, as to be worthy of perusal and emulation. It is given by the New York correspondent of the Hartford Courant: "A striking instance of financial honor has come to my attention this afternoon. At the commencement of the war the firm of MORTON, GRINNELL, & Co., dry-goods and commission merchants, failed for a considerable amount. The creditors compromised for a stipulated sum, and Mr. MORTON went into the stock business with other parties on Wall Street, under the title of L. P. MORTON & Co. Success attended his new business, and some time ago he notified his creditors, who had previously compromised and settled with him, that he proposed to pay them every dollar of his indebtedness, in regular installments. Yesterday Mr. MORTON paid over the third of these installments to the creditors of the old dry-goods firm. In this day of declining financial honor, when men display so much avidity to take advantage of the Bankrupt Act, an instance of this kind is certainly deserving of public mention."

ETAGÈRE OF GLASS PLATES.

Etagère of Glass Plates.

MATERIALS: A plate of glass seven inches long by thirteen wide; three plates, each thirteen inches long, and the first four inches, the second three and a quarter, and the third two and a half wide; two plates each three and a quarter inches square; two others three and a quarter inches in length by two and a half in breadth; red cloth, red silk, white cord, crystal beads, large red beads.

Young ladies will take pleasure in arranging for their rooms an etagère of this sort on which to preserve various little toilette articles. This etagère consists of eight glass plates, which are bound with a strip of red cloth an inch and a half wide, and joined by means of this binding. The binding is ornamented on the upper sides with a narrow border of crystal beads. The lambrequin trimming of the etagère consists of crystal and large red beads. The scallop trimming of the upper border, as also the three rings for hanging up the etagère, are made of wire and beads.

To make this etagère it will be necessary, first, to obtain the eight glass plates; next, bind all the plates with strips of the cloth which have been previously cut out in small points on the side which lies underneath, and trimmed with crystal beads on the upper side. About a quarter of an inch from the edge of the cloth strip fasten the thread, string on nine beads; * make a stitch at the distance of a quarter of an inch from the former, putting the thread beads, * a large red bead, three crystal beads; run the thread back through the red, and through the last of the seven crystal beads, and string on six beads; pass over one figure of the mosaic band; run the thread through the two beads of the next figure; string on two beads; run the thread through the third of the six strung beads, string on four beads, and repeat from * to the end of the mosaic band. Sew the finished border to the binding, as shown in the illustration.

through from above, run the thread back through three of the beads (counting from the end), so that the last two beads shall lie on the material; string on six beads and repeat from *. The largest plate, which forms the back of the etagère, must be bound on the edges. The cloth strips, which must lap over on both sides of the glass at the same width, are fastened on by means of gum arabic; besides which, lay on each corner a fold of the requisite depth, and overcast it on firmly. In doing this stretch the cloth tightly, so that the glass can not slip out. In binding the four smallest plates bring the bead trimming on both sides of the edges. Leave the long glass plates which form the shelves on the side next the back without binding. Overcast the plates together where they are intended to be joined.

For the scalloped trimming of the upper edge, which is about an inch in height, bend a white covered wire in the form shown by the pattern, and wind the scallops closely with crystal beads which have been strung on a thread of the requisite length.

Of the same material make the three rings, which are about an inch and a half in diameter. Fasten the trimming and rings to the etagère, as shown in the illustration. Lastly, make the lambrequin trimming. For this prepare, first, a narrow mosaic band as follows: take two long threads and tie the ends together *; string on the left-hand thread two beads, and on the right-hand thread six, after which run the left-hand thread through the last two of the six strung beads, and repeat from *, except that instead of six only four beads are to be strung. Having finished the band work a border on one side. In doing this run the thread through two of the beads which project, string on seven crystal

TAPESTRY NEWSPAPER STAND.

Tapestry Newspaper Stand.

MATERIALS: Canvas, corn-colored split worsted, violet zephyr worsted, violet worsted cord and tassels, strong reeds.

This stand consists of eight strong brown lacquered reeds, on which is fastened a pocket by means of a cord and tassels. Fasten these reeds together, as shown by the illustration, by means of small tacks, and finish the upper ends of the four upright reeds with metal points. The pocket is made in a new stitch, a very pretty tapestry design, which is worked similarly to the velvet stitch, and stands in projecting rows, but in this much further apart, alternating and run through with chenille or colored worsted. The loops are made of threefold split worsted, over a staff, which in the illustration is straw color, and imitates woven straw. The illustration shows the manner of working. Make, first, with the threefold split wool a straight stitch over four threads of the canvas; then lay in a staff which measures about three-quarters of an inch of the thread, and make a second stitch over the same threads, but at the distance of eight threads of the canvas from the first, so that a diagonal stitch shall be formed on the under side. Then make another stitch over the staff, and continue in the same manner. In the following row alternate the threads as shown in the pattern. The illustration shows a part of the staff drawn out, in order to render the canvas-threads visible. Draw through these stitches the colored wool or chenille, as shown in the illustration. In the original the side and bottom pieces are each ten inches wide by five in breadth, while the ends are of the same height; also five inches wide at the bottom, but sloped to the width of two inches and a half at the top. Line the finished tapestry with pasteboard and a lining of colored cashmere. Trim the edge together with the seam of the pocket with colored worsted cord. Two of these cords with tasseled ends are fastened on the upper sides of the ends, and afterward twined around the staffs, as shown in the illustration.

Pen Wiper.

MATERIALS: Green and black cloth, opaque, crystal, and black beads. This pen wiper is made of a piece of green cloth thirteen inches in length by five and a half in width. Notch this on both sides, and ornament with steel and opaque beads, as shown by the illustration. On the back of this sew a strip of black cloth two and a half inches in width, which is doubled lengthwise, so that one notched side shall stand out beyond the other at the distance of a quarter of an inch. The pointed edge of the strip of green cloth must stand out at the distance of a quarter of an inch beyond the furthest projecting black strip.

Then arrange the green strips on both ends, each in five single pleats, which point toward the edges, and sew together the two corners of each end of the strip. Lay the folded piece together so that the two joined corners come on each other, and the cloth takes the form which is shown in the illustration of a reduced size. These ends are then sewed together with a few stitches. The pen wiper is now banded by a strap worked in bead mosaic, which is six inches in length by one in breadth. The design may be chosen according to taste. Finally, finish with a few loops and ends of brown silk braid. The ends are raveled out into tassels, and fastened.

Tapestry and Crochet Lamp Mat.

See illustration, page 517.

MATERIALS: Fine plain canvas; green and gray split wool; crystal beads; pasteboard.

The illustration gives a quarter of this mat in full size. For the foundation cut a circular piece of canvas of the requisite size, and work on this small acute-angled parallelograms of green and gray split wool. Each of these parallelograms consists of twelve long stitches, which pass over eighteen canvas threads, and are drawn out at the distance of one thread. The illustration shows the manner of working these squares. For the crochet border, work of green and gray split wool, each, a pointed strip in single crochet. Each of these strips must be as long as the circumference of the tapestry foundation. On a foundation of suitable length (37 stitches for each point) crochet as follows:

1st round—* 17 sc. (single crochet) in the first 17 foundation stitches; 3 sc. in the 18th foundation stitch; 17 sc. in the following 17 stitches, after which work off the remainder of the foundation stitches as one stitch. From * repeat to the end of the round.

2d-6th rounds—Work in the same manner, taking care to bring the narrowing and widening always directly over that of the preceding rounds; and in working the last round string a bead on the thread before working each stitch. Having finished the two strips, weave them into each other in the manner shown (bringing the under side of the work on the right side of the mat), and join the points on one side as follows: With the green wool work 1 sc. in the first (green) point (working on the under side of the trimming, which is the right side of the crochet work) * 8 ch. (chain stitches) 1 sc. in the next (gray) point; 8 ch.; 1 sc. in the following (green) point. From * repeat to the end of the strip of trimming. Join this row in a round by working 1 sc. in the first stitch of the same row. After this 1 round sc. on the just finished round, stringing on a bead before each stitch. Finish each point with two bead loops, which imitate a tassel. Sew the interwoven strips together on the back. Then put the foundation on pasteboard, line it with percale, and sew on the border so that the edge, composed of the two rounds which joined the points on one side, shall form the connection of the border and the foundation.

THE WOODEN WEDDING.

"MY dear," said Mrs. Honeybell to her husband, as she handed him a cup of coffee across the breakfast-table, "we are not very far from the 24th of May."

"Well, what of it?" inquired Mr. Honeybell, who had the morning paper in one hand and a piece of hot, buttered toast in the other, and who was, as a general thing, rather uncommunicative at meal-times.

"Oh, Charles! you really have no sensibility!" returned the partner of his affections. "The 24th will be the fifth anniversary of our marriage. Our wooden wedding, Charles."

"Wooden what?" inquired Mr. Honeybell, laying down his paper; "is the woman crazy?" And Horace Honeybell, a cousin of the family, who had just returned from California, dropped his knife and fork in utter amazement as he exclaimed, "A wooden wedding! What under heavens may that be?"

"It is not strange, Horace, that you, who have just come home from that distant region, should know but little of what is going on here," said Mrs. Honeybell, with dignity. "But my husband, whom I do my best to keep au courant of the news and fashions of the day, really seems to care no more about them than if he was a wild Indian."

"Not so much," said Mr. Honeybell, breaking an egg with a reckless air.

"Not so much," repeated his wife, impressively. "I am sure when Horace gets a wife he will never trifle with her feelings as you do with mine, Mr. Honeybell!"

Horace thought he saw the lowering of a matrimonial storm, and with the kind intention of averting it, observed:

"But all this time, dear cousin, you have not explained to us what a wooden wedding really is."

"A wooden wedding," sweetly replied Mrs. Honeybell, "is a graceful manner, Horace, of marking in an agreeable way the otherwise gloomy flight of years. The fifth anniversary of a marriage is called the wooden wedding, the tenth the tin wedding, the twenty-fifth the silver wedding, and the fiftieth the golden wedding."

"A pack of nonsense as ever I heard," interrupted Mr. Honeybell. "And pray what is the good of all these weddings?"

"The friends of the happy pair," sentimentally continued Mrs. Honeybell, "on being informed of the occasion, which they wish to honor, gather at the house and present, as tokens of goodwill, elegant gifts either of wood, tin, silver, or gold, according to the particular anniversary."

"A regular speculation, by Jove!" cried Mr. Honeybell. "Haven't you left out some other weddings—china, glass, or brass, eh? Don't be backward in coming forward, or lose any thing for want of asking. I would not if I were you."

And Mr. Honeybell indulged in a long and rather contemptuous fit of laughter.

"When you have silenced your heartless mirth," said his wife, "I will proceed with what I have to say. As I have received many invitations since my marriage, I am now resolved to return them handsomely, on the occasion of our wooden wedding, by giving a large party on the 24th of May next. There will be an excellent supper, we shall receive the congratulations of our friends, and their gifts, which will all be of wood, but may consist either of simple domestic articles, or superb carved and ornamented objects of great value."

"In short, all kinds and descriptions of presents will be thankfully received," returned Honeybell. "By-the-way, I can suggest some valuable ones myself that are recommended in Scripture—a whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and a rod for the fool's back." Pray, am I expected to contribute anything in the way of black-mail myself?"

Now Mrs. Honeybell had never heard of the Highland caterans and their depredations in the olden time, and, bridling, she replied, "I expect to have at least two colored waiters. If you think I shall invite two or three hundred people without suitable attendance you don't yet know my character, Mr. Honeybell."

"Well, all that I can say," returned that gentleman, "is, that I denounce the whole system as one of social extortion and humbug; and I should not be surprised if you lost more than you gained by the operation. However, take your own way, Mary Jane. I am nobody in this establishment."

And Mr. Honeybell and his cousin having finished breakfast, buttoned their coats energetically, and went down town to business.

In the course of the next week the three hundred friends of the Honeybell family each received an immense card in a very large envelope, bearing a giant crimson H on the seal. On examination the card was found to carry in letters one inch long the words, "Wooden Wedding. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Honeybell at home on Tuesday evening, May 24th, from 8 until 11 o'clock."

"Hoity-toity!" cried Mrs. Honeybell's rich old maiden aunt, Miss Flintsure. "What's Mary Jane about now? Wooden wedding—hey? So, after giving her her bridal presents once, I am asked to supply another set, am I? People are getting very saucy, I think, with their 'wooden weddings' and stuff. What am I to give her, Susan Maria?"

"Oh, any thing, aunt. Only it must be of wood, you know."

"I consider it a piece of impudence to send me that card. The cheapest thing I can give will be a set of clothes-pins, although even they have raised in price since the war," said Miss Flintsure, maliciously.

"Oh, dear aunt, you surely would not give such a very mean present to Mary Jane. Do buy her something larger."

"Larger, hey?" said the old woman. "Well, what do you think of a step-ladder?" And, with a vicious look in her eyes, Miss Flintsure slammed the street-door after her, and set forth to buy something for the approaching solemnity.

"So Honeybell is going to have a 'wooden wedding,' is he?" said Mr. Woggles, his opposite neighbor, and inveterate rival.

"Why, yes, Mr. Woggles; and I suppose you will have to give something even if you don't go," replied the wife of his bosom, with a due regard to public opinion.

"The deuce take Honeybell and his wedding both," said Mr. Woggles. "How is he going to cram two or three hundred people into an English basement house, sixteen feet wide? I've seen enough of Honeybell. Don't I know how he served me in that case of Purdy versus M'Kinley when he was on the other side? I tell you, Sarah, he won't get much out of me." And Mr. Woggles, full of wrath, went his ways.

"That sweet woman, Mrs. Honeybell, is going to have a party!" said Mr. Barker to his wife, as he held the card of invitation daintily between his thumb and finger. "A wooden wedding! What a very nice idea! Why did not we have one, Julia?" he languishingly inquired (on the principle, probably, that one fool makes many).

"I am sure, Mr. Barker," returned madam, snappishly, "that you would never have been willing to incur the expense."

"Why, my dear love! how you talk! I am sorry it is too late now; but I really wish you would make it your business to select a gift for Mrs. Honeybell. Get something very handsome—a carved bracket, or an elegant chair, or even a rich writing-table. I don't care what it costs, but pray let it be something very recherché."

Mrs. Barker's eyes flashed. She suspected that her husband, when a gay bachelor, had been very much smitten with the then maiden charms of Mrs. Honeybell; and she knew to a certainty that not long ago, when she had requested Mr. Barker to purchase a new writing-table for her own use that he had replied she had better wait a few months until prices came down a little. It may, therefore, be judged in what an amiable state of mind Mrs. Barker went shopping to buy a present for the Honeybell wedding.

As the 24th of May drew near the mansion of the Honeybells became a scene of the greatest bustle. Mrs. Honeybell and the cook had long and anxious interviews. A strong smell of lemons and nutmeg pervaded the premises, and the vacant upper rooms were used as store-rooms for jellies and other dainties. Glass, china, and silver came in relays from the confectioners. "Our fête," said Mrs. Honeybell to her husband, "has an original cast, and will not be like an ordinary party. A wooden wedding does not happen every day in our family."

"I am thankful for that at all events," replied her somewhat sombre lord. "And may I inquire what is all that arrangement in the back drawing-room? I went in this morning, and whom should I find there but Moquette, the upholsterer, hammering away—what is going on, Mary Jane?"

"My love, he was only putting up the canopy."

"Canopy? Now, what do you mean?"

"Why, I thought, as we shall stand up together to receive our friends, a canopy of pink and white gracefully arranged in front of the pier-glass would have a fine effect."

"Thunder and Mars!" exclaimed Mr. Honeybell. "Stand up under a canopy! I won't. Pray, are you demented, Mary Jane? I shall just send Mr. Moquette about his business, and make him take those pink and white rags away with him."

Mr. Honeybell, followed by his wife, entered the little back drawing-room, which they indeed found remarkably enlivened and festooned with pink and white muslin, while tables covered with the same stood about, intended doubtless to receive the expected gifts.

"I hope you like the effect, Sir," said Mr. Moquette. "This here, Sir, is very fine," and he showed a scroll suspended in front of the mirror, on which appeared the words "Wooden Wedding. M. J. C. H."

"Why, what a piece of tomfoolery is this?" cried the astounded Honeybell.

"Tomfoolery, you cruel thing!" exclaimed Mrs. Honeybell, with a gush of emotion.

"Charles, you are a brute!"

"Thank you, my love," returned Charles, calmly; "so it would appear. And pray, Mary Jane, who is going to pay for all this rag, tag, and bobtail?"

"Bobtail!" sobbed Mrs. Honeybell, throwing herself on the sofa. "Oh-h-h, Charles!"

"Well, don't cry like a baby," returned Honeybell; "I suppose I must foot the bill. Moquette, you have made the rooms look like a theatre; you had better have the American flag and a few spread eagles in at once."

Mr. Honeybell then indignantly turned on his heel, and betook himself to another apartment, where he was soon deep in the manufacture of a bowl of Regent's Punch, and where he proved himself a perfect torment to all the servants of the establishment by calling for lemons, green tea, and Maraschino, until the housemaid declared to cook that, "faith, she was all of a tremble, so she was; small blame to her, with the master a-screamin' to her, and she away down in the sub-cellar."

The morning of the 24th of May dawned beautifully. Mr. Honeybell looked cross and gloomy. Horace Honeybell endeavored to be as cheerful as possible under the circumstances, seeing he was turned out of his chamber and put on the attic floor with little Charley and the infant twins. Mrs. Honeybell was in a fever of delight, excitement, and expectation. She had ordered a splendid pink dress for the occasion, and her train was imposing, while a wreath of pink asters was to surround her brow. The presents began to arrive early in the day. Just after breakfast a violent ringing at the bell brought the whole establishment out in the hall.

"Well, what have you got?" inquired Honeybell, as a parcel was opened by his wife.

"A charming present," she replied; "a box-wood salad-fork and spoon from Mrs. Martin. Very pretty, I must say. Charley, my son, carry this into the drawing-room."

Another ring and another present. "A chopping-bowl from Uncle Jones. Well, it is a useful gift. Three Shaker pails from Cousin Peters. (The hoop is off one of them.)"

"Shall I arrange these pails on the table?" inquired Mr. Honeybell.

"Of course not. This is only the beginning," replied his wife. "I expect a great many more elegant gifts."

"If ye please," exclaimed Bridget, sticking a scarlet head in at the door, "there's a mon down stairs with step-ladders."

"Step-ladders? He has made a mistake, no doubt. How many has he got?"

"There's three of 'em—a whole set, he says."

"Well, tell him to bring them in at the lower door," said the mistress of the establishment, while a shade of uneasiness passed over her countenance, which was not removed by the arrival of a churn, a wheel-barrow (good-sized), and five new empty barrels. As the family were engaged in inspecting these treasures, Bridget again appeared.

"If ye please," said this retainer, "the mon says he can't get the step-ladders into the lower door."

"Then let 'em stand outside," shouted the angry Honeybell. "I wonder, Mary Jane, who could have had the stupidity to send you a set of step-ladders."

"I should not wonder if it was Aunt Flintsure," said his wife, who was crying; "it's just like the old woman."

"Let's mount her up on top of one of them as soon as she comes in," cried young Horace, who was amusing himself with a loud performance on the churn. Charley, the four-year-old boy, had escorted himself in the wheel-barrow.

"Do let us get in order," cried Mrs. Honeybell. "Horace, you and Charles had better dress, and, indeed, I shall have to retire myself as soon as I have looked at the supper-table," and the excited mistress of the family hurried away. Presents meanwhile continued to come in. At eight o'clock Mrs. Honeybell, in the pink robe, took her place under Mr. Moquette's canopy, and, with sweetest smiles, graciously welcomed the guests. Mr. Honeybell looked very restless, and as if he would like to run away.

"How do you do, Aunt Flintsure? I am very happy to see you."

"Well, Mary Jane, I've come to your wooden wedding. I hope you liked the step-ladders—they're such useful things in a family—rather large, though, I'm afraid. I thought I saw them standing outside the house."

"Oh, aunt, I'm so sorry you could not think of something else. I have two in the house of my own."

Miss Flintsure was dragged away by Susan Maria, before the old lady, who was convulsed with laughter, could reply. Mr. and Mrs. Woggles each brought a pair of castanets; and a fat old gentleman, an early patron of Horace Honeybell, presented a pair of dumb-bells and a set of Indian clubs, much used in calisthenic exercises, but not specially valuable for any thing else. It must be confessed that rubbish of all sorts abounded, such as nut-crackers, nine-pins, and endless wooden toys for the children.

Meanwhile the company separated into groups and knots, and went from room to room, as long as the crowd would permit.

"This is the most ridiculous thing I ever saw," said Mrs. Barker to Mrs. Woggles. "Mrs. Honeybell is the greatest fool I know. Look at that ugly wreath above her thin, sickly face!"

"I wish they would announce supper," said Mrs. Woggles; "for I'm growing very hungry."

"How are you, Mrs. Woggles?" said Miss Flintsure, coming up. "They are trying to dance in the back room; it is the most absurd thing you ever saw. Susan Maria has had her new blue tulle dress torn to ribbons by her partner, who stepped on her train. What a ridiculous party! How foolishly the rooms are decorated! Charles said they looked like a theatre, and I told him it was just the thing, since he must have such a farce as a wooden wedding. But poor Mary Jane is such a fool that one must have patience with her."

"There is only one handsome thing here," said Mrs. Barker, "and it is that beautiful inlaid table. I wonder who sent it? Do tell me, Mrs. Honeybell," cried she, catching a glimpse of that lady, "who has presented you with that exquisite table?"

"I wish I knew myself," returned the hostess; "but it was brought here anonymously;" and Mary Jane, as she looked at it, felt a degree of pleasure that almost made her forget the step-ladders.

Supper being announced, a rush was made to the pantry-like apartment which was called the dining-room. Every body was hungry and thirsty, the number of guests was large, the Honeybell mansion, as we have said, was quite small; and sardines in a box formed a good illustration of the company when crammed around the supper-table. Ample justice was being done to the good cheer, and every one seemed enjoying this part of the entertainment, when, to the horror of Mrs. Honeybell, the gas gave that preliminary flicker so well known to housekeepers, and after one or two ineffectual rallies at last went entirely out. Mrs. Honeybell was dismayed. It resisted all efforts to relight it for a long time, and so much delay occurred in finding candles that a good many odd things had time to happen. Some young gentlemen who had begun to make love in the German resumed the occupation in the Egyptian darkness which surrounded all parties. Also Mrs. Honeybell's extremity was the black waiters' opportunity, and several dishes of game which decorated the supper-table were found to have recovered their wings and flown away. The stout gentleman who presented the dumb-bells, having somehow got wedged in behind one of the supper-tables, struggled in the dark so violently to get out that he tore his garments badly, and finally overset the table, which was loaded with glass and china, the havoc among which articles was frightful. The heavy crash of her household goods came like a knell to the ear of Mrs. Honeybell.

"Good-night, Mary Jane!" cried the squeaking voice of old Aunt Flintsure, as she came to take leave of her niece. "What a pity your party has been spoiled in this way! Susan Maria and I are going now. I hope you have enjoyed your wooden wedding very much."

"And I'm sure we've had a delightful time," kindly added the good-natured Susan Maria; for she saw the scarcely-restrained tears of vexation, fatigue, and disappointment, in the eyes of the exhausted hostess.

The Honeybell family came to breakfast next morning with little appetite, and in a state of general discomfort.

"Mary Jane," said her husband, solemnly, "if you want to wean me from the world, just go and have another wooden wedding, and I shall pray that I may not live to see it. Well, I hope it has been a lesson to you."

"I don't know what you mean," said his wife, bridling. "I am sure we have had a pleasant party, and many valuable gifts."

"Very valuable indeed! If I had known you were going to have all this trumpery I would have requested the donors to wait until the year after next, when I hope to put another story on the house. It seems to me that your presents have run chiefly to Swiss nut-crackers and paper-knives, and an endless number of salad-forks and spoons, almost enough to set up a shop. Your breakage has been extensive and costly, your supper was the same, and I do not believe that all your presents together will equal in value one-half the money you have spent."

"Charles, how provoking you are!" cried Mrs. Honeybell; "look at this beautiful inlaid table. Is not this, at least, an elegant gift? It must have been very costly, and yet you say I have received nothing valuable. There is something very mysterious about this anonymous present!" And Mrs. Honeybell gave a side-glance and looked down.

"I am very glad you like it," returned Honeybell; "we have wanted it a good while; but as to its being a mysterious gift you can add the price of it to Moquette's bill, Mary Jane, for I bought it for you myself."

The simple frankness of this speech might have easily disarmed reproach; but his wife was excited and unreasonable, and when her husband had stopped she threw herself on the sofa, and burst into tears.

Mr. Honeybell walked up and down for some moments, and when his wife ceased crying he said, "My dear, your wooden wedding has been a failure, has it not? No matter, if you have only learned something. I suppose all these fashions about weddings have come from the golden weddings common in Germany and the North of Europe. There is something poetic and graceful in celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of some happy union; but here I stop. I ask you, as a rational woman, what has that got to do with wooden, tin, and all sorts of trumpery weddings? There is no poetry about them; they are the most practical and vulgar prose. More than that, they are a mean way of getting presents out of friends that any lady should be too proud to practice. There is a great deal more present-giving than there was; but don't imagine people are at all more generous than they were. Every thing that is given is to be returned in some way, and the return is calculated beforehand. Now, I don't call this generosity or any thing but a mean attempt at speculation. What I hate about it," Mr. Honeybell went on, "is the double-faced way in which things are done—people pretending to send you gifts out of kindness, when all the time they are thinking what they can get back. Indeed, every body must be 'tipped,' as the English say. Captains have presentations on bringing their passengers safe home; bank people for carrying on business without cheating the public, and so on. Every one who accomplishes any thing which he is paid for performing seems to expect that for merely doing his duty he is to be fed and complimented. In this way the nobility of upright action is being rapidly taken out of life. Fidelity and honor have become, according to this code, not indispensable qualities, the want of which should cover a man with shame as with a cloak, but something par dessus le marché—something unlooked for, and when found to be paid for. I think Shakespeare must have been ironical when he says that 'service sweat for duty not for meed.' Indeed, such an idea is repugnant to the nineteenth century. But I insist that it goes to the other extreme when the plainest duties of life are to be rewarded as if they were magnanimous acts. If so, we have come upon a new and dangerous order of things."

"Well, here is a long enough lecture about the wooden wedding," said Horace. "Charles, you ought to take the stump at the next Presidential election!"

"He is quite right," said Mrs. Honeybell. "I am sick of the whole foolish thing. I promise you, Charles, if we live fifty years together, never even to hint at a golden wedding."

Mr. Honeybell smiled, kissed his wife, and, pleased with himself, went down to Wall Street.

HOW TO BEAUTIFY THE SKIN.

HOWEVER regular and expressive may be the features and well-proportioned the form, there can be no personal beauty without a perfectly wholesome skin. This delicate envelope, with its varying tints of color and lustrous and pliant surface, is not only essential to the attractiveness of every part of the body, but is itself, when in perfectness of condition, a source of delight to every human sense. The skin performs, moreover, a function indispensable to health and life; and its wholesomeness is so closely associated with its beauty, that one can hardly exist without the other. Whatever counsel, therefore, we may give toward beautifying the envelope, may be taken as good advice for preserving the health of the body which it covers.

Apart from the various external causes which may injuriously affect the skin, it is particularly sensible to influences from within. Any disease, however deep-seated or occult, which attacks an internal organ, is sure to indicate itself by some change of the surface of the body. The emotions of the mind have so much influence upon it, that, strive to control their manifestations as we may, they will reveal themselves externally in spite of us. Thus the complexion loses its color and brilliancy, the hair fades, falls, or whitens, and the skin withers, shrinks, wrinkles, and becomes diseased from a derangement of body or mind. The slightest disturbance, in fact, whether physical or mental, is certain to affect the skin, and may seriously deteriorate its beauty. It is therefore essentially to its perfection to avoid every thing which may discompose the mind or disorder the body. The fears and torments of childhood, to which they are often so unnecessarily exposed, are especially unfavorable to the beauty of the skin.

It is sometimes liable to an excessive irritability, while no apparent cause for it seems to exist. This gives rise to a habit of scratching, which is by no means graceful, and is suggestive of an unmentionable cutaneous affection. This itchiness, without any manifest cause, is found generally among excessively sensitive persons, and such should avoid every thing calculated to excite their nerves. They should, moreover, abstain from all heating articles of diet, such as highly-seasoned meats, fresh pork, shell-fish, cheese, and alcoholic drinks. Occasionally there is some one kind of food to which the effect may be owing from its peculiar action on the individual. Thus almonds, honey, strawberries, and many other articles, have been known to produce an excessive irritability of the skin of certain persons. People thus affected should resist scratching as far as possible, for the trouble itself is sometimes owing to, and is always augmented by, this habit. A bran bath, with a solution of carbonate of soda added, is an excellent remedy, and so is this ointment:

Chloroform..... 10 drops.
Tallow..... 1 ounce.

The skin naturally secretes an oil, which is essential to its lustre, smoothness, and flexibility. This, however, is sometimes in excess, and must be checked by a close attention to cleanliness, frequent baths, ablutions, and change of linen. On the other hand, it is not seldom that the skin becomes dry, rough, and even chapped, in consequence of a deficiency of its natural oil. The best applications in such a case are the oil of sweet almonds, mallow-water, oil of cocoa, cold cream, and glycerine, if perfectly pure.

The slight red spots with a farinaceous exfoliation, which show themselves often on the tender and delicate skin of babies and young girls, require for their removal nothing but a little salt dissolved in water.

Freckles are often born with persons, but, whether natural or acquired, are increased in intensity of color and quantity by various causes, but especially by the heat of the sun, which, in fact, not seldom produces them. They sometimes appear in the summer, and disappear entirely as soon as the cold sets in. They are annoying intruders upon those fair faces which they select for their ugly presence, for it is always the most delicate skins which are liable to freckles. Long exposure to the sun, violent exercise, late hours, excesses of all kinds, and constipation, will occasionally give rise to those ugly blotches, and always intensify those which already exist. They must therefore be scrupulously avoided. The best local application is a mixture of what the French call huile de ben and alcohol, of which a few drops should be put upon the freckles by means of a camel's-hair brush. Another good application is the Lait Virginal, or virginal milk, thus made:

Tincture of benzoin..... 1 drachm.
Rose-water..... 1 pint.
Mix.

There is an irregular brown spot or freckle which is caused by sitting too close to the fire, and which is readily removed by a little lemon juice or vinegar mixed with water. There are other marks of a yellow color, which are not seldom observed, in blondes who have particularly fine and sensitive skins. These are known vulgarly as liver spots, and seem of the same nature as the mark familiar to matrons. They are generally produced by irregularity of diet, a particular article of food, or some derangement to which the female organization is especially liable. The sulphur bath is almost a certain cure for these stains, which are hurtful to the beauty but do not seriously affect the health. The skin sometimes has a piebald look from the deficiency of natural color here and there. This, too, is an affection, as far as the health is concerned, of no moment; but it is a serious blot upon female beauty, and can be removed by alkaline and sulphur baths and certain lotions. A little salt and water, barely warmed, friction with fine linen dipped in aromatic tincture, or tincture of sulphate of quinine, or even dry rubbing is beneficial. The best of the ointments is this:

Tannin..... 1 drachm.
Tallow..... 1 ounce.
Tincture of canella..... 18 grains.
Mix into an ointment, and apply at night to the discolored spots.

That numerous brood of excrescences known variously as mother's marks, strawberries, raspberries, moles, coffee and wine stains, should not be much interfered with. It is not easy to eradicate them; but they, if small, can be concealed by covering them with a little cold cream and then applying some powdered starch, either white or colored.

Warts upon the face, as upon the hands, are best removed by means of a little acetic acid, so carefully applied as not to touch the neighboring skin. If they hang from a distinct neck or stalk they may with safety be lopped off by a pair of scissors.

Young girls just on the verge of womanhood, when they are peculiarly alive to the advantage of good looks, are often annoyed with pimples which impudently show themselves in the most exposed places, such as the forehead and cheeks. If the aspiring belle could be patient, she might confidently leave these annoyances to time to remove. As, however, she will probably be in haste to enjoy her natural privilege of beauty, we commend her to wash her face with a weak infusion of mint, or tea, or a little lukewarm water containing a few drops of cologne. If these applications are not effective, she may try this, which has the reputation of being a certain cure:

Borax..... 10 grains.
Rose water..... } 1 tea-spoonful.
Orange-flower water..... }
Mix.

There is another more serious annoyance to which our belles, if they live long enough, will be exposed, like their mothers, and from which we can not unfortunately promise them an entire immunity. The cosmetic art, however, has devised some ingenious dodges and disguises: by which to shun and conceal a while the wrinkles with which age cruelly shrivels the most beautiful face. Good living, with its tendency to superfluity of fat, by which the chinks made by time are filled up, is unfavorable to wrinkles. Excess of all kinds, depressing emotions of the mind, a meagre, ill-cooked, or frivolous diet of pastry and bon-bons, and too much work, are, on the contrary, very advantageous to an early furrowing of the face. Whenever the wrinkles do come, whatever may have produced them, they can be mitigated in appearance at least by the application of a little oil of sweet almonds, fresh butter, or a lotion composed of 36 grains of alum and a pint of water. Various kinds of powder and color are sometimes used; but most of them are injurious. The safest are powders of nitrate of bismuth, chalk, or talc, pure or colored with carmine, Brazil wood, or indigo, according as a white, red, or blue may be wanted. A little powdered starch, however, which may be tinted if desired, will perhaps answer the purpose. Before applying it some cold cream may be slightly spread upon the part.

The face is sometimes disfigured by ugly scars. All that can be done is to conceal them with a paste made of starch, oil, and cochineal, artistically applied. The great difficulty is to keep it in its place and prevent it from melting with the heat or perspiration. Dr. Cazenave, a great French authority on the skin, records a visit he had from a beautiful Polish dame whose nose had been cauterized at Vienna, leaving a frightful scar formed by a multitude of little holes which gave it the look of a cook's skimmer. The dame was, as may be easily believed, terribly grieved at this blot upon her otherwise charming face. She, by wonderful patience, had succeeded in mixing a soft paste so skillfully composed that it was exactly the color of the skin. She filled the scars of her nose with this and smoothed it down with a fine ivory paper-knife. There was such a harmony between the false and real parts that no one, who was not in the secret, could have suspected the artifice. Unfortunately with the least heat, perspiration, or use of the part, the mark would dissolve and expose the defect it was intended to conceal. She accordingly went to Paris to consult Dr. Cazenave, and obtain from him "some varnish to fix the paste for at least twenty-four hours." The Doctor confessed the impotency of his art and dismissed her, to his great regret, he says, without being able to do any thing for her unfortunate nose.

Each race and individual even has an odor peculiar to itself. As all people are not like Lord Herbert of Cherbury, who tells us that he was naturally endowed with the delicious smell of violets, it is generally desirable to conceal the original scent of the person. Daily bathing, which is not only essential to good health, is a powerful preventive of human odor in excess. But sometimes more may be required. In such cases certain articles of food such as fish and cheese must be avoided, and it will be well to wash the feet twice a day with an infusion of sage, thyme, or rosemary, and wear stockings perfumed with Starch..... 16 ounces.

orris root..... 4 ounces.
Camphor..... 2½ drachms.
Mix and sprinkle inside of the stockings.

The female face, according to the best authorities, should be very seldom washed, if beauty of complexion is desired. When water is applied to any part of the body, it should never be very cold for purposes of human adornment. The best of all artificial applications to the complexion is a little starch, or rice powder, or a weak solution in water of cologne. All extremes of temperature must be avoided, and especially the exposure of the face to the hot sun or a blazing fire.

Finally, whatever is favorable to composure of mind and health of body is especially advantageous to the wholesomeness of the skin, and consequently to its fineness of texture and beauty of color.

MODERN CRITICS.

FULLY aware that they are nothing if not critical, some critics are under the impression that to criticise means to find out all the faults, and ignore all the merits of the subjects under their treatment. The works of intellects so infinitely superior to their own that it is insult to speak of them in the same breath, are pitilessly condemned in three or four lines; the labor of years is passed over with a few contemptuous and condemnatory words, and genius so subtle, and skill so consummate as to be beyond their comprehension, are held up with a ribald joke to the scorn and ridicule of the crowd. They can not conceive how sacred is the matter they are dealing with, and how an ignorant expression of opinion may crush the hopes and blight the prospects of hard-working and earnest-minded strugglers on the ladder of fame. Ruthless tyrants! who scruple at nothing. They have, let us hope, no idea of the depth of the wounds they inflict upon natures which, from their very occupation, must be sensitive and highly-wrought.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THIS is the season for concerts, for it is as yet too early to go to the Bois at evening or to visit the gardens. The star of the musical world has been Mademoiselle Nilsson, for whom the infatuation has been extreme. The fashionable star-pianist is M. Rubenstein, who has received a real ovation, and who generously lavished his talent a few days since on a good work—the orphan's farming school at La Sage, which through the care of one woman, Madame Fleurat, is already open to more than 400 orphan children, and which is supported only by the private friends of Madame Fleurat, and by the alms which she collects for her little orphans. M. Rubenstein organized a concert for her, where was assembled the élite of Parisian society.

I noticed among the patronesses the Duchesse of Blacas, the Marchionesses de Maupas, de Choisy, and de la Garde, and the Princess of Beauveau. Most of these ladies had black or white bonnets, and all mantillas, and some young girls wore the chapeau-jupe of M. Bystrerwitz, a coiffeur who it is said is about to eclipse Felix, and even Le Roi, the Empress's hair-dresser. It is to him that we also owe the jeweled butterfly, which is usually of false stones, but which has just been executed in real ones for the Princess of Mingrelia, who married Prince Murat a few days ago. This butterfly is worth describing. The body is of emeralds; the wings of gold filigree work, set with innumerable little stones of all colors—garnets, topaz, amethysts, etc. The size does not exceed that of the largest species of butterfly. Two gold chains proceed from its legs, and terminate in gold rings which are fastened capriciously in the hair.

The novelties of the season are almost revolutions. Any one who has been absent from Paris for three or even two years, would hardly recognize either the Parisians or Paris itself, turned upside down from one end to the other by M. Haussmann's zeal for embellishment. At the races at the Bois de Boulogne, were seen puffed dresses, short, or almost short, skirts with over-skirts en panier; Watteau paletots, forming a sort of double puff behind, just below the waist, with a prodigious shell-bow, longer on one side than on the other, and set on the top like a huge bee; and little or no bonnet. All the ladies have their hair elaborately dressed, some with flowers and a veil, others with the baschlik à capuchon, a sort of head-dress introduced among us by the Russian ladies, and which is formed by a hooded mantilla with long ends that are crossed under the chin and thrown over the shoulders; others again with the Spanish mantilla, which is cut square in front, and adorned with the large round buckles formerly called emperors, and which are seen in the portraits of Isabeau and Gérard.

The hurly-burly of the fashions was equaled by that of the people; as, for instance, the magnificent team of the Princess de Metternich was seen side by side with the dashing Victoria of Cora Pearl, a celebrity of the demi-monde. The so-called English beauty had enveloped her almost red tresses in a mantilla of black Spanish lace, which fell over her fleur-de-lis faille dress, trimmed with two rows of lace of the same color. The folds of the mantilla were confined by a bouquet of fleur-de-lis. The Princess de Metternich wore a short costume of maize color, with a black and maize satin-striped underskirt, and a black mantilla bonnet.

The ball given by the Countess de Pourtalès on the 1st of May was an epoch in the history of dress, for it inaugurated an entirely new order of things, short dresses being almost absolutely prescribed. Madame de Pourtalès had already appeared in short costume at Baron de Rothschild's ball. One of the most successful short dresses at the ball of Madame Pourtalès was that of the beautiful Madame Cordier (née Lafitte), a costume wholly of pink tulle with tulle puffs forming a tunic, ornamented with garlands of roses of all shades, with two clusters larger than the rest at the sides; and slippers of pink faille with rose-buds on the top. The Countess de Clery also wore an exquisite dress of white tulle trimmed with white azaleas; the tunic was looped up at the side with heavy azalea wreaths. The Marchioness de Pailly had a dress in the same style trimmed with snow-balls. The flat bouquets that ornamented the tunic were of immense size. One of her young relatives, a niece, I believe, seemed the personification of summer in a dress of white tulle covered with puffs, with a scarf at the side fastened with a huge bouquet of corn-poppies and daisies. The adoption of these short dresses naturally requires great care in the shoe, and are about to substitute shoes for boots in all circumstances which require full dress. The high-heeled, white slipper (Louis XV.), with a pouf of white blonde, is always suitable, but it is much more elegant when adorned with flowers to match the dress. Little marvels of shoes were manufactured by the French shoemakers for the wedding festivities of Prince Humbert. The shoes of the Queen of Portugal were almost all white, with rosettes of mixed white lace or blonde, and gold thread in the blonde. Those of the Princess Marguerite had a gold guipure; and the Princess Karolathe, who is renowned for her pretty foot, usually wears brown satin shoes, trimmed with rosettes brodered with gold, or tied with a bow Louis XIV. style; square at the toes and trimmed with jet cut in diamond points. Jet is not used in round beads by the fashionable world. It is not worn except flat, pear-shaped, or in beads cut into facets.

I return to the bonnets, which from all time have been of the greatest importance in dress, and which may be said to embellish or deform the person more than any thing else. At the marriage of Mlle. Pouyer-Quertier to the Marquis de la Rochelambert, which was celebrated in Rouen with great magnificence, there were seen many ravishing bonnets, white and black mantillas, some of Spanish lace, others of Chantilly. There were fewer white bonnets than usual. Many bonnets are made of gauze like the dress, with a scarf veil of gauze without a hem fastened behind to the hair by a hair-pin. Thick wreaths of leaves and flowers are set on the bonnets; these fall on one side, and are mixed with a large hanging curl.

We describe one of the dresses which attracted the most attention at the wedding of Mlle. Pouyer-Quertier. Dress of Baltic green imperial gros grain, glacée with white. The skirt was trimmed around the bottom with puffs of green gauze crossed by puffs of green satin. The front of the skirt was entirely puffed; square, low-necked waist edged with puffs of green gauze; stomacher of point d'Alençon; small mantilla, wholly of point d'Alençon, with three large pleats behind, and no sleeves, fastened in front by a large satin bow. White bonnet with strings of point d'Alençon; lace star on the front, and anemones on the star; long ruches falling from the side to the front.

Mlle. Pouyer-Quertier was very simply dressed, like all Parisian brides, reserving her laces and diamonds for a future occasion. Among those present were admired most of all the three charming sisters of the Marquis de la Rochelambert, the Countesses de Vallon, de la Poëze, and de la Beudère, of whom the last two are Maids of Honor to the Empress. ELIANE DE MARSY.

Embroidery Patterns for Slippers, Bags, etc.

BOTH these patterns are worked on canvas in cross stitch. The colors are given in the description of symbols under each design. They may be worked in wool and filoselle silk, or only in wool.

Border for Covers, Skirts, etc.

THIS border is especially designed for covers, though it may also be used for the trimming of furniture—as bands, for instance; or even as a border for a skirt. The design is worked in braid, ribbon, or velvet ribbon, which is bordered on each side by a narrower braid.

Camargo Mantilla.

THIS pretty mantilla is one of the most tasteful novelties of the season. It is made of gros grain or black cashmere, and is trimmed with guipure lace, surmounted by three bias folds of satin. The back of the mantilla is in the form of a half-adjusted jacket; the front is a paletot, straight in front, and confined by a small Crochet Picture Frame.

MATERIALS: Heavy unbleached cotton, white glue, varnish, gilt and bronze, an oval tin frame.

THIS frame consists of a wreath of crochet laurel leaves, and is a very correct imitation of papier-mache. The crochet work is done in coarse unbleached cotton, stiffened and fastened in place by means of liquid glue, and bronzed. The crochet piece which covers the inner side of the frame and the flat crochet strip which is covered by the leaves are both stretched over an oval tin frame, after having been saturated with the glue, by which means they receive the form required. This tin frame is twenty-four inches high by nineteen wide, and consists of a rounded frame, outside of which a narrow flat frame is joined to it by means of four narrow tin clasps at the distance of an inch from the outer edge.

SECTION OF BORDER OF WALL TIDY.—FULL SIZE.

Both parts of this frame are furnished with little holes at regular distances. An old picture frame may be used instead of the tin frame. Begin the work with the inner part seen in the illustration, and cast on a foundation of 280 stitches; join this in the round by means of a sl. (slip stitch), and work on this the 1st round: 1 sdc. (short double crochet) in every foundation stitch.

2d round.—1 sdc. in every stitch of the last round, taking care to put the needle through both upper veins of the stitches. Widen in this round by working at the beginning and in the middle of the round (later the upper and lower part of the frame) 2 sdc. in one stitch 3 times in 25 stitches; in the remainder of the round crochet 2 stitches in 1 once in every 30 stitches, as this forms the less rounded part of the frame.

3d and 4th rounds.—Like the second.

5th-7th rounds.—In each stitch of the preceding round 1 sdc., but widening in the 5th round after every 29 stitches; in the 6th round after every 31; and in the 7th round after every 34. After this work on the 7th round, as also on the foundation round, 1 round sc. (single crochet) over a foundation of cord and without widening. This finishes the rounding frame.

SECTION OF BORDER OF WALL TIDY.—FULL SIZE.

The leaves are worked singly. For each of these cast on a foundation of 35 stitches, and crochet, passing over one stitch, 34 stitches back on the round, which forms the vein of the leaf. Returning on the foundation stitches, work 3 sl., 2 sc., 2 sdc., 3 dc., 7 tc. (treble crochet), 7 ltc. (long treble crochet), 5 tc., 2 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc., 1 sl., 1 ch. (chain stitch). After this work in the same manner, but in reversed order, back on the other side of the vein. Finally, work around the leaf one round sl. in doing which lay in a fine wire, which is shown of the full size in the illustration. Having completed 77 leaves, work next the berries. Begin each of these with a foundation of three stitches; join this in a round by means of 1 sl., and work on that three rounds sc. Widen in each of these rounds—in the 1st, after every two stitches; in the 2d, after every three; and in the 3d, after every four. Then work one round without widening, and after this three rounds, narrowing in the same proportion in which the first three were widened; but, before working the last of these rounds, fill the berry with wadding. This finishes a berry, one of which is shown in the illustration of the full size. These must be afterward sewed on a flat crochet strip, which is worked as follows: Cast on 440 stitches; join in a ring, and crochet on this four rounds. 1st round.—Over a foundation of fine white cord 1 sc. in each foundation stitch. 2d-4th rounds.—Without the cord; in every stitch of the last rounds 1 sc., widening by a few stitches in each round, so that the work need not be stretched. Saturate this piece, as also the crochet piece for the rounded frame, with liquid white glue. Then fasten these two pieces on the two parts of the frame, running the thread through the holes in the frame, and join the two pieces above, below, and on both sides by means of strips 12 stitches long and 5 rounds broad, which are worked in single crochet. These must also be stiffened with glue. Cover also the clasps beforementioned as joining the two parts of the frame. When these connected pieces are thoroughly dried, take them off the tin frame and sew on the leaves and berries which are still damp, and shaped as shown in the illustration. Fasten to the rounded part of the frame the points of those leaves which point inward. Having finished the arrangement, dip the frame repeatedly in the glue, allowing it to dry between each dipping. When it is stiff enough give it two coatings of iron and copal varnish, then finish with gilt and bronze. Mix these with copal varnish, and varnish the frame with the mixture by means of a paint-brush. Furnish the top on the back with a ring for hanging up.

Leaves of bead mosaic, one of which is shown of full size in the illustration, may be used instead of crochet leaves. These are made of strung beads, and are begun on the lower end of the leaf. The leaf is bordered with light brown beads strung on a wire, and its middle line is of dark beads, also strung on a wire, and which imitate the middle vein. Leaves of brown oil-cloth, finished on the edge with a fine wire stitched in, are also pretty, and very easily made. In these the veins are formed by long, diagonal, half-polka stitches worked in brown silk and finished by running a fine cord along the back.

Wall Tidy, to hang over a Wash-stand.

MATERIALS: Gray and brown enameled cloth; brown and crystal beads; black thread; heavy white cord; four little black rings.

The pattern is made in a checkered design of silver-gray and brown enameled cloth. The trimming which borders the foundation consists of star figures of brown and crystal beads, which hold a ring of gray enameled cloth. The outer edge is finished by a heavy beaded cord. The original cover is twenty-nine inches in width, and nineteen in height; it may be made, however, of any size desired, and may also be used for table-covers, mats for setting under hot dishes, etc.

For making a tidy like the pattern given, take two pieces of enameled cloth of the size designated. One piece is to be used as lining; around the other part mark a border two inches in width; on the two sides mark points at the distance of a little over an inch apart, after which cut between every two alternate points a slit of the length given, and cut from end to end in strips of the same width as given by the pattern, taking care not to cut the edge on the other sides. Next prepare, still of the same width, seventeen strips of gray enameled cloth, each sixteen inches in length, and run these through the cut strips as shown in the pattern. At the sides, where a gray square always comes on the border, shove the end of the gray strips through the little slits previously prepared; gum them down on the back, and join the cover to the lining on the outer edge by means of a cord of brown and crystal beads. Finally, finish the brown border with a trimming made as shown by the illustration. Another illustration gives a different style of trimming which may be used for the same purpose. Both are made of enameled cloth and beads, in the manner shown by the designs.

Dress of white poul de soie. The skirt, flat in front, is trimmed with bias folds of satin and wreaths of orange flowers. The back breadths are puffed in the form of paniers, and caught up with a large satin bow. The corsage waist is plain, and is buttoned up in front and trimmed with a rich fringe, which extends round the arm-hole, forming a bertha. Close sleeves, trimmed with fringe. Breast-knot and wreath of orange flowers. Veil à la juive.

Section of Bead Bandeau.

See illustration on page 521.

The bandeau, the middle section of which is shown of the full size in the illustration, consists of a straight strip of stiff white lining, about half an inch in width, which is covered with wax and crystal beads, and ornamented in the middle with a butterfly worked in the same manner. First, arrange the wax beads on the lining as follows: Fasten on one side of the strip a fine wire on which wax beads have been strung. Then wind the wire around the lining, in doing which arrange the beads on the right side, and leave the bare wire on the inside. Having covered the lining in this manner, finish the edge by a row of crystal beads which have been previously strung on a fine wire. Next set on the butterfly, for which cut first a piece of the lining of the shape shown by the pattern; cover this in the manner shown with wax beads, and crystal beads and bugles; in doing this, however, only the small crystal beads are to be strung on wire, while the remaining bugles are sewed on with silk.

Bead Napkin-Ring.

See illustration on page 521.

MATERIALS: Four dozen small pierced wooden balls; fine garnet beads; red flosselle silk; red silk; elastic cord.

This napkin-ring is pretty, and can even be made by a child. It consists of bullet-shaped balls of wood, ornamented with silk and beads—so as to present the appearance of large beads—after which they are strung on silk elastic cord. The wooden balls are covered as follows: First, cover each ball regularly with red flosselle silk. Then fasten inside the wooden ball a thread of red sewing silk, and also the end of a string of beads; bring the red silk to the end of the opening, and wind it around the thread on which the beads are strung; then take the silk thread and also the bead cord and bring them to the other side of the ball, the thread inside and the bead cord outside; again wind the thread around the bead cord, and repeat the process till the outside of the ball is closely and regularly covered with beads, taking care that each time the cord crosses the number of beads shall be equal. String on the prepared beads as shown in the illustration, and carefully fasten the ends of the elastic cord.

Mantilla Bonnet of Chantilly Lace.

See illustration on page 521.

This exquisite bonnet is composed of a fancheon of black lace, fastened behind under the chignon with a bow of black ribbon, and trimmed on the front with a red rose. From this fancheon falls a Chantilly lace mantilla, which, beginning at the chignon, is confined in the middle of the back with a bow; after which the ends are crossed on the breast and tied behind like a Marie Antoinette fichu.

ON THE BUST OF CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

The secret of the stars, ensphered
In æons of silence, finds a form—
A form round which heaven's air has cleared
A great serenity out of storm.
Here all imperial angelhood
And possibilities of good
Have shaped and wrought to perfect choice.
And in full throbs of starry song,
Wild music of the deeps, along
Whose verge the rolling echoes throng,
These marble lips might find a voice.

Oh! like some rare and wondrous shell
Of shifting hues and lustrous dyes,
That takes the sun in every cell
With splendors that eclipse the skies,
The soul on which the sculptor wrought,
The soul that here the sculptor caught
And sealed in stone eternally!
For never does the shell forget
The tide with which its lips were wet,
And far withdrawn it murmurs yet
The ancient burden of the sea.

And yet the hidden meaning here
Interprets neither sky nor sea,
Save as they round the earthly sphere
With kinship of infinity.

This nature holds the common sods,
Holds heaven and sunshine, like a god's,
Touched clay and only soared the higher!
Soared like a flame that springs alone
Into the vast and azure zone,
And whoso holds the carven stone
Carries an urn of sacred fire!

PARIS FASHIONS.

If we sum up the chapeau at present in vogue at the head-quarters of fashion, this is the result: First of all, it must be very small—the shape is an affair of minor importance; the size—or, rather, the deficiency of size—is every thing. Secondly, it must have what is termed a diadem in front, which may be either of metal, jet, flowers, buds or blossoms, ribbon, lace, or tulle, provided they be puffed. Thirdly, if a flower—the rose has the preference, remember—or a few ears of corn, or a tuft of feathers, or some fancy grass in which a metallic dragon-fly or grasshopper will be occasionally half-hidden, be posed on the left side, it should rise usually above the highest part of the bonnet. Fourthly, bows or rosettes may be worn almost any where outside the chapeau, and also to secure the strings when a flower-bud is not used for this purpose. Fifthly, metal ornaments, except those of a greenish golden tinge—and even these but sparingly—are no longer worn. Sixthly, that lace strings, with a veil to correspond, may be said to be indispensable.

As regards robes, the robe courtie has attained its utmost degree of shortness, so as to display at times the petit cols and tassels of the bottines à mi jambes, and though it will always be in favor for toilettes de promenade, it is quite certain that our Parisian élégantes, or our modistes—and they are perhaps the most powerful of the two—are bent upon making the robe à queue the haute mode. No one can question the grace, the elegance, and, one may say, the dignity of this costume, which being adapted only to persons of large means, is certain to preserve its character of exclusiveness. Even robes du matin are now made of the richest materials and à queue. For toilettes de visite the robe à queue is made slanting off from the waist, and is bordered with a ruche, or an elegant leaf-shaped trimming of ribbon, finished with a fine silk fringe; the front part of the skirt, which is usually of a lighter shade, and forms a simulated under jupe, being trimmed all the way up with bands of satin ribbon, decreasing in length as they approach the waist. Frequently the train will be cut into a bold leaf-shaped pattern round the edge, and be bound with piping, and more or less embroidered with silk or jet beads. If the corsage is made low, a fichu Marie Antoinette will be worn crossed over the breast, and with the long ends falling down the back of the robe after being fastened at the waist behind. For a toilette de soirée over the robe à queue of some light color satin, a rich white lace upper jupe, short in front and taking the form of the queue behind, will be worn; over this again, at the back of the robe, will be disposed a series of embroidered basques, falling one over the other, bordered with plaited ribbon, and of the same material as the robe itself. In front hangs a tablier, trimmed with a double ruche of ribbon, placed some distance apart, the intervening space being richly embroidered. The corsage is low, and the sleeves short. A toilette de promenade à queue is of violet-color silk, with four large bows with long ends, finished off with silk fringe, arranged at equal distances round the bottom of the skirt; the corsage is entirely concealed by a cape bordered with fringe, which reaches to the waist, where it is fastened behind with a large bow. Over this cape falls a small, pointed hood, terminating in a tassel which hangs level with the waist. This costume is particularly rich and elegant in silk of some delicate shade when trimmed at the lower part of the skirt with a deep border of white lace, spangled over with glass beads, and with a narrower lace border round the bottom of the cape. Another style of toilette de promenade is in mauve-color taffeta, à queue and en tablier, bordered all round with a satin band of a deeper shade, varied with narrow stripes of black velvet. The hindmost portion of the robe overlaps, as it were, the front on either side to within about a dozen inches of the bottom, where the robe is sloped away both in front and toward the queue, so as to show the deep ruche of a white cambric jupon, which has a singularly fresh and piquant look after the colored jupons with which we have been so long familiar. The corsage, consisting of a bertha, is, together with the tablier and the long ends of the ceinture écharpe, trimmed with a dark mauve and black silk fringe; long silk tassels fall from this bertha over the centre of the large bow which fastens the sash. This style of costume, comprising alike the queue—which, by-the-way, can be so arranged as to be looped up at pleasure—the tablier, the ceinture écharpe nouée, and the light jupon with a very deep ruche, promises to be the mode during the present season, in such light materials as poul de soie, faye, foulard, mohair, and piqué; the jupon commonly being white, with stripes of some breadth of a light bright color, when it is not plaited.

Toilettes de réception à la Pompadour—possibly one of the most elegant of feminine costumes, named after the Marchioness par excellence of the eighteenth century, the beautiful, brilliant, gay, coquettish, charming, abandoned woman, who, spite of the Salic law, sat for twenty years on the throne of France, after ensnaring Louis XV. during his hunting expeditions in the neighborhood of her husband's château in the forest of Senart, where she was continually chasing the royal hunter; one day bursting upon his astonished sight seated in a rose-colored phaeton, drawn by the most beautiful horses, and arrayed in an azure robe; and on another occasion dressed in rose-color, in an azure phaeton—the toilette de réception à la Pompadour consists of an open robe, of some delicate shade of shot silk, with a long train, trimmed or embroidered at the edges with a bold floral or leaf-shaped pattern, and an under jupe, also of shot silk, but several shades lighter than the robe, trimmed with three or four rows of rich white lace. A ceinture écharpe, also of lace, partially raises and supports the train about halfway down the figure, leaving only a moderate length to trail upon the ground. The corsage is décolleté of course; but a lace chemisette can be called into requisition to "half conceal and half reveal the beauties it is meant to hide." As regards ball dresses, the corsage of these is little more than a dream: it exists in name and a narrow strip of lace, and there certainly are women who consider this sufficient—and possibly it might be so, if it were only decorously worn; but with them the splendor of the shoulders has to compensate for the deterioration of the face. Whatever is deficient in the corsage is unquestionably more than compensated for in the dimensions of the skirts, which are of an amplitude and a length passing all reasonable bounds.

The chief characteristic of the spring paletot is its being closed tightly at the waist; the loose pardessus is almost entirely discarded. The paletots Watteau and Marie Antoinette, and the casaque or "rotonde" Louis Quinze, are those about which Parisian modistes are just now raving. The first is a very ordinary-looking jaquette—made to fit the figure and secured tightly at the waist with a broad belt—with rather long skirts, usually pointed at either side, utterly unlike, by-the-way, any one of the light and loose-fitting garments, in which Watteau, with his spirituel pallet, delighted to robe his charming heroines. The second takes its name from the eternal fichu which, par parenthèse, obtained its name in a curious manner. The "fichu" proper, introduced by Marie Antoinette, not before the décolletée style of toilette made it positively necessary, was nothing more than a lace kerchief worn crossed over the shoulders. Of course immediately it was countenanced by the queen all the ladies of the court followed her example, much to the dissatisfaction of the gardes des corps, whose duties were to stand behind these ladies' chairs during the performances at the Versailles Theatre. "Fichu," it should be remembered, is an opprobrious sort of term, and one of these militaires, unable to restrain the expression of his feelings at what he regarded as an innovation, observed aside to a comrade, "Confound these 'fichu' things which hide what we all like to see!" The expression was repeated, and the lace kerchief was ever afterward known by the term which had been applied to it, in a moment of indignation, by the disappointed garde du corps.

To return, however, to the paletot Marie Antoinette, the distinguishing feature of which is, as we have said, the "fichu" bordered with lace and crossed upon the breast, and, moreover, recrossed behind upon the skirt of the paletot. A belt encircles the waist, and incloses the fichu, both before and behind, within its limits. The casaque or "rotonde" Louis Quinze in certain cases loosely fits the figure—in others it is carefully adapted to the shape like the paletots just described. Its distinguishing characteristic appears to be certain large rosettes at the upper part of the opening on either side, and at the back of the neck, or, where the garment adapts itself closely to the figure, at the back of the waist; these rosettes have usually a couple of small fringed pannes hanging from them.

THE PORTER'S SON.

By HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.

THE General's family lived on the drawing-room floor, the Porter's lived in the cellar. There was a great distance between the two families—the whole ground-floor and the grades of society; but both lived under the same roof, and their windows looked out upon the same street and the same yard. In this yard there was a blooming acacia—whenever it did bloom; and the smart nurse used to sit under it with the still smarter child, the General's "little Emily." The Porter's little boy, with his large brown eyes and dark hair, used to dance barelegged before them; and the child would laugh at him, and stretch her tiny hands to him; and if the General saw this from his window, he would nod down at them, and say, "charmant!" The General's lady, who was so young that she might almost have been her husband's daughter by an early marriage, never herself looked out of the window into the yard; but she had given orders that the cellar-people's boy might play about near her own child, but never touch it. The nurse kept strictly to her ladyship's orders.

And the sun shone in upon those on the drawing-room floor, and upon those in the cellar. The acacia put forth its blossoms; they fell off, and new ones came again next year. The tree bloomed, and the Porter's little boy bloomed; he looked quite like a fresh tulip.

The General's little daughter grew a delicate child, like the faint rosy leaf of the acacia blossom. She seldom came now under the tree; the fresh air she took in a carriage. She went with mamma for her drives, and she always nodded to the Porter's George; ay, and kissed her fingers at him, till her mother told her that she was now grown too big for that.

One forenoon he had to go up to the General's floor with the letters and newspapers which had been left at the Porter's lodge in the morning. When he had mounted the staircase, and was passing the door of the sand-bin, he heard something waiting inside it. He thought it was a stray chicken chirping to get out; and lo! it was the General's little daughter in muslin and lace!

"Don't tell papa and mamma; they will be so angry!"

"What is the matter, little lady?" asked George.

"It's burning all over!" said she—"it's burning and blazing!"

George opened the door to the little nursery; the window-curtain was nearly burned: the curtain-rod had caught fire, and stood in flames. George sprang up, pulled it down, and called for help; without him there would have been a house on fire.

The General and her ladyship examined little Emily.

"I only just took one match," said she, "and that lighted up, and then the curtain lighted up. I spit all I could, but it was no good, and so I came out and hid myself, for papa and mamma would be so angry."

"Spit!" said the General; "what sort of word is that? When did you ever hear papa or mamma talk of spitting? That you have learned down stairs."

But little George got a penny-piece. It did not go to the bun-shop, but into the savings-box; and there were soon so many half-pence that he could buy himself a paint-box, and put color to his drawings; and of these he had many: they seemed to come out of his pencil and his finger-ends. The first colored pictures were presented to little Emily.

"Charmant!" said the General. Her ladyship herself admitted that one could see clearly enough what the little one meant in his pictures. "There's genius in him!"

Such were the words which the Porter's wife brought down into the cellar.

The General and his lady were people of rank: they had two armorial shields on their carriage, one for each of them. Her ladyship had arms worked on every bit of clothing, inside and out, on her night-cap, and on her night-bag. This, her own shield, was a costly one, bought by her father for shining dollars; for he had not been born with it, no, nor she either; she had come into the world prematurely, seven years before the shield of arms—a fact that was remembered by most people, though not by the family. The General's shield was old and large; one's back might well creak with the dignity of this alone, to say nothing of two shields; and there was a creaking in the back of her ladyship, when stiff and stately she drove to the court-ball.

The General was old and gray, but sat well on horseback: he was quite aware of it, and rode out every day, with a groom at a respectful distance behind him. When he came to a party, it was just as if he came riding in on his high horse, and he wore orders enough to bewilder one; but that was not by any means his fault. As a very young man he had performed military duties, by taking a part in the great autumnal reviews which used to be held in the pipings of peace. Of that time he had an anecdote to tell, the only one he had. His subaltern cut off and took prisoner one of the princes; and the Prince with his little troop of soldiers, prisoners like himself, had to ride back to town behind the General. It was an event never to be forgotten, and the General told and retold it, year after year, always ending with the remarkable words which he had spoken when he returned the Prince's sabre to him: "Only my subaltern could have made your Royal Highness a prisoner, I myself—never!" and the Prince had answered: "Monsieur, you are incomparable!"

In active service the General had never been; for when the war went through his native land he went on the diplomatic road, through three foreign countries. He talked the French language till he almost forgot his own; he danced well, he rode well, orders grew on his coat in indescribable profusion, the sentinels presented arms to him, one of the prettiest of girls presented herself to him—and she became the General's lady; and they had a pretty babe that seemed to have fallen from the sky, it was so pretty; and the Porter's son danced in the yard before it as soon as it could take notice, and gave it all his colored drawings; and she looked at them, and was delighted with them, and tore them to pieces. She was such a dear sweet little thing!

"My rose-leaf!" said the General's lady, "thou art born to be a Prince's bride!"

The Prince was already standing outside the door, though nobody knew of it. People can not see much further than the door-step.

"To-day our George shared his bread-and-butter with her, that he did!" said the Porter's wife. "There was no cheese, nor yet meat with it; yet she relished it every bit as well as roast beef. There'd have been a fine to-do if some folks had seen the little feast; but they didn't see it."

George had shared bread-and-butter with little Emily; gladly would he have shared his heart with her. He was a good boy, clever and sprightly; and he now went to the evening school at the Academy in order to learn drawing thoroughly. Little Emily, too, made some progress in learning: she talked French with her "Bonne," and had a dancing-master.

"George is to be confirmed at Easter," said the Porter's wife. So far advanced now was George.

"It wouldn't be amiss either to have him prenticed," said the father, "to something tidy, of course; and so we shall get him out in the world."

"He would come home, though, to sleep at nights," said the mother. "It wouldn't be easy to find a master with a spare room. Clothes, too, we should have to give him: the bit of food he now eats is easily come at, he can make himself happy with a couple of baked potatoes; and he has his teaching free. Just let him go his own way, and he'll turn out a blessing to us, you may be sure! Didn't the Professor say so?"

The confirmation-clothes were ready. Mother herself did the sewing, but they had been cut out by the jobber, and he knew how to cut them: if he'd only been better placed, and could have opened a shop and taken prentices, said the Porter's wife, the man might have become Court tailor.

The clothes were ready, and the candidate was ready. On the confirmation-day George received a great pinchbeck watch from his godfather, the flax-dealer's old shopman, the richest of George's godfathers. The watch was old and well tried: it always went too fast, but that is better than going too slow. This was a splendid present; and from the General's came a hymn-book bound in morocco, sent by the little lady to whom George had presented his pictures. On the fly-leaf stood his name and her name, and "his gracious well-wisher." This was written after the dictation of the General's lady, and the General had read it through, and said "charmant!"

"That was really a great attention from such grand gentfolk," said the Porter's wife; and George had to go up stairs in his confirmation-clothes, and with his hymn-book, to show himself and return thanks.

Her ladyship sat in a number of wrappings; and she had her bad headache, which always came when she felt ennui. She looked kindly at George, and wished him every thing that was good, and none of her headache. The General was in his dressing-gown, and wore a tasseled cap, and boots with leggings of red russia. He paced up and down the floor three times, in thoughts and remembrances of his own, stopped still, and said:

"Little George then is now a Christian man! Let him be likewise an honest man, and pay due respect to his superiors! This sentence, some day, when you are old, you can say that the General taught you!"

This was a longer speech than the General was accustomed to make; and he fell back into meditation and looked imposing. But of all that George heard or saw up there nothing remained fixed in his memory so clearly as little Miss Emily. How winning she looked, how soft, how fluttering, how fragile! If her portrait was to be painted, it must be in a soap-bubble. There was a fragrance about her clothes and her curly yellow hair as if she were a fresh-blossomed rose-tree. And with her he had once shared bread-and-butter; and she had eaten it with a sharp appetite, and nodded to him at every mouthful. Could she possibly recollect it still? Surely yes; it was "in remembrance" of this that she had given him the handsome hymn-book. And so, next year, as soon as the New Year's new moon was shining, he went out-of-doors with a loaf and a shilling in his hand and opened the book to see what hymn he should turn up. It was a hymn of praise and thanksgiving. And he opened it again to see what would turn up for little Emily. He was mightily careful not to dip into one part of the book—the place of the funeral hymns; and yet, for all his care, he did dip in between death and the grave. This was not the sort of thing to believe in; not a bit of it! and yet frightened he was when soon afterward the dainty little girl was laid up in bed, and when the hall-door was visited daily by the doctor's carriage.

"They'll not keep her," said the Porter's wife; "our Lord knows right well whom He will take to Himself."

But they did keep her, and George drew pictures to send her. He drew the castle of the Czar, the old Kremlin at Moscow, exactly as it stood, with turrets and cupolas; they looked like gigantic green and gilt cucumbers—at least, they looked so in George's drawing. It pleased little Emily so much that in the course of the week George sent some more pictures, all of them buildings; for then she would have plenty to think about, wondering what was inside the door and the windows.

He drew a Chinese house, with bells hanging to all the sixteen stories. He drew two Greek temples, with slender marble pillars and steps round it. He drew a Norwegian church; one could see it was entirely built of timbers, deeply carved and quaintly set up; every story looked as if it had cradle-rockers. But most beautiful of all was one design, a castle, which he called "Little Emily's." This was to be her dwelling-place, and so George had imagined it all himself, and picked out for it whatever seemed prettiest in each of the other buildings. It had carved beams like the Norwegian church; marble pillars like the Greek temple; a peal of bells on every story; and at the top of all cupolas, green and gilded, like those upon the Kremlin of the Czar. It was a true child's palace! And under every window was written what the hall or chamber inside was intended for: "here Emily sleeps;" "here Emily dances;" and "here she is to play at 'visitors coming.'" It was amusing to look at, and looked at it was, you may be sure.

"Charmant!" said the General. But the old Count—for there was an old Count, who was even grander than the General, and had a castle and mansion of his own—said nothing. He had been told that this had been imagined and drawn by the Porter's little son. Not that the boy was so very little now; indeed, he was confirmed. The old Count looked at the pictures and had his own quiet thoughts about them.

One morning, when the weather was downright gray, damp, and dismal, it proved one of the brightest and best of days for little George. The Professor at the Art Academy called him into his private room.

"Listen, my lad," said he; "let us have a little talk together. Our Lord has favored you with good abilities; he is now favoring you with good friends. The old Count at the corner-house has spoken to me about you. I have seen your pictures also; between ourselves we may cross them out, they require so much correction. But henceforward you may come twice a week to my drawing-school, and so learn in time to do better. I believe there is more stuff in you to make an architect than a painter. This you will have time to consider; but go up at once to the old Count at the corner-house and give thanks to our Lord for such a friend."

It was a fine mansion that corner-house: round the windows were carved figures, both elephants and dromedaries, all of the olden time; but the old Count was fondest of the modern time, and whatever good it brought, whether out of the drawing-room, or the cellar, or the garret.

"I do think," said the Porter's wife, "that the more folks are really grand, the less they are stuck up. You should see the old Count, ever so sweet and affable! and he can talk, bless you, just like you and me—you won't find that at the General's. There was George yesterday, clean upside down with delight, the Count treated him so graciously; and I am much the same to-day, after getting a talk with the great man. Wasn't it lucky now that we didn't prentice George to a trade? The boy has good parts in him."

"But they must have help from outside," said the father.

"Well, and now he has got help," said the mother. "The Count spoke out plain and straightforward, that he did."

"It was at the General's, though, that it was all set going," said the father; "they must have their turn of thanks, too."

"They may have it, and welcome," said the mother; "yet there's not overmuch to thank them for, I reckon. I'll thank our Lord above all, and thank Him all the more now that little Emily is coming round again."

Emily kept getting on, and George kept getting on. In the course of the year he won, first the small silver medal, and then the great one.

"It would have been better, after all, to have prenticed him!" said the Porter's wife, in tears; "we should have kept him here, then. What does he want in Rome? Never more shall I set eyes on him, even if he ever comes home again; and that he won't do, poor dear child!"

"But it's for his own good and glory," said the father.

"Ah, it's all very fine talking, good man," said the mother, "but you don't mean what you say. You are just as down-hearted as I am."

And it was all true, both as to the grief and the going away. It was a grand piece of luck for the young man, said the neighbors.

And there was a round of leave-taking, including the General's. Her ladyship did not appear; she had her bad headache. The General at parting related his only anecdote—what he had said to the Prince, and how the Prince had said to him, "Monsieur, you are incomparable!"

and then he gave George his hand—his slack old hand.

Emily, too, gave George her hand, and looked almost dismal; but there was no one so dismal as George.

Time goes on. Whether one is busy or idle, Time is equally long, though not equally profitable. To George it was profitable, and never seemed long, except when he thought of those at home; how were they getting on, up stairs and down stairs? Well, tidings were sent of them; and so much may be wrapped up in a letter—both the bright sunshine and the gloomy shade. The shade of death lay in the letter that told him his mother was left a lonesome widow. Emily had been an angel of comfort; "she had come down below, she had," wrote mother. As for herself, she added, she had got leave to take father's post at the Porter's lodge.

The General's lady kept a diary: every ball was entered in it, every party she had been to, and every visit she had received. The volume was illustrated with cards of diplomatists and other grandees. She was proud of her diary; it increased in growth, season after season, during many great headaches, but also during many bright nights—that is to say, Court balls.

Emily had now been to her first Court ball. The mother was in pink, with black lace—Spanish; the daughter was in white, so clear, so fine! green ribbons fluttered like bulrush-leaves in her curly yellow locks, and she was crowned with a wreath of white water-lilies. With her sparkling blue eyes, and soft, rosy lips, she resembled a little mermaid, as beautiful as one could imagine. Three princes danced with her, one after another. Her ladyship had no headache for a whole week.

But the first ball was not the last. It was getting too much for Emily; and so it was well that summer came, with rest and change of air. The family was invited to the castle of the old Count.

This castle had a garden worth seeing. One part of it was quite in the old style, with stiff, green alleys, where one seemed to be walking between tall green screens, pierced with peep-holes; box-trees and yew-trees stood clipped into stars and pyramids; water sprang from great grottoes set with cockle-shells; stone figures stood all round about, of the very heaviest stone, as one could plainly perceive by the faces and draperies; every flower-bed had its own device—such as a fish, an heraldic shield, or a monogram. This was the French part of the garden. From this part one came out, as it were, into the fresh, wild wood, where the trees could grow as they pleased, and were therefore great and splendid. There was a green turf, inviting one's feet to tread on it, well-mown, well-rolled, and well-kept altogether. This was the English part of the garden.

"Olden times and modern times!" said the Count. "Here they meet with loving embraces. In about two years the house itself will assume its proper importance. It will undergo a perfect change into something handsomer and better. I will show you the plans, and I will show you the architect; he is coming here to dinner."

"Charmant!" said the General.

"This garden is paradisaical!" said her ladyship; "and yonder you have a baronial castle."

"That is my hen-house," said the Count. "The pigeons live in the tower, the turkeys on the first-floor, but in the parlor reigns old Dame Else. She has spare rooms on all sides. This for the sitting-hen, that for the hen and chickens, while the ducks have their own outlet to the water."

"Charmant!" repeated the General; and they all went to see the fine show.

Old Else stood in the middle of the parlor, and beside her stood the architect—George! He and little Emily met—after so many years—met in the hen-house.

Ay, there he stood, a comely figure to look at. His countenance open and determined, his hair black and glossy, and his mouth with a smile that said, "There is a little rogue behind my ear that knows you, outside and inside!" Old Else had taken off her wooden shoes, and stood in her stockings, out of respect for her illustrious visitors. The hens clucked, the cock crowed, and the ducks waddled along, rap, rap. But the pale slender girl, the friend of his childhood, the General's daughter, stood before him, her pale cheeks flushing with the rose, her eyes opening eagerly, and her mouth speaking without uttering a syllable. Such was the greeting he received; the prettiest that any young man could desire from a young lady; unless, indeed, they were of the same family, or had often danced together; but these two had never danced together.

The Count grasped his hand and presented him, saying, "Not a complete stranger, our young friend, Mr. George."

Her ladyship courtied. Her daughter was about to give him her hand, but she did not give it him.

"Our little Mr. George!" said the General.

"Old house-friends, charmant!"

"You have grown quite an Italian," said her ladyship; "and you speak the language, no doubt, like a native."

"Her ladyship could sing Italian, but not speak it," added the General.

At the dinner-table George sat at the right hand of Emily. The General had led her in, and the Count had led in her ladyship.

George talked, and told anecdotes, and he could tell them well. He was the life and soul of the party; though the old Count could have been so too if it had suited him. Emily sat silent; her ears listened, her eyes shone, but she said nothing.

They stood, she and George, among the flowers in the veranda behind a screen of roses. It was left to George again to begin speaking.

"Thanks for your kindness to my mother," said he. "I know that on the night of my father's death you went down and staid with her till his eyes were closed. Thanks!" He raised Emily's hand and kissed it. He might fairly do so on that occasion. She grew blushing red, but pressed his hand in return, and looked at him with her tender blue eyes.

"Your mother was a loving soul. How fond she was of you! All your letters she brought me to read, so I seem almost to know you. I remember, too, when I was little, how kind you were to me. You gave me pictures—"

"Which you tore up to pieces," said George.

"Nay; I have still my own castle left—that drawing of it."

"And now I must build it in reality!" said George, and grew quite hot himself as he said it.

The General and his lady, in their own rooms, talked about the Porter's son. Why, he could express himself with knowledge, with refinement! "He is fit to be engaged as a tutor," said the General.

"Genius!" said her ladyship; and that was all she said.

Again and again, in those fine summer days, did George come to the castle of the Count. He was missed when he did not come.

"How much more God has given to you than to us ordinary mortals!" said Emily to him.

"Are you grateful for that now?"

It flattered George that this fair young girl should look up to him, and he thought she had rare powers of appreciation.

And the General felt more and more convinced that Mr. George could hardly be a genuine child of the cellar. "Otherwise the mother was a right honest woman," said he; "that sentence I owe to her epitaph!"

Summer went; winter came; and there was more to tell about Mr. George. He had received notice and favor in the highest of high places. The General had met him at the Court ball.

And now there was to be a ball at home for little Emily. Could Mr. George be invited?

"Whom the King invites the General can invite!" said the General, and drew himself up a good inch higher.

Mr. George was invited, and he came. And princes and counts came, and each danced better than the other. But Emily danced only the first dance, for in the course of it she turned her ankle, not dangerously, but enough to give her pain; and so she had to be prudent, and stop dancing, and look on at the others. And there she sat, looking on, while the architect stood by her side. "You are giving her the whole of St. Peter's at Rome," said the General as he passed, smiling like benevolence itself.

With the same smile of benevolence he received Mr. George a few days afterward. The young man came to thank him for the ball, of course. Was there any thing else to say? Yes, indeed, astounding—amazing—raving madness, that was all! The General could scarcely believe his own ears. A "pyramidal declamation!" an unheard-of proposition! Mr. George asked for little Emily as his wife!

"Man!" said the General, and he began to boil, "I can not understand you? What is it you say? What is it you want? I don't know you. Sir! Fellow! you choose to come and break into my house! am I to stay here, or am I not?" And he backed out into his bedroom, and locked the door. George stood alone for a few moments, and then turned on his heel. In the corridor he met Emily.

"My father answered—?" she asked, with a trembling voice.

George pressed her hand. "He ran away from me—a better time will come."

There were tears in Emily's eyes: in those of the young man were courage and confidence; and the sun shone in upon them both and blessed them.

In his bedroom sat the General, boiling more and more; boiling over and sputtering out "Lunacy! Porter-madness!"

Before an hour was past the General's lady learned it all from the General's own mouth, and she called for Emily, and sat alone with her.

"Poor girl," she said; "to think of his insulting you so, insulting us all! You have tears in your eyes, I see: they are quite becoming to you. You look charming in tears. You remind me of myself on my wedding-day. Go on crying, little Emily."

"That I must indeed!" said Emily, "unless you and papa say 'yes!'"

"Child," cried her ladyship, "you are ill! you are delicious! and I am getting my dreadful headache! Oh, the miseries that are coming down upon our house! Do not let your mother die, Emily; then you will have no mother."

And her ladyship's eyes were wet: she could not bear to think of her own death.

Among other announcements in the Gazette might be seen: "Mr. George, appointed Professor, 5th class, No. 8."

"What a pity his father and mother are in the grave, and can't read it!" said the new porter-folks who now lived in the cellar under the General. They knew that the Professor had been born and bred within the four walls.

"Now he'll come in for the title-tax!" said the man.

"Well, it's no such mighty matter for a poor child!" said the wife.

"Eighteen rix-dollars a year!" said the man. "I call it a good round sum."

"No, no; it's the title I'm talking of!" said the wife. "You don't suppose he'll be bothered by having the tax to pay? He can earn as much over and over again, and a rich wife into the bargain. If we had little ones, good man, a child of ours, too, would some day be architect and professor."

THE PORTER'S SON.

Thus George was well mentioned in the cellar, and he was well mentioned on the drawing-room floor: the old Count took good care of that.

It was the old set of childish picture-drawings that introduced his name. But how came these to be mentioned? Why, the talk turned upon Russia, upon Moscow; and thus one was led right up to the Kremlin, of which our friend George made a drawing once, when he was little, for the little Miss Emily. What a number of pictures he used to draw! one the Count especially remembered—"Little Emily's Castle," with scrolls showing where she slept, where she danced, and where she played at "visitors coming." The Professor had great ability. He might live to be an old veteran privy counselor—that was not at all improbable: ay, and build a real castle for the young lady before he died—why not?

"That was a strange burst of vivacity," remarked the General's lady, when the Count was gone. The General nodded his head, thoughtfully, and went out riding, with his groom at a respectful distance behind him, and he sat prouder than ever on his high horse.

Little Emily's birthday came, bringing cards and notes, books and flowers. The General kissed her on the brow, and her ladyship kissed her on the lips. They were patterns of parental affection; and they were all three honored with high visitors—two of the princes. Then there was talk about balls and theatres, about diplomatic embassies, and the government of kingdoms and empires. There was talk about rising men, about native talent; and this brought up the name of the young professor, Mr. George, the architect.

"He is building for immortality!" it was said; "meanwhile he is building himself into one of the first families."

"One of the first families!" repeated the General, when he was left alone with her ladyship: "which one of our first families?"

"I can guess which was alluded to," said her ladyship; "but I don't choose to speak, nor even think of it. God may ordain it so, but I shall be quite astounded!"

"Astounded!" echoed the General. "Look at me, I haven't a single idea in my head!" and he sank into a reverie, waiting for thoughts to come.

There is an unspeakable power bestowed on a man by a few dew-drops of grace—grace from above—whether the grace of kings, or the grace of God; and both of these combined in favor of little George.

But we are forgetting the birthday.

Emily's chamber was fragrant with flowers, sent by her friends and playmates: on her table lay fine presents, tokens of greeting and remembrance; but not one from George. Gifts from him would not have reached her, but they were not needed; the whole house was a remembrance of him. From the very sand-bin under the stairs peeped a memorial flower, even as Emily had peeped, when the curtain was in flames, and George rushed up as first fireman. One glance out of the window, and the acacia-tree reminded her of the days of childhood. Blossoms and leaves were gone, but the tree stood in hoar-frost, like a vast branch of coral; and full and clear between the branches shone the moon, unchanged though ever changing, the same as when boy George shared his bread-and-butter with baby Emily.

She opened a drawer and took out the pictures—the Kremlin of the Czar, and her own castle—keepsakes from George. They were looked on and mused upon, and thought after thought kept rising. She remembered the day when, unmarked by father or mother, she stole down to where the Porter's wife lay breathing her last: she sat by her side, held her hand, and heard her dying words, "Blessing—George!" The mother was thinking of her son. But now, to Emily, the words seemed to bear a deeper meaning. In good truth, George was with her on her birthday.

The next day, as it happened, was another birthday, the General's own; for he had been born the day after his daughter—naturally earlier, many years earlier. Again there came presents; and among the rest a saddle of a peculiar make, and comfortable and costly; there was only one of the princes who had the fellow to it. From whom could it have come? The General was in ecstasy. It bore a little ticket. Now, if this had said, "Thanks for yesterday," any of us could have guessed whom it came from, but the ticket said, "From one whom the General does not know."

"Who in the world is there I do not know?" said the General. "I know every body," and his thoughts went paying visits in the great world. He knew them all there, one and all. "It comes from my wife!" he said, at last. "She is making fun of me! Charming!"

But she was not making fun of him; that time was gone by.

Once more there was a feast; but not at the General's. It was a fancy ball given by one of the princes: masking was allowed there.

The General went as Rubens, in a Spanish dress with a small ruff, as upright as his rapier. Her ladyship was Madame Rubens, in black velvet, a high bodice, terribly warm, and her neck in a millstone, that is to say, in a large ruff. She looked the image of a Dutch painting of the General's, the hands in which were especially admired, and were thought exactly like those of her ladyship.

Emily was Psyche, in muslin and lace. She was a floating tuft of swan's-down; she was in no need of wings, and only wore them as the Psyche badge.

It was a scene of pomp and splendor, lights and flowers, magnificence and taste. One had hardly time to pay attention to Madame Rubens and her beautiful hands.

A black Domino, with an acacia flower in his hood, danced with Psyche.

"Who is he?" asked the General's lady. "His Royal Highness," said the General. "I am quite sure of that. I knew him at once by his hand-salute."

Her ladyship doubted.

General Rubens did not doubt. He drew near the black Domino, and wrote royal initials on the palm of his hand. They were not acknowledged; but a certain hint was given in return: the motto of the saddle!—"One whom the General does not know!"

"Yet something I do know of you," said the General: "it was you who sent me the saddle." The Domino waved his hand, and disappeared among the others.

"Who is the black Domino you have been dancing with, Emily?" asked her mother. "I did not ask his name," she answered.

"Because you knew it! It is the Professor. Your protégé, Count, is here," she continued, turning to the Count, who stood close by; "the black Domino with the acacia flower."

"Very likely, your ladyship," he replied; "but still, there is one of the princes in the same costume."

"I know that hand-salute," said the General. "From the Prince I received the saddle! I feel so sure of my man that I would ask him to dinner."

"Do so," said the Count; "if it's the Prince he will be sure to come."

"And if it is the other he will not come," said the General; and made his way to the black Domino, who stood talking with the King. The General offered him a most respectful invitation, together with hopes of better acquaintance. The General smiled in full confidence, he knew so well whom he was inviting, and he spoke aloud and distinctly.

The Domino lifted his mask; it was George! "Does the General repeat his invitation?" he asked.

The General drew himself an inch higher, assumed a stiffer bearing, took two steps backward, and one step forward, as if dancing a minuet; and all the gravity and expression he could muster, all the General, in short, stood in his fine features.

"I never retract my offers—the Professor is invited!" and he bowed, with a sidelong glance at the King, who might certainly have heard the whole of it.

And thus the General gave a dinner, at which his only guests were the old Count and his protégé.

"My foot under the table!" thought George; "the foundation-stone is laid." And so it was indeed; and it was laid with great solemnity on the part of the General and her ladyship.

The man had come and gone; and as the General was quite ready to confess, had behaved like a member of good society, and had been vastly agreeable; the General had often found himself repeating his "charmant." Her ladyship also talked of her dinner; talked of it to one of the highest and most highly gifted of the Court ladies, and the latter begged an invitation for herself the next time the Professor came. So he must needs be reinvited. And invited he was, and came, and again he was "charmant;" he could even play chess!

"He is not from the cellar," said the General. "Most undoubtedly he is some scion of nobility—there are many such noble scions—and that is not any fault of the young man's!"

Mr. Professor could enter the King's house, and so might very well enter the General's; but strike root there—no! Who could talk of such a thing?—Why, the whole town, that was all.

He did strike root, and grew. The dew of grace fell from above.

There was nobody, therefore, astonished that, when the Professor became State Counselor,

Emily became State Counsellors. "Life is tragedy or comedy," said the General: "in tragedy they die; in comedy they win each other."

Here they won each other. And they won three sturdy boys, though not all at once.

The sweet children rode on sticks from room to room, whenever they came to see grandfather and grandmother. And the General rode on a stick behind them, "as groom for the small State Counselors!"

Her ladyship sat on the sofa and smiled, even if she had got her bad headache.

So far did George get on in the world, and much farther too; or else it would not have been worth my while to tell the story of "The Porter's Son."

DISTEMPERED moralists may prate,
In tones of self-complacent sadness,
Of mankind's base, deceitful state,
Of human nature's innate badness;
What fitter sight could cynics see
Than in the sketch our artist traces—
What healthier medicine could there be
Than that of rural childish faces?

Not children reared within the bound
Of stifling court or close-packed alley,
Whose city ears ne'er knew the sound
Of streamlets tinkling through the valley;
Who ne'er breathed pure, untainted air—
Poor, wan, pale, little, worn-out creatures!—
With signs of early grief and care
In all their words, ways, looks, and features!

But children, whose first lot in life
Is cast 'mid rustic bliss and quiet,
Far from the great town's angry strife,
Its crowd, its sorrow, and its riot:
Who wake each morn to hear the lay
Of birds their tuneful carol trilling,
And sink to sleep at close of day,
Content and peace their young hearts filling!

Simple their life from hour to hour,
Simple their sorrows and their pleasures—
A few dumb pets, the hedge-row flower—
These are their best-prized, only treasures.
They love the flock that crops the plain,
The buds that blossom in the meadow,
They love to watch the ripening grain—
To sport beneath the old oak's shadow.

Then let the cross-grained cynic gaze
On pictures such as these before him,
And let the sight of each young face
To faith in human kind restore him:
Or if he deems the full-grown man
Must needs be selfish, bad, malicious,
Let him allow that Nature's plan
Was not to make her creatures vicious.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER III.

"Back again, Doctor?" said Cuthbert Kearney, with his brown eyes lighting kindly. "I'm really very much obliged to you. Would you come and look at him again? There seems to be a little change. I think he has been trying hard to speak for nearly half an hour. Something on his mind, I'm afraid, that it distresses him not to utter; and you can't tell how it distresses me. Oh God! if he only could speak once more. He hears every word, I'm sure, but he can only look unspeakable things, and open and shut his eyes. Yes! he shut his left hand on mine a moment ago, and looked very grateful when I gave him a drink."

"Shall I come in, Cuthbert?" asked Mrs. Kearney. "I wish I could help!"

"Not yet, dear; it would only make you sad. I will call you when—" He could not say the word, but turned his face away, biting his lips; for there was none there but he who remembered the afternoons when he had slept sitting on the old man's knee, with his head nestled in the hollow of his neck. Neither did he say "it would make him sad, too," though he had seen the look of grief—almost of penitence—which old Seibert's silent face cast on his beautiful young wife the day that they arrived.

So the Doctor alone followed him back into the chamber whose snowy curtain was still fluttering in the sweet May breeze as when Lily and Kledda had looked toward the wall of roses.

The old man's pallor and emaciation had fearfully increased since we last saw him carried unconscious from the lawn. His eyes were blood-shot as ever, and far more weirdly haggard; but as paralysis gained increasing sway of the whole system the distortion of the mouth had become less, and the restoration of balance began appearing in an even laxity of lips less terrible, though it meant death, than the rigid one-sidedness of his disease's earlier stage. As he beheld the Doctor a tremor passed over his face, and the latter saw that Cuthbert had interpreted rightly—he was trying to speak.

"Doctor, don't you think he may—isn't it possible? Oh, isn't it—just once?"

"He may," whispered Derrick, "possibly—but very improbably. Where is the nux vomica tincture? There—ten drops—no, give it to me; my hand's steadier; I've not been up all night, you know. Now give him that in a wine-glassful of Bourbon, or you raise his head, and I'll give it him. That's it. His deglutition's good still."

"Father, dear father, won't you say a word to me? You know your son—your own little Bertie that used to be? If I haven't made you always happy, oh! won't you forgive me—forgive us all, dear father? If you do, press my hand again as you did a minute ago."

Dr. Dalmager barely restrained an audible "Pshaw!" as he turned toward the window, his silken mustache curling upward in contempt. The other young man tremblingly put his right hand into the cold, skinny fingers on the side where life was still smouldering, felt them feebly contract on his—saw an unspeakable mute appeal come into the wan, bloodshot eyes—and burst into child-like tears. Again the old man's lips trembled, and the poor masterless tongue felt wanderingly for some little fragment of utterance.

"Oh, he will speak!" said Cuthbert, smiling back his tears to an instant check. "Doctor, I think he will!"

"Come away!" answered the Doctor, firmly, almost rudely. "You disturb him; let him collect himself; the dose should begin to help him now, if ever—"

He took the son's place by the old man's pillow, and laid his own ear close to his lips. As he did so Seibert Kearney's eyes again looked their wistful appeal, but this time into those which had no pity for him. His throat moved convulsively, and his tongue, like one breaking for an instant out of nightmare, made one faint articulate effort—audible only as a whisper, too broken for any but the most practiced interpreter of paralytic speech—

"The—the—cash-box—"

It sounded only like "ca-bo," but Derrick understood him, and bent his ear lower. The quick eye of filial instinct brought Cuthbert to the bedside again almost with a leap. "Oh! he speaks—didn't he say something, Doctor—dear Doctor?"

"Quick!" said Derrick—"run to the kitchen for a hot stove-plate—wrap it in flannels to put to his feet. I think he will speak."

Hardly containing his frenzy of joy, Cuthbert rushed away to fulfill the behest of him whom he trusted in like God—looked to as next to omnipotent for the attainment of this now sole desire of his heart. Great drops of sweat stood on Derrick's forehead—he trembled as he had never before done in his life. But he had gained all-important time. The old man made one more desperate effort—he spoke so loud that had Cuthbert been where he stood just now he surely must have heard him. "The cash-box!"

"Here!" said Derrick, every nerve growing firm as wire—"take this; it will compose your thoughts." He pulled from his breast-pocket a half-ounce vial, nearly half-full, and labeled "Tinct. Opii." He poured it down the old man's unresisting throat—a slight spasm of coughing came on without rejecting it. "Now, speak!" he said, sternly, putting his ear again to the tremulous lips—"the cash-box—where—what?"

"Tell—son—lawn—cash-box—afraid—you—rob—tree—chair—"

Still closer Derrick bent his ear, but the broken whisper became a meaningless hiss, then ceased altogether; and when Cuthbert returned with the useless heater to deceive himself, as he tenderly wrapped it against the poor palsied feet, with the faith that he was doing something of great service, Derrick had learned no secret which was not his already. But as he thought what might have been, but for his quick perception and use of strategy—if he could not have sent out the son, or if his return had been a few minutes quicker—if the father's short respite of utterance had been earlier, longer, or more audible—if the little vial had not been at hand, he had less nerve to use it, or it less instant in its potency—under the pressure of all those ifs, the great beads oozed out upon his temples, and he trembled as before.

"Thank you, and thank God for your kind sympathy at such a time," said Cuthbert, affectionately. "I fear such a scene is too much for you—you have known what this loss is too—God bless you, my dear friend!" and he put out his hand to take Derrick's tenderly; but his words went through the Doctor like a knife, and he could no more take the frank hand thus proffered than he could have sworn away his soul or stabbed a baby in its crib. He could only pretend not to see it, and murmur, with averted face,

"I'm afraid—he'll never speak again—after all. You'd better bring in Mrs. Kearney and the little girl."

Cuthbert's heart once more sank within him, as he stole out into the next room and brought back his darlings. Derrick prophesied on a certainty. The old man was going fast. But he opened his eyes and threw unutterable recognition into them as they fell on his son's wife and child. "Clasp hers too to show you love us both!" said Cuthbert, laying his wife's hand into his father's fingers; and again came the sweet, faint response.

"Please lift me on the bed beside grandpa," whispered Lily.

"Do so," said Derrick, as they hesitated; "it can not trouble him. Speak to him, Beauty—it must be like the voice of an angel now."

The old man fixed his eyes upon her—growing filmy both with his last potion and with natural death—but full of a marvelous new tenderness which nothing could quench.

"Grandpa," said the child, in a soft, caressing voice, "I love you, dear grandpa!"

Something like a reflection of her own smile came over his wrecked visage as he heard her.

"I know you love me, grandpa. I see it in your eyes. I want you, when He comes, to ask him where Jesus is—and have him take you right to Jesus. Then, when you see him, tell him to take good care of you till I come, and to let me be your little angel. I'll be 'long there by-and-by—don't get tired waiting, dear grandpa. I can be your angel here while I stay, you know. I'll pray for you when I'm awake, and when they put me to sleep in my crib, I'll come out and fly away to you in a dream, and be your little comfort; and you'll see me 'most every night, grandpa—only it won't be night there, for the moon won't turn into blood where Jesus is—there's no more blood and thorns there, no more drops of sweat, only the garden—the great, beautiful, bright garden. You remember now, grandpa. Say mamma's angel, and papa's, and your angel, grandpa, sent you and told you to ask for Jesus the minute you came."

(She stole her tiny hand into the poor, chilly fingers where her parents' had been, and went on.)

"Never mind if you did sometimes forget to say your prayers, and speak naughty words, and drink things that hurt you. You won't do it any more, will you, dear grandpa?"

The cold fingers gave one last response—the last, but the closest and tenderest of all.

"Thank you, dear grandpa. Now don't be afraid. When the chariot comes, Jesus will be in it, and you won't go alone or into the dark. He's so sweet, grandpa! Jesus and I love each other dearly, and He loves you, and you love Him now; and when you see Him, oh! how much more you'll love Him."

Again the strange, sweet smile seemed struggling to break through that poor, tattered mask of a soul. Then a convulsive gurgle sounded in the old man's throat, and Cuthbert, with streaming eyes, broke the silence. "Oh, one moment more! Keep him on earth one moment!"

"Whisky," said the Doctor, in a dazed, mechanical voice, like a somnambulist.

Cuthbert poured out a wine-glassful and pressed it to the old man's lips. He summoned the last remnant of life within him, and sealed them against it; he opened his eyes, and cast them on his son with a mild reproach; then twice he moved the forefinger of his left hand sideways as his last token of refusal.

"He wants to keep his promise, papa; he don't want to go to Jesus with any thing bad in his breath." And as Lily put away the glass with gentle firmness something unutterable in those glazing eyes thanked her.

"Only one thing more, dear grandpa. Take this kiss to Jesus for me." She pressed her lovely mouth to the dumb lips before they grew quite chill; and the dim eyes looked fixedly on her with the calm joy of one who verily sees an angel yet is not afraid.

"Now, dear tired grandpa, go to sleep while I put my cheek by you on the pillow, and Jesus will come."

She shut her eyes and lay down by his side. A minute went by. The three who stood by the bed could hear their hearts beat. A gentle sigh heaved the bosom of the old man; he opened his eyes with one last unutterable look, which took in all things, but had no regret in it, and the Doctor said, "He is dead."

Lily rose to her knees and answered, "No; he has gone home. It was Jesus came for him. That's why you didn't hear the wheels; his chariot comes without thunder. Hark! I can hear it now!"

But to those ears which the world had dulled it sounded only like the wind going in the tree-tops and over the wall of roses.

When the first week of mourning was over, and the dead out of sight, Cuthbert addressed himself to a duty in whose discharge sensitive natures like his find almost inevitable torture. He must settle his father's estate, and the necessity of the work spared him no jot of pain arising from the feeling that he was making merchandise of the dead. If the love of his wife and child had not been his perpetual refuge—moreover, he gratefully added, if a strong, clear-headed, practical friend like Derrick had not been at his elbow from morning till night—he would have abandoned the whole matter and run away from whatever fortune was left him.

How much more painful it is to have no fortune whatever than to endure the pain of arranging a large one, Cuthbert, at the commencement of his investigation, never dreamed that he should know. One month, however, brought the close of that investigation, and with it the knowledge undreamed of—as a matter not of disinterested speculation but of tangible, horrible experience. After searching the house from top to bottom, taking up every stone in the cellar, and prying up every board in the successive floors, searching the walls for secret compartments, and, in fine, making an examination which only stopped short of pulling down every building on the demesne, Cuthbert was stared blankly in the face by the fact that there existed no evidence of any property whatever belonging to his father at the time of his decease. Derrick generously loaned him a thousand dollars to offer in reward for the missing cash-box, and to pay for the advertisement of it. But no one appeared to claim the reward. Even had it been possible to lay hands on the cash-box at once, there was no certainty that its contents were of any value. What they were was a secret of which Seibert Kearney had left no memorandum, and the only persons who had ever seen its exterior, the faithful negroes who were the first to proclaim its loss, were as ignorant of its inside as they were of the globe's on whose crust they lived. A hundred dollars in the old man's pocket-book, and the few trifling articles of new furniture he had bought to replace worn or broken ones which he found in the house when he took the transfer of it from old Reuben Dalmager, were the sole available assets which Cuthbert's search brought forth. It did not appear from any entry on the books of the Dalmager estate, in Derrick's possession, that a single payment had been made upon the Garnet Run property after Seibert Kearney's first cash installment of $1000 to bind the bargain. The original transaction had taken place during Derrick's absence abroad; and after his utmost efforts to ferret out of papers and memory some proof that a cent had been paid his father by Seibert after his own return, he confessed, with deep despondency, that he could not recall a single settlement of the kind. So, one evening, Cuthbert Kearney was compelled to tell his wife that they were once more thrown upon the world under circumstances of distress far sorer than those which had surrounded the earliest days of their married life, in that they must see the blight of poverty fall on the little angel they would have died to save from any malignant influence, and now no hope existed, however distant, of better days through reconciliation with their father. In coming to Kentucky upon the strength of that reconciliation they had cut asunder all the ties which bound them to humble competence in the East. Their cottage and their furniture were sold. Another principal had been elected to Cuthbert's chair in the Academy. They had scarcely five hundred dollars left, and when that was gone they would be utterly penniless, resourceless outcasts, more than a thousand miles from home, without influence in Cuthbert's profession, and without any visible means of support. If they returned to the East, who would listen to the incredible misfortune which had befallen them? They would return in any case under a shadow. Seibert Kearney was known to have gone away from Mellenville a wealthy man; since they reached Kentucky they had written back that they had found him so; there would be no way to explain the inconsistency of their stories, and if that were overlooked the world would regard them only as disappointed adventurers, who had gone for wool and come back shorn. Thus they reasoned. Perhaps the world is more generous than this, but Cuthbert's experience of it had been a bitter one, and his naturally sensitive nature, to which life came ever as to a flayed surface and bare nerve-points, writhed under an anguish of disappointment and despair which nothing but the love of his wife and child kept from becoming suicidal.

"HE PULLED FROM HIS BREAST-POCKET A HALF-OUNCE VIAL, NEARLY HALF-FULL, AND LABELED 'TINCT. OPII.'"

On the evening of the revelation Cuthbert and his wife were sitting silently in the large saloon with Lily on a low ottoman between them. The nature of their sorrow she could not understand, but she knew it was a very great one. Holding a hand of each she kissed and stroked first one and then the other—letting her curls stream into their bare palms, as if to make them feel that they were not left utterly empty—to replace what they had lost with a gold which was God's own douceur, and the world could not take away from them. Without a question or a spoken consolation she laid her soft little cheek against them, and lifted to the poor, stunned faces of the two eyes of such impressible love that they might have felt she saw angels watching over them through the black cloud their elder vision could not pierce, and taken fresh hope as looking into a mirror of heaven.

They heard a foot on the gravel, and, without announcement, Derrick Dalmager stepped across the low window-sill, out of the twilight and the roses.

"Come!" said he, before Cuthbert could rouse himself from his apathy enough to play the poor mockery of host and offer him a seat—"Come!" said he, laying his hand upon his tenant's shoulder, "we need not make it worse than it is. I do not want to use this place. Certainly not in any way that will exclude you. My bachelor wants are few—I have a nice little den already—I should not sell this place if I took it away from you. Suppose you stay here and keep house for me till we can find something better? You need not feel under any obligation. I have long wanted somebody to take charge of my property—to act, you know, as a confidential business friend, manage my books, and that sort of thing—so that I could devote my time more exclusively to my profession. You Eastern men have a talent for management we free-handed, happy-go-lucky fellows of the Southwest never attain. You can't imagine how often I've admired it! There are dividends coming in I'm almost certain I never draw—debts I'm too lazy to collect—and, altogether, you don't know how much you could take off my shoulders that's a bore to me but would be a pleasant occupation to you, save me thousands a year, and make you perfectly independent. Now, what do you say to the idea of doing me this kindness, at eighteen hundred a year—as I remarked, till you can find something better—a school, a professorship by-and-by, perhaps, when you have time to make acquaintances among our people?"

"Say?" answered Cuthbert, like a man dreaming of some world in which the timely relief of the romance and the drama had suddenly proved real. "Say? Oh, God bless you! God bless you!" and, trembling with revulsion of feeling, he leaned on Derrick, grasped his hand, and hid his face on his shoulder. Mrs. Kearney tried to speak, but her voice utterly failed her. She raised her beautiful face to the Doctor's with one look worth a thousand thanks, dropped it, and with a quick sob relieved her heart through her eyes in torrents.

"Weep, weep, darling child!" said Derrick, "it will do you good;" and, throwing his arm around her waist, as if she had been the child he called her, he pressed her close to his bosom.

"Weep!" said he, "but weep here, where you will always find a comforter;" and, drawing her head down upon his shoulder, he pressed his lips to her lovely golden hair with a fervor which her heart was too full to analyze—which, if she had interpreted at all, she would have ascribed to the tender compassion of a strong man's most sympathizing heart. Had she seen the look which accompanied the act she might have read the kiss otherwise; but the face of their helper wore no expression save frank benevolence, when the husband and wife lifted their heads again after a few moments' silence, and Derrick released them from his embrace.

"Won't you kiss poor papa?" said Lily, who had seen Derrick's intense face with a sense that its meaning was new, but no more understanding it than an angel in Heaven. "He feels very sorry too."

Derrick laughed joyously and caught up Lily into his disengaged arms.

"Men don't kiss each other, baby. Besides, your papa isn't sorry now; but I'll kiss you for him a hundred times, you beauty!" And so speaking he suited deed to word.

"With your permission," continued Derrick, still holding Lily in his arms, "I'll make this place my head-quarters (I'll only want two or three rooms, you know), and use the Roost only for my office. I always loved this dear old spot. I always hoped I should live here some time; and it will be so charming to have a home with a family about me that I already feel as if it were my own. Heaven will be too good to a roving genius like me to grant me such domestic happiness when I've all my life refused the only yoke that they say can ever bring it, just that I might go kicking my heels about the world an untamed bachelor! I can drive in to Owlville every morning and come back in the afternoon, sure there's always a welcome for me—all business off my mind—a cozy corner for Lily's old bachelor uncle ready by the fire in winter—nice moonlight rides and walks after tea in the summer—the best of housekeeping, and none of the trouble of it—dear me! how shall I ever deserve it?"

"Will you always love mamma and be good to her?" said Lily.

"I swear it, on your two little blue pieces of heaven!" said the Doctor, and kissed Lily again on her eyes.

"Don't swear—it's naughty." And reading his face with that steadfast innocent gaze of childhood to which the hardest heart can not lie, she asked further: "And will you always be good to dear papa and love him?" The Doctor's eyes looked away from the baby face—he seemed relapsing into deep thought as if he had not heard her.

"What do you say, Kearney?" said he, gently putting Lily down. There was but one answer to be given. The next day Cuthbert was installed in a room at the Roost, appropriately fitted up with ledgers and green baize, as the Doctor's business-man; and the furniture of those rooms which had been Derrick's private sanctuary was sent out to Garnet Run. From that time Derrick lived in his boyhood's home as one of his tenant's family—Cuthbert and he riding in to Owlville every morning at nine and returning to tea in the evening.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE grand musical festival, at Steinway Hall, attracted an appreciative audience. It is a pleasant indication of the public taste in this great metropolis that such Oratorios as the "Messiah," the "Creation," and "Elijah," and classical concerts of a high order, draw overflowing houses. This fact should, in some measure, console those who are impressed with the conviction that the masses of New York are wholly devoted to amusements of the most frivolous and demoralizing kind. Recreation of some kind the people must have; and scarcely any thing could have a more direct influence in preventing multitudes from attending positively objectionable places of amusement than to have frequent series of musical performances similar to those which have been under the charge of Mr. L. F. Harrison during the past year.

At the recent Handel and Haydn Festival, in Boston, the celebrated young pianist, Miss Alide Topp, was received by the critical and fastidious musical public with great enthusiasm. Her modest, unassuming, and graceful manners, with her marvelous rapidity, accuracy, and power of touch won for her the highest honors. One of the Boston papers remarked: "Among lady pianists ever heard here we call no one her equal—no such union of many qualities of vigor, force, and positive command over her instrument, with womanly grace, delicacy, and persuasive charm of expression. The mechanical interpretation of the Concerto was certainly a very marvel of brilliancy and consummate skill, supplemented by a taste, thought, and spirit true to the varying and beautiful rhythms of the composition, and a poetic feeling in perfect accord with the author and subject. She read her music without score, and there was a captivating freedom to her performance."

A new lodging-house for boys has recently been opened at Nos. 325 and 327 Rivington Street, in this city. It is under the charge of the Children's Aid Society, and will be a great assistance and protection to the many homeless boys who are striving to earn their bread. More than a hundred can here be accommodated. Poor boys who are earning their pittance by day are furnished with clean, comfortable beds, with the use of bath-room, sitting-room, and clothes-closets, for five cents a night. A good breakfast and supper may also be obtained for the same price each meal. The food is of excellent quality and abundant in quantity. In the same establishment, although independent of the boarding and lodging departments, is a day-school, where the children of the neighborhood are taught, gratuitously, the elementary branches of an English education. A night-school for the boys who are in the habit of lodging here will probably soon be opened, and also a free public reading-room.

The bill appropriating $40,000 from the Massachusetts State Treasury to Mount Holyoke Seminary has passed the Legislature, to the great satisfaction of its numerous friends. The money will be of immediate service. While the moderate tuition of this institution has been sufficient to cover the ordinary current expenses, improvements in the building have been imperatively demanded, for which a debt has been incurred, and a part of the appropriation will be used to liquidate this debt. A fire-proof library-room is desired: although the number of books at present is only about four thousand, $10,000 are promised for the purchase of books whenever a suitable depository is provided. So many other improvements are needed that it will be difficult to decide between conflicting claims in expending the balance. Massachusetts has liberally assisted its colleges for young men; and it is worthy of note that, without previous expense to the State, this institution for young women has furnished it with not less than 1000 valuable teachers; and more than 1500 of its 4000 pupils, and 450 of its 1200 graduates have been Massachusetts girls. When the intelligence of the above-mentioned appropriation reached the Seminary, the teachers and pupils indulged in an impromptu celebration in honor of the event.

A simple and pretty device for cultivating mosses is suggested by the Maine Farmer. As ordinary methods of cultivating plants often fail with mosses, ladies may like to try this. The mosses, and other low-running plants, are placed in a large glass dish with natural soil, covered with another glass dish, and set in the window. They require a great deal of water, but the glass prevents evaporation, while it admits the light of the sun.

Mrs. Kemble, the distinguished Shakspearian reader, recently received intelligence from England that she was the inheritor of a valuable painting by Sir Thomas Lawrence, and of a pair of gloves worn by Shakspeare while performing upon the stage, and which have been since in the possession of Garrick and of Mrs. Siddons.

Miss Maria S. Rye still continues her labors in connection with female immigration. She has learned that many young women can be comfortably placed in Canada; and arrangements were made for her to go by steamer from Liverpool, on May 28, taking one hundred women with her. There are good openings in Canada for general servants, nurse-maids, house-maids, washer-women, dress-makers, and needle-women. Wages are not excessively high, but young women are sure of being kindly treated in a new country like Canada, and certain of getting employment at all times. Immigrants will land at Quebec, and be passed on west at the expense of the Government, and Miss Rye will not leave them until they are respectfully placed.

A heavy affliction has befallen M. Victor Hugo and his family in the death of his only grandchild and inheritor of his name in the second degree—a child of something over twelve months—the son of M. Charles Hugo. The poet's hopes and affections were concentrated with all the intensity of his nature on the little creature, who died after three days' illness, and he feels his bereavement very deeply.

A correspondent of a Southern paper, after discoursing at some length on the general subject of "bonnets," thus closes up the matter: "I admire sun-bonnets very much, and nothing does me more good than to see a pretty woman with one of them on. Modesty is woman's greatest virtue, and at the same time her most bewitching charm, and what can be more modest than a neat little woman in a tasty sun-bonnet? Their dear little faces look so charming back among the splits and calico. But my opinion is that the ladies should wear just what they please; for I know full well they will look nice in any thing."

Years ago there was an old proverb to the effect that in order to have a well-made glove three countries should contribute—Spain to prepare the skins, France to cut the patterns, and England to sew the seams. But now the gloves produced entirely in France are recognized, even by their rivals, as of superior quality. The most important of the many improvements made in the method of cutting out glove-patterns are those of Xavier Jouvin. The use of a die for cutting, and the system of measures invented by him in 1835 have given to this art a mathematical precision. Finally the sewing of the seams has gained both in strength and beauty. This result has been obtained by the use of a toothed clamp to hold the skins and guide the needle, by the employment of stronger silk and the use of the double stitch. The Paris manufacturers depend, for the sewing of gloves, upon the work-people in the vicinity of Vendome, Mortagne, Verneuil, Mitry, Tremblay, and other parishes in the department of l'Oise and Seine-et-Oise. At Paris are made the finest qualities of gloves; at Grenoble a second quality of kid glove; the greatest part of the exported gloves are made at Chaumont and Luneville; while most of those made at Milhan, Niort, Vendome, and Saint Julien are lamb, buck, and beaver gloves.

The portrait of Queen Victoria, "Presented by the Queen to George Peabody for his munificence to the Poor of London," is a miniature painting, nine and a half by eight inches in size. It is painted upon enamel on a gold plate, and this material gives an exquisite softness and delicacy to the picture which is flattering to the original. The figure is a full length seated in a chair, arrayed in the robes worn at the opening of Parliament, on the occasion of her first appearance in public after laying aside her mourning dress. She wears a Mary Stuart cap, surmounted by a demi-crown, and a full flowing white veil, parted in the middle, spreads on either side of her head. On her wrists are splendid bracelets of gold, and over her left shoulder is worn the blue ribbon of the Order of Knighthood. The whole costume looks appropriate to set off the figure of a youthful matron, for such the picture appears. There is a touch of sadness in the countenance, showing in her widowhood a remembrance of her long career of domestic happiness.

There are appropriate ornaments of gold around the picture, which give it brilliancy and effect. On the top are the British Arms, on each side are the national emblems of the Rose, Shamrock, and Thistle, and at the bottom a shield inscribed with the words, "Presented by the Queen to George Peabody for his munificence to the Poor of London, 1867."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mrs. A. M. BROOKFORD.—We briefly answer questions pertaining to the province of our journal, either by letter, if stamps are enclosed, or in the columns of the Bazar. Brussels net and guipure insertion are made into black waists, to be worn over trimmed under-bodies of linen.

ELLA L. B.—White piqué is more dressy than figured. A muslin frill an inch and a half wide, needled-worked in scallops at one edge and sewed on in box-pleats or simply gathered on a cord, will trim a piqué prettily. The waist should be tight fitting, with button-holes worked up the front. Piqué is too thick to gather into a belt. A variety of shapes for capes, pelerines, and fichus are worn this season with short dresses. Many of these have been described and illustrated in the Bazar.

MOURNING.—Folds or a pleated ruffle of crape should surround the front of the bonnet. A shell bow is placed on the left. Two folds of crape a yard and a half long pass over the bonnet near the edge of the back, falling over the chignon, and are caught together beneath the chin with a shell bow, or they may be merely crossed. The under fold should be three inches wide. Laid on this is an inch wide fold that forms a heading. The crape should be single, except as it is doubled by the fold. The ribbon strings are each half a yard long, an inch wide, and tied behind. White organdy is more fashionable than tulle for the cuffs you speak of. A chemise Russe of Brussels net laid in box-pleats from neck to belt all around would be a suitable waist. A band of the net edged with narrow guipure trims the neck and sleeve. It is impossible to give the quantity and price of crape unless you describe how the bonnet is to be made.

FAYETTEVILLE.—Plaid silks are not admired for short dresses. Make your dress long. Gore the front width. If the skirt is a yard and a half long, it will require all your fullness of five and three-eighths yards to be wide enough at the bottom. Gore it to fit closely to the waist in front and at the sides. Leave the back width full. With the pieces that are left you may be able to make a new waist by joining them so that the plaids fit accurately. The narrow ruffles of black silk will trim the skirt prettily, either as long or short dress. A fichu three inches wide in the back tapering down to a point at the belt will trim the waist; edge with a ruffle. It is sewn on the waist, is shaped like a bertha in the back, and bretelles in front. Short dresses are worn for visiting. Long dresses require a carriage. After the seams at the back are sewn they should be from two to three inches apart—according to the figure—two inches for slender waists. Two darts are made on each side of the front. The back breadths of the piqué should be gored, as there is a tendency to make all skirts fuller. The seams need not be corded; but that is a matter of fancy. If the bretelles are of the dress material the ends are concealed under a belt. If of lace and velvet, short loose ends fall a few inches below the waist.

A. H. WENZEL.—We can not undertake to give special patterns, as our Supplements are arranged to suit the average needs of the community. The pattern you desire will probably be given in due time.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

The ladies are delighted with WARP's cloth-lined paper cuffs. They are so much like linen that it is almost impossible to tell one from the other, and they are retailed every where at fifty cents for ten pairs. The cloth lining makes them very strong. Can be had at WARP's, corner of Union Square and Broadway; also, wholesale and retail, at No. 337 Broadway.—Daily Times.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.
Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.
Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.
COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.
We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND CURES

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

FACETIÆ.

In Paris a velocipede mania is just now prevailing. It is said that calls are already made in velocipedes, and these odd carriages are beginning to be seen in the line with barouches and broughams. Fashionable ladies exercise two hours a day with their velocipedes, either in their rooms or in the open air, and think this a cure for all diseases. The velocipedes are seen every where—in the streets, on the promenades, and in the parks. The other day a charming, blue-eyed Russian princess rang hastily for her maid, and said, "Susan, the prince is sick and the wheel has come off from my velocipede. Quick, run first to the carriage-maker's, and then to the doctor's." What will become of the horses? will they all be eaten?

WORDS THAT BURN—Rejected communications.

An old woman who went into the poultry business some time since, under the expectation that she could make a fortune by selling eggs, has quitted it in disgust, because, as she says, "the hens never will lay when eggs are dear, but always begin as soon as they get cheap."

WANTED FOR CHEMICAL PURPOSES—A "lady dissolved in tears."

"Sir," said a sturdy beggar to a benevolent old man, "please give me a quarter, I am hungry and unable to procure food." The quarter was given, when the beggar said, "You have done a noble deed; you have saved me from doing something which I feared I would have come to." "What is that?" said the benefactor. "Work," was the mournful answer.

"Electricity," said the scientific D., "travels faster than light." "Yes," said the reflective B., "it is easier to shock than to instruct."

"Hallo, steward!" exclaimed the fellow in one of the steamboats after having retired to bed; "hallo, steward!" "What, massa?" "I want to see if these bed-bugs put down their names for this berth before I did. If not, I want them turned out."

CUPID'S REPLY.

One day, when Love was young, he strayed Beside a rippling river; His bow across his arm was strung, Upon his back his quiver; As on he tripped a gentle maid Came near the little ranger, But noticed him no more than though To him she was a stranger.

Love smiled, and bowed—surprised, said she, "Pray tell me, Sir, who are you?" "I doubt if I have ever known, And think I never saw you!" "Accept," said Love, "sweet maid, my card, If you have no objection." "Cupid! strange name! I'm sure it has Escaped my recollection!"

An odd, queer smile the god of Love Proceeded then to give her— And took a golden arrow out From others in his quiver: Then drew his bow and cried the while (His face suffused with laughter), He pierced the gentle maiden's heart—"We're strangers not hereafter!"

A lady was urged by her friends to marry a widower, and as an argument they spoke of his two beautiful children. "Children," replied the lady, "are like tooth-picks. A person wants her own."

L'ENFANT CHARMANT.

LITTLE EMILY (who has just received her usual salute from Fred). "Oh, do Kiss Cousin Grace, too, Mr. Lovell." [Fred would only be too happy; but, as it is, he and Grace have to explain the subject thoroughly.]

IT REALLY IS A PITY, ISN'T IT? THAT THE LADY SHOULD HAVE ADOPTED THAT FASHION IN HAIR—AND THAT THE BUTCHER'S HORSE CAN'T ADOPT IT.

AN OBJECTIONABLE PLANT—The Croke-us.

COLORABLE.—"How do I look, doctor?" asked a painted young lady of the family physician. "I can't tell, madam, till you uncover your face," was the crushing reply.

It is said that Marshal Narvaez was exhorted in his last moments by the attendant priest to forgive his enemies. "Enemies!" replied the dying statesman; "I've none left. I ordered the last to be shot long ago."

Taken up for breaking and entering a dwelling-house—Hail-stones.

A little girl, seven years old, was recently called as a witness in a police court, and, in answer to a question as to what becomes of little girls who tell falsehoods, she innocently replied that they were sent to bed.

A TRIAL TRIP—A trip with two Saratoga trunks, four band-boxes, and—a woman.

Some time since a gentleman died in the town of Y., who, during his life, refused to believe in another world. Two or three weeks after his demise, his wife received, through a medium, a communication which read as follows: "Dear wife, I now believe. Please send me my thin clothes."

FISHERMAN'S LOOK.—A person, late on a Saturday afternoon, hailed an Englishman, as he was skillfully essaying the wily fisherman's art for trout, with "Halloa, there! got any thing?" "Got any thing? Of course not. I only came here last Wednesday!" was the reply, as the patient angler once more cast his patent fly.

A VAIN THREAT.—"Mr. Brown, I owe you a grudge, remember that!" "I shall not be frightened then, for I never knew you to pay any thing that you owed."

Mrs. Chapone was asked why she always came so early to church. "Because," said she, "it is part of my religion never to disturb the religion of others."

However dull a woman may be, she will understand all there is in love; however intelligent a man may be, he will never know but half of it.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Lace.—A needle's epigram; all the more valuable for the beauty of its point.

Lady.—An indefinite word used to define any one of the feminine gender.

Lamb.—Much admired as a husband, with plenty of mint sauce.

Landlady.—A person who is often wrongly called a lady, and has no right to what she lands.

Language.—A torrent from woman's tongue; a current from her eyes.

Laurel.—The bell which announces a pretty set of teeth.

Legacy.—The spice which embalms your memory.

Letters (love).—The tombstones of the past, with the epitaph "Here lies—"

Liberty.—What woman feels inclined to take if refused.

Lion.—The animal of all others she prefers to tame.

Liqueur.—The feminine of cognac.

Lock (of hair).—A cutting which carries a train of thought back to a past junction.

Lordship.—A ship few women would refuse to steer to the United States.

Lottery ticket.—A marriage certificate.

Love.—The deuce of hearts.

Lover.—A servant who is never asked for a char acter from his last place.

Luggage.—The gauge of a woman's philosophy.

Luxury.—A mistress in whose lap one forgets the lapse of time and the slaps of conscience.

A man lost his wife. His neighbors called upon him to offer consolation, and he came into the house all covered with dirt and water. "Why, Mr. Brown, what have you been doing?" "My wife dying so, made it a broken day, and I thought I would clean out my well."

How can it be proved that Moses wore a wig?—Because sometimes he was seen with 'air on (Aaron), and sometimes he wasn't.

AN INTER-WHIFF.

Here on my back on the bank I lie,
With a pipe in my mouth, and watch the sky;
And well do I know, beyond a joke,
That nature, like me, delights to smoke.
The little zephyrs down here in the grass
Puff at the weeds as they swiftly pass;
While the breeze of the ether is not too proud—
Though almost too lazy—to blow a cloud.
Every bird has a pipe of its own,
And each has its "bird's-eye" views, 'tis known.
The trees rejoice in a stem and bole,
For the King of the Forest's like old King Cole;
And the hedges as well the practice suits,
For they all of them boast their briar-roots.
Smoking, in short, is loved by all
The works of nature both great and small—
Down to the very small grub, to be brief—
You'll find he is given to rolling a leaf.
So why shouldn't I—
As here I lie

On my back on the bank—all those defy
Who fain would the pleasant plant decry?

An ingenious cobbler, who is known as a man of few words, and who is very provident of them, hit upon the following plan to save expense in painting all the letters of "Shoe Shop:"

S

A confectioner advertises broken hearts for thirteen cents a pound.

Though men boast of holding the reins, the women generally tell them which way they must drive.

COMPARISONS ARE ODISIOUS.

ROMANTIC DEAR. "Oh, Frederick! is it not delightful to wander in the Quiet Country and listen to the Cuckoo's Note?" FREDERICK (who has no soul for poetry). "Oh—ah—yes! I dare say it's all Right, only it always Reminds me of Hiccups!"

THE BLESSING OF HAVING A BROTHER.

MISS JINKS'S PARTICULAR YOUNG MAN. "Why, Miss Jinks, you seem to have no Appetite." MASTER JINKS (with more truth than poetry). "Oh, ain't she though? You should have seen her this Morning over the Cold Goose!"

SECTION OF EDGING FOR VEIL.

Black Lace Embroidered Veil.

THERE are two favorite shapes for veils: the veil with tabs, which is fastened either over or under the chignon, or under the chin, and the short veil which is shown in the illustration. Fig. 27 of the Supplement gives the pattern of half the veil. The original is of black silk lace. The foundation is ornamented with small star figures, which are worked in the lace with black silk twist, as shown by the accompanying illustrations, in the same manner as guipure on netting. The veil is bordered with wide edging, a section of which is shown of full size in the illustration, and which is worked in the same manner as the figures. Above the lace may be worked the border as is shown by the illustrations, which also give two other patterns for the veil. These are worked in point de minute, the manner of making which has already been described in Harper's Bazar. In working any of the patterns given, care must be taken to hold the lace smooth and not to draw it up with the stitches.

BLACK LACE EMBROIDERED VEIL.
For pattern see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 27.

BORDER FOR VEIL.

SECTION OF EDGING FOR VEIL.

Cape with Hood for Child from 2 to 4 Years old.

THIS hooded cape is of white cashmere, lined with a thin layer of wadding and white silk. The trimming consists of narrow black velvet ribbon and black lace. For making the cape cut from Figs. 15 and 16 of the Supplement each a piece of white cashmere and white lining silk, Fig. 16 being bias. Baste the outside on the lining with the wadding between, and run the edges together. Then lay the shoulder pleats in Fig. 15, and sew through the hood (Fig. 16) on the outer edge along the line as marked for the shirr. Draw through this an elastic cord, the ends of which are fastened at the ends of the shirr. Gather the hood (Fig. 16) from 31 toward both sides to X, and join it to the cape according to the figures on the pattern, after which bind the seam with a narrow strip of silk. On the front of the neck binding sew hooks and eyes for fastening. Finally, trim the cape and hood with ribbon and lace, and with two cashmere bows, which are also trimmed with lace and velvet ribbon.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 35-45.

Suit for Boy from 6 to 8 Years old.

THE trowsers and jacket of this suit are made of dark blue cassimere, cut bias, and bound with black worsted braid. Bronze buttons, put on in the manner shown by the illustration, complete the trimming. Cut the suit from the patterns given for the suit for boy from 8 to 10 years old on page 532, diminishing the size as may be required. The two fronts, which simulate a vest, are of white piqué, and are cut from the pattern given in Fig. 45 of the Supplement. These pieces are sewed to the jacket, and serve to fasten it.

CAPE WITH HOOD FOR CHILD FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 15 and 16.

FROCK FOR CHILD UNDER ONE YEAR OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 31-34.

MY GARDEN.

BOUNDED by the budding clover,
And sentinelled with trees,
Showered with wealthy sun all over,
The home of birds and bees;
It has only clouds to love it,
The winds to be its friends,
Moon and sun to watch above it,
And stars that evening lends;
Kindly morns to wake its flowers,
Still noons to give it gold,
Patron twilights, sunset dowers,
And dews when days are old.
Purple phlox and sunflowers trusty
Guard all its rich estates,
Dandelions, broad and lusty,
Like peasants, crowd its gates.
Violets bloom in corners shady,
And on the borders gay
Sits the stock, a crimson lady,
And pinks have holiday.
Larkspurs leaning out of places
Where bashful myrtles creep,
Laugh at monk-flowers' hooded faces,
And poppies gone to sleep.
There are starched and stately briers,
And thistle-knights and dames;
Bloomless weeds, like jovial friars,
Grasses with ancient names.
Vagrant hops that court the clovers,
Prim lilacs, in a row,
Gaudy beans grown willful rovers,
Grand hollyhocks for show.
Quaint, bright pansies, foxgloves stately,
Lilies with petals wide,
Jasmine tinted delicately,
And daisies, merry-eyed.
I am queen and lady in it—
Queen over leaf and flower—
Crowned with sprays of purple spinnet,
I own no higher power.
Teems the world with fears and sorrows;
For me, I have no care!
My good realm excludes to-morrows,
And all I want is there.
Where such gold as sunset treasures,
Or truer friends than flowers?
Such dear dreams, such happy leisure,
And such enchanted hours?
When my life and I are tired
Calling ourselves by name,
When the things we have desired
No longer seem the same;
When the years have weary faces
And heaven is near and fair,
I shall seek its broader spaces,
And find a garden there.

ABUSE OF WOMEN.

THE speaking ill of women is an old habit of writers. French authors, with all the pretended gallantry of their countrymen, have been among the most malicious in this respect. The mocking Voltaire, though tied throughout his long life to the apron-strings of some woman or other, and feeling if not confessing their power, has given the female sex the unkindest cut of all. It is he who has the credit of having said: "Ideas are like beads—men only get them as they advance in life, and women never have them at all." Some claim that the philosopher is innocent of the sting in the tail of this waspish sentence. He, however, is guilty of this: "A woman's soul exhausts itself with a few faint caresses, and a little talk about cards, the weather, a sermon, and the cost of a ribbon." Boileau, another Frenchman, declares that the best epitaph ever composed was this, by one of his countrymen on the death of his wife:

"Here lies my wife; how fine
For her repose and mine!"

This can be capped with an English epigram quite as viperish:

"Here lies my dear wife, a sad vixen and shrew;
If I said I regretted her, I should lie too."

These bitter things could be safely said at a time when men had all the ink-gall to themselves; but now that women are dipping into it, it may be dangerous to continue a game at which the two can play. We all remember the old fable: "See there," said the traveler to a lion, pointing to a statue of a lion strangled by a man, "how strong we are, and how we prevail over even the king of beasts!" The lion replied: "This statue was made by one of you men. If we lions knew how to erect statues, you would see the man placed under the paw of the lion."

Now that women can execute statues, write satires, or perform any feat of art—literary or other—it may be prudent for man to withdraw his paw from the feminine neck, lest his own should suffer from a vindictive and sharper claw. We have been surprised no less at the audacity of man than the forbearance of woman in the frequent attacks of late upon the female sex. Women are charged with all the social evils of the times. Not only are the luxury, the prodigality, the frivolity, the vice and the crime of our age attributed to them, but we are gravely told that they are fast bringing the world to an end by rendering marriage an impossibility. Women do not plead guilty to these preposterous charges; but while confessing to a fair share of fault, they can show that man is at least as guilty as they are. Much of the prodigality of expense—as shown in the big house, the showy furniture, the dashing equipage, and even the costly dress of the wife—is due to the husband. It is a part of his business, the fixtures as it were of his shop, expressly made rich and ornate to give the idea of prosperity. He carries on his trade by means of credit, and this he obtains by assuming the appearance of wealth. If his saloon was not gilded, his sideboard loaded with crystal and plate, and his company dressed in silk and fine broadcloth, there would be no customer to turn a card. Let business become less speculative and dependent upon credit, and there will be less attempt at expensive show. Men will be satisfied with more modest houses and furniture, and plainer wives, whom they will choose, as the Vicar of Wakefield's wife did her wedding-gown, "not for a fine glossy surface, but such qualities as would wear well."

SLEEP.

"BLESSED be he who first invented sleep," says Sancho Panza, and there is certainly nothing which has been bestowed upon us for which we have more reason to be grateful. Let the physiologists define sleep as they may, it is enough for us to know that it is a state of repose by which all our faculties, when wearied, are refreshed and reinvigorated for work.

Regular and natural sleep is essential to a wholesome condition of body and mind. Health is impossible without it, and no sickness possible with it. All diseases are increased, and many are produced, by the want of sleep. Wakefulness is the most common cause of insanity, and sleep the best remedy, as it is also of every bodily disorder.

The celebrated Sydenham said that he would give up the practice of medicine if it were not for opium, so important did he think sleep in the treatment of diseases.

The quantity of sleep required differs greatly. Bonaparte seldom took more than four or five hours of it, but he never lost a moment in the preliminaries; for as soon as he made up his mind to it he fell fast asleep. Seven or eight hours are about the average quantity of sleep needed by persons of middle age. Infants require fifteen hours, or more; children from the age of five to twelve years, twelve hours; and a young adult wants ordinarily about nine. Old age is generally contented with little, but should try to get full six hours at least of sound sleep.

Some people, when sufficiently fatigued, will sleep under any circumstance, however unfavorable to repose. During the retreat of Sir John Moore many of his soldiers were observed to be slumbering when marching erect. Benjamin Franklin tells us that he slept a whole hour while swimming on his back.

Sir John Sinclair, who made some curious researches in regard to longevity, says that the very aged people whose habits he investigated differed in most respects, but resembled each other in being all long and sound sleepers. He himself, who lived to be an octogenarian, was never satisfied with less than eight full hours of sleep. Jeremy Taylor is reported to have slept but three hours, and it is, therefore, not surprising that he died at the comparatively early age of fifty. Frederick the Great and John Hunter were short sleepers, like Bonaparte, and none of them were very long lived.

Hufeland, in his work on the "Art of Prolonging Life," says that no one should sleep less than six or more than eight hours; and he declares that to secure a sound and wholesome repose one should eat little, and only cold food, for supper, and always some hours before going to bed. When abed, the body should lie in almost a horizontal position, with the exception of the head, which ought to be raised a little. All the cares and burden of the day must be laid aside with one's clothes; none of them must be carried to bed with us. "I am acquainted," adds Hufeland, "with no practice more destructive than that of studying in bed, and of reading till one falls asleep. By these means the soul is put into too great activity, at a period when every thing conspires to allow it perfect rest; and it is natural that the ideas thus excited should wander and float through the brain during the whole night. It is not enough to sleep physically; man must sleep also spiritually. Such a disturbed sleep is as insufficient as its opposite—that is, when our spiritual part sleeps, but not our corporeal; such, for example, as sleep in a jolting carriage on a journey."

Some people have the idea that it is equally well to sleep in the day as the night. This is a mistake. There is a natural harmony between the body and the revolution of the earth which can not be disturbed with impunity. The light of the sun indicates the proper time for work, as its obscurity does that for repose. The sleep during the day is never as refreshing as that of the night; and a single hour of the former is sufficient often to destroy the whole repose of the latter. The practice of taking a short nap in the daytime is not only apt to render a person restless all night, but predisposes him to certain congestive diseases of a serious character.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Miss Kitty Clover.

MY DEAR KITTY—Or rather my sweet Kitty, for that is what the song says, and that is what my heart feels—I came out of the house this beautiful spring morning, almost the only one that has been beautiful, for the season has been a prolonged and bitter easterly storm, and as I stepped briskly along the street under the trees that are now in full leaf I heard the sound of a hand-organ, which is always a fascinating and suggestive sound to me, and as I slackened my pace and listened I heard—not the follies of the Grand Duchesse and the Traviata, nor even the passionate strains of the Trovatore, but the dear, old, delicious Duc de Reichstadt's waltz. Do you know it, or is it entirely too ancient for you? Do you ever find yourself humming—as I do myself—te-tum, te-tum, te-tum, te-idittiddy, and as you involve yourself in the spell of your own music do you see those wonderful figures of other days floating airy about in the early waltz at Newport and Rockaway and Saratoga, at a time when Mrs. Tilbury wore bibs at table, and Mrs. Stanhope rode in the predecessors of perambulators, and old Mrs. Pound was young Miss Flora Penny, and skies were bluer and roses redder, te-tum, te-tum, te-idittiddy!

My dear, forgive me; of course you remember nothing of the kind, and you gaze compassionately with your mind's eye upon this garrulous old gossip of a Bachelor, who can not hear a miserable hand-organ grinding out a waltz upon a spring morning, when all well-regulated persons are going rapidly to their business, without dreaming dreams and seeing visions in his ridiculous and romantic brain, and murmuring of the lovely Flora as if there were any lovely trace of the Penny in that tough old Mrs. Pound, to whom he carried a slopping plate of hot terrapin at the last ball at which they met, and at which the music perpetually went te-tum, te-tum, te-idittiddy.

For it does go so, my sweet Kitty; and when it goes, away goes—not my heel, but my head. I spin in a maze of memory. I waltz away, away back into the Past, as you and Ned Turquoise gallop far and far down the room at Delmonico's. The difference is, that when you get to the other end of your dance you see about the same people and the same toilettes with which you started; but I—ma foi! as they say in the French Vaudevilles—I find myself among other people, and among dresses that shall be worn no more except by your grandchildren, sweet Kitty, as you are now wearing those of your grandmother. Your Great Aunt Josephine had her skirts about as meagre as yours, and your waist can not rise so high that it will get above hers. But she did not do one thing that you do, and there are sage people who say that your grandchildren will not do what you do—that is, waltz. And as I came out into the brilliant morning and heard the organ, and my memory went te-tum te-idittiddy, it took a turn toward you, my dear, and I recalled your question last winter at Mrs. Stanhope's, whether I advised you to waltz, or to dance quadrilles only—a question which I was just about answering when young Ruby slid up and said, "One turn, Miss Kitty;" and away you went, answering yourself.

There are a great many grave and good people who do not like to see young women waltzing. Some of them used to say to me, and indeed do say to me now, "Mr. Bachelor, if you had a daughter should you wish to see her encircled by the arm of Mr. Cesar Borgia, and whirled by him to the strains of intoxicating music in the delirious dance?" If I had a daughter—that is the proposition upon which I always pause before answering. What I think of would not interest you, dear Kitty. What little picture I suddenly see, as when Enoch Arden or Wakefield looked out of the night into their own homes, I will not trouble you by telling. If I had a daughter. If I were King, thought Sancho Panza. Well, the truth is, that I always answer the question in one way. I deny straightway the intoxication aforesaid and the delirium, and I urge the argumentum ab homine. I say: "Sir or Madame, when I was younger, when these old boots were dancing shoon, I was very sensitive to music, I delighted in dancing. I have waltzed a thousand times with a wilderness of lovely girls, and I thought, felt, said, and did nothing which any youth may not think, feel, say, and do with any daughter of mine—if I had a daughter."

Then the grave and good people say to me, "That is all very well for you; we can trust you; but how about Cesar Borgia, or young Lovelace? Shall they waltz with our daughters?" Your mother asks me, "Shall I suffer Kitty to be in the arms of Lovelace?" To this I have but one reply: "Madame, if you are unwilling to have Kitty waltz with Borgia or Lovelace because they are immoral young men, why are you willing that they should visit her, or walk or talk with her, or dance quadrilles with her? Why, my dear Mrs. Clover, why do you not begin at the beginning, and say that Mr. Borgia and Mr. Lovelace can not be allowed to know Kitty at all? I do not ask nor expect that she shall receive all persons who may wish to know her; but if you admit Messrs. Borgia and Lovelace to your house and to your social circle, I do not see why they should not be allowed to join in all the usual entertainments of that circle. Now dancing and waltzing are ordinary social amusements, and I do not think there is any good reason for forbidding them to Kitty unless you disapprove of them altogether."

That is the way in which I talk with your mother, my dear Kitty. And that seems to me to be the good sense of the matter. If you have scruples, as some people have, about dancing at all, just as Quakers have about singing, then of course you will not dance with any body. But if dancing seems to you, as it does to me, quite as innocent as any other amusement, then I would not refine too much upon the various kinds of the usual dance. It seems to me that the Quakers, the strict ones I mean, such as we seldom now see, must have lost a great deal of honest pleasure. I do not mean it, however, in the sense of the remark of Mr. Silenus to my friend Peter Paul Pry in his youth. For when the young Pry was invited by old Silenus to take a glass of brandy he declined, saying that he never drank brandy, nor in fact any thing. And when his tempter proposed a cigar, Pry replied that he never smoked. The astonished Silenus then suggested a cup of coffee as a compromise, and was told by Pry that he never drank coffee.

"What!" then cried the jolly old gentleman. "You don't drink liquor or coffee, and don't smoke. Good Heavens! how you do lose life!"

I say that is not the way in which I suppose the Quakers lost it. But imagine life with music, painting, and gaiety subtracted! Imagine, my dear Kitty, a theory of life that reduces it to the angularity and bareness of mathematics! Now it is with dancing, it seems to me, as with music and painting and poetry. There is music which is trivial, and painting which is bad, and poetry which is horrible. Do we therefore renounce them all? There may be dancing which is disgusting—go and see most public dancing and tell me if it is not so—but why should that disturb the pleasure of dancing which is not so? I declare, my dearest Kitty, that when I used to waltz with Miss Flora Penny we seemed to sail through space to the soft impulse of melody, and I pitied George Fox because of the range of sweet human emotion of which he knew and could know nothing whatever. If any body who was stepping through the quadrille suggested to me that the waltz was highly indecorous, I smiled serenely and floated on. Some day when I am at your house I will find the passage in De Quincey in which he speaks of the dance as every imaginative and susceptible person feels.

And, indeed, as society is now organized, the dancers seem to me to have all the fun. I suppose the distinction of talking men and of dancing men is still maintained; but unless you have some particular reason for talking with a particular youth—unless, that is to say, there is some little flirtation going on, and I mean nothing very dreadful by the word, nothing more fearful than the soft irritation of the bark in spring—and if you have a quick ear for music and a natural fondness for dancing mere talking is mere waste of time. I know the talking men, Kitty—I mean the talking men of your time—but they do not shine in the ball-room. The music overpowers them. They are unconsciously distracted by the excitement of the scene. If your ear and heart are allured by the music they know it, and they cease to struggle. Only a lover could contend with the siren of sound and motion. Every other man thinks of Maud:

"All night have the roses heard

The flute, violin, bassoon;

All night has the casement jasmine stirr'd

To the dancers dancing in tune."

And he knows that is a spell which only lovers can resist; and a spell which only deepens their romance of feeling. For

"—the soul of the rose went into my blood
As the music clashed in the hall."

So, my dear Kitty, you see how lax I am, and that I can not join the outcry against the waltz. Perhaps my notions are a little sublimated. Perhaps my long years have made me less suspicious. But those notions are pretty sturdy, and my experience is mature. I have observed, also, that those who are most seriously opposed to this enjoyment are those who have a poor ear for music, or who are very poor performers in the dance. Perhaps you will reply that you have observed its defenders to be those who have a good musical ear and who dance well. Very well; they certainly ought to know.

And this morning, as I went on down street, leaving behind me the hand-organ grinding out-the Duc de Reichstadt's waltz, and my brain and heart te-tum te-idditted back to the bright old days when the world was touched with the softest bloom of hope, and I remembered the dear friends and the lovely faces and the hearty words which made the bright old days so dear, I did not think the world had grown cold and dark, nor believe that all beauty and charm faded with my youth—no, no; but my heart was so freshened, like an old picture when you pass a sponge over it, that, having begun by giving the organ-grinder a shilling in coppers, I celebrated the happy day by giving a little "currency" to every beggar I met, and interceded for the porter of a friend into whose counting-room I dropped, and came round to bed-time, I verily believe, a better man for having heard the Duc de Reichstadt's waltz in the morning.

So choose your partner, sweet Kitty Clover, but be sure he is not

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MOURNING DRESS GOODS.

A NEW material for mourning dresses is called Byzantine, a capricious name that conveys no idea of the goods. It resembles châlè in appearance, but is thinner and is not too glossy for fresh mourning. It is sold at $4 a yard, and is two yards wide. From four to six yards are bought for a dress. A kind of silk grenadine introduced this season is called Florentine. It is very thin and lustrous, and is stronger than the ordinary grenadine. A good quality three quarters of a yard wide is sold at $1 25 a yard; but the best quality is eight quarters wide, worth $4. Hernani is another name for the popular iron grenadine. It has square meshes, is all pure silk, and is commendable for its durability and soft black color. Canvas grenadine is similar to this, but the meshes are larger, and there is some wool in the fabric. It is three-quarters of a yard wide, and is worth $1 50 a yard. Crape Morette is a thin material with crape finish, sold at $1 25 a yard. It is not new, but is stylish, and much sought after. When two yards wide the price varies from $1 50 to $2 50.

Ladies wearing mourning have objected to purchasing thin black goods, saying they found them of most perishable fabric and but little cooler than thick materials. This was true of the old-fashioned barèges, but the wiry grenadines with open meshes are very durable, and make cool and pleasant dresses. They are now the staple article for summer wear, both in mourning and in colors.

MATERIALS FOR SUITS.

French bombazine has a silk warp, and is consequently much lighter than the all-wool English goods, and is preferred for warm weather. Street suits for fresh mourning are made of it, trimmed with folds of crape or a thick cord covered with bombazine. Parisienne and Tamise cloth are soft woolen materials of light quality suitable for short dresses. Woolen serge is very much admired, but is difficult to obtain. The lustreless silk serge is the newest fabric for street suits, and is preferred by many to the more expensive gros grains. The price is $2 75 a yard. Gros grains range from $2 50 to $6. The popular price is $3.

HOUSE DRESSES.

Solid black foulard silks for house dresses are shown at $1 a yard. For lighter mourning the grounds are varied with white stars, crosses, dots, stripes, and sprays of flowers. Since English mixtures of wool and cotton have become so cheap black lawns and calicoes are but little used. It is customary to sell the Balmoral goods and Australian cloths in patterns at $5 or $6 the dress. Scotch ginghams of clear white, crossed with black bars or gray and black mottled grounds, make neat house dresses. Many ladies are buying them for short traveling dresses. They are from 37½ to 50 cents a yard.

LIGHTER MOURNING.

Black grenadines with gray dashes on the surface, or with white set figures, are selected for half mourning. At one house are grenadine barèges, black with white satin stripes, varying from an eighth of an inch to two inches in width, marked at the low price of seventy-five cents a yard. Solid black iron grenadines are trimmed with white or lavender, producing a beautiful effect. Lavender foulards with deep purple spots are admired. A white foulard has large polka dots in black. Silver-gray pongees and poplins of silk and linen, or of silk and worsted, are serviceable for street dresses trimmed with folds of black gros grain and thick fringe. Chené serge of mottled black and white is a novelty offered at $1 50. Dark granites and gray mohairs are sixty cents a yard, and look well with black binding and braid. A kind of winsey sold at fifty cents makes up well. It is a white ground with rough black cords.

UNDER-SKIRTS.

Petticoats of black moreen and of mohair are useful, as they may be worn with a variety of dresses or used as the lower skirt of a suit. They should be trimmed simply with wide braid and a pleated flounce. After the first mourning is laid aside striped skirts are admissible. Black and lavender or lead-colored stripes are more suitable than the black and white now so much used by ladies not in mourning. White cambric skirts with fluted ruffles edged with black are sold at $5. Lavender mohair striped with white is worn for half mourning.

STYLES AND TRIMMINGS.

The goods we have mentioned are made into both trained dresses and short suits. The styles are similar to those described for colors. Good taste always suggests simplicity of attire for mourning. Such trimmings as gathered ruffles and puffs are too fanciful. Box-pleated flounces, ruffles with the pleats all turned one way, quillings, fluting, folds, worsted braid, and heavy cord fringes are the most appropriate trimmings. All trimmings are now sewn on straight around the skirt and near the edge, instead of being arranged in curves and squares. A single fold of the material, two inches wide and piped with gros grain, is used for suits. For widow's mourning a thick cord at the edge of the skirts and mantle is sufficient ornament. A stylish fit, good material, and the absence of superfluous ornament combine to make black a tasteful and becoming dress.

SHAWLS AND MANTLES.

Suits are so universally worn that but few mantles are imported. Square grenadine shawls, with fringe, or hemmed, or bordered with crape, are chosen for elderly ladies. Thibet cloth and grenadine are made into mantles. A pretty fashion for both these materials is a loose sleeveless sacque, with a deep cape in front, falling into long scarfs at the back, loosely tied together. Another is merely a large double talma, trimmed with a wide quilling of the grenadine.

BONNETS AND VEILS.

English crape bonnets are made at all seasons of the year for the deepest mourning. The favorite shape is a large fanchon, covered with two thicknesses of the crape. The trimming consists of folds and pleats at the back and on the diadem. The fall over the chignon, now so fashionable, is made of crape folds that extend toward the front, forming strings. On other bonnets the crape strings are wide, and edged with a notched ruche. A mantilla veil of Brussels net, trimmed with crape folds, draping the chignon and shoulders, is very effective.

Only widows wear white caps inside the bonnet. These should at first be made of tarlatan, reaching merely across the forehead, without framing the face. At the end of a year the tarlatan puff may be exchanged for a white tulle ruche. The strings should be of black crape. Silk ribbon is not considered deep mourning. A crape bag for concealing the hair is sometimes attached to the bonnet.

Black tulle and Brussels net are worn by ladies who wish to lay aside crape, but are not willing to put on lace. Very young ladies wear white flowers on black bonnets. Purple is more becoming to older persons. Lavender and black lace bonnets are the lightest mourning. A few jet and steel ornaments are still worn.

English crape, forty inches wide, is required for veils. The best houses prefer the crape that is imported in rolls, as that brought in boxes has a fold in the middle that falls directly in front. Take two yards of the crape, and turn up the hem a quarter of a yard deep at each end. This veil is thrown over the bonnet, and pinned with jet pins. If the gathered veil is preferred, a yard and three-quarters is required. At one end half a yard is turned up for a hem. This style is now made for widows, instead of doubling the crape. It is cooler for summer. For very slight mourning a round veil, with long tabs, is made of Brussels net, trimmed with crape folds.

Widows' caps for young ladies are small squares of white tarlatan, worn with a point over the forehead, like the Marie Stuart cap. The head-piece has four small tufts each way through the centre. A narrow quilling or plain folds form the border. They are held on by an elastic under the back hair, or with tarlatan strings tied in a bow under the chin. After the first year Lyons tulle is substituted for tarlatan. Ladies more advanced in years wear the regular cap with bag crown.

COLLARS, ETC.

Collars are made double of the crape, slightly pointed in front, and bordered with a half-inch band of crape ornamented with four rows of stitching. Many persons prefer black grenadine for collars instead of crape, as it does not turn brown, and is cooler. It is arranged in shell-shaped scallops and folds. Under-sleeves have wide, square cuffs very large at the wrist, trimmed to match the collar. Tarlatan and organdy are the materials for white collars. A plain, folded tie of white tarlatan or of muslin, similar to those worn by gentlemen, is selected for widows. Linen collars with black borders stitched on are suitable for mourning. The sailor shape, deeply pointed at the sides, is pretty for young ladies, with a grenadine neck-tie held by a jet ring.

Handkerchiefs of sheer linen are bordered with black two inches deep, covering the whole hem. This is newer than the black band above the hem. Lavender borders are shown for half mourning.

Marie Antoinette fichus of white tarlatan and of organdy are trimmed with two narrow folds, or a pleated ruffle or ruche. These are inexpensive, and are exceedingly pretty with a black dress. They are also made of tulle, of Brussels net, and of guipure, to be worn over lavender and purple. Sleeveless jackets with sashes made of these materials make the plainest toilettes look dressy. Lace bows at the throat, the chemise russe, guipure paletots, and the bretelles illustrated in former Numbers of the Bazar, serve to break the monotony of mourning clothing, and are not expensive when made at home by skillful fingers.

PARASOLS, GLOVES, AND SHOES.

Parasols of Turk satin and of soft, dead black poult de soie are lined with black and trimmed with three folds of English crape set on as a border. The carved ebony handles are flat and broad. For lighter mourning three quilled ruffles surround the edge, and the lining is of white and lavender.

Kid gloves with two buttons at the wrist are selected for fresh mourning. Silk gloves with a kid finish are sometimes preferred. They are neatly made, and ornamented on the back with a silk lacing, at the end of which are tassels capped with silver. Black and purple kids are embroidered on the back with white for light mourning.

Cloth and glove-kid gaiters without tips are buttoned with onyx and jet. The heels are concaved, and are sometimes covered with cloth.

JEWELRY.

The handsomest mourning jewelry is of onyx, made in the styles now fashionable for coral, formed of solid balls and bars, arranged in circles and crescents with pear-shaped pendants. Sets of this kind without any gold visible are sold at $50. Tiny diamonds and pearls are sometimes set in the centre of the balls. Another style is a plain flat surface of onyx made round, with a monogram or initial carved in the centre. The surface is left a dead black without lustre, and the old English letters are brightly polished. The monogram is sometimes made in gold. A deep gray stratum of the onyx is shown at the edge as a border. For half-mourning, gold, onyx, and black enamel together are made in Oriental patterns. Shell cameos are massively set in jet. An elegant set at $75 consists of a pin, ear-rings, and bracelet. The unpolished jet centre represents a beautiful female head set in a glossy jet border.

Onyx buttons for sleeves and dress-fronts are made to match. Chatelaines are made of large jet links. Wide jet necklaces and crosses, to be worn around the neck with a lustrous ribbon, are admired for young ladies. Bandeaux and combs of carved jet are shown.

Thanks are due Messrs. W. JACKSON; MYERS; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; A. T. STEWART & Co.; Miss PAGE; and BROWNE & SPAULDING.

PERSONAL.

COMMANDER RALPH CHANDLER, of the Navy, has just returned from a nine months' cruise in the Gulf and West Indies. Com. CHANDLER is the officer who first had the "gumption" successfully to destroy miasma on board ship by closing up all the hatches, dead-lights, etc., and subjecting his ship to such a steam as war-vessel never had before. There was no more yellow-fever on board. The experiment was so complete a success that the Secretary of the Navy—nice old gentleman—wrote a very complimentary little letter about it; but Com. C. has received so much of "that sort of thing, you know," that it don't keep him awake o' nights.

They tell a little anecdote of Captain Baron von RESTORFF, of the first regiment of Prussian Hussars at Berlin. He was to be married to a young American lady, but the nuptial ceremony was delayed for a couple of hours in consequence of the noble bridegroom having been arrested for debt at the instance of his shoemaker and other clamorous creditors. The parents of the girl did not find out what the whole fuss was about until the wedding was over. RESTORFF paid the shoemaker, and put the rest off.

The wedding robe worn by "Mrs." MURAT, wife of Prince ACHILLE MURAT, is said to have cost $6000. The annual pin-money of this agreeable woman is $50,000, and among her wedding-gifts was a palace, the only acceptable little trifle her brother could think of.

In many respects ex-President FILLMORE is one of the happiest, certainly one of the happiest-looking, of those public men, who, having enjoyed the highest distinction attainable in a republic, retires gracefully from the arena of strife, and glides down the hill of life pleasantly and gracefully. A letter from Buffalo thus describes him: "I saw, on Delaware Avenue the other day, a carriage leisurely driven up past the Club House, and out of it descended one of the handsomest men I had seen for a long time. He waved his hand to a pleasant-looking lady within, and she continued up the avenue, while he, at a gentleman's pace, walked down it. He was MILLARD FILLMORE; the lady was his wife. For a politically dead man, he was a fine-looking corpse. His hair was equally, smoothly white and perfect, and its contrast was pale as snow to the clearness of his eyes and complexion. He had the robustness of a politician, all the distinguished public servant's duplicity of throat, a neck and shoulders like a Champagne bottle, and that benignity of expression which seems compounded of a lawyer's shrewdness and a retired and satisfied statesmanship. He looked like a cask of brown sherry, quietly ripening, which the country tasted and put away for the next generation. His height and his courtly complacency, and the way he put out his feet, reminded me of LOUIS PHILIPPE after his abdication, conscious that he had been a king, and that every body was contented to let him disown. Fine-looking mediocrity that he was, I was glad to see this honored home-guard well married, well pleased, his appetite still good for dinner, and the memory of himself for dessert."

The quaint ways of notable writers in committing their thoughts to paper have often been made the subject of diverting paragraphs. For the first time we are told, by Mr. SALA, the curious habit of THACKERAY, "who never began upon less than a quire of letter-paper. Half of this he would cover with comic drawings; a fourth he would tear into pieces; and on the two or three slips of the remainder he would do his work, walking about the room at intervals with his hands in his pockets, and with a perturbed and wobegone expression of countenance."

According to the London Lancet the question of choosing a woman to fill a chair in the obstetric section of the Academy of Medicine, is being considered, and the chief midwife of the Maternité Hospital will probably be elected. Madame ALLIOTT, the present incumbent of the office is a woman of profound knowledge and great experience, and an honored co-worker with the most enlightened medical gentlemen of Paris.

Queens do things in our day that would have been looked upon as any thing but queenly a few years back. The Queen of Spain has sold her necklace to Madame MUSARD for £24,000. The Ex-Queen of Naples has followed her example by selling a pearl and diamond necklace to an Anonyma for £15,000—a necklace consisting of a series of medallions set with pearls of immense size, each medallion being connected by chains of diamonds.

PATTI has appeared in a new rôle in Paris, viz.: as passer of the plate, or bag, at a great church ceremonial—the recent Mass of Prince PONIATOWSKI, sung at the Church of St. Eustache, in aid of the poor. PATTI was one of the fifteen lovely and distinguished quêtesuses, who carried around the velvet, gold-embroidered money-bags for the collection. An enormous sum was contributed. Among her associates were the Princesse DE METTERNICH, Madame PONIATOWSKI, and Madame WALEWSKI, the last-named exciting the liveliest admiration, "robed in green velvet and sable, a mantle of golden hair streaming from beneath her chignon to her waist." This is great company, indeed, for the little girl whom we recollect so well, singing at MAURICE STRAKOSCH's concerts when she was scarcely taller than the piano; and a wonderful success for a soprano voice; but then marquises are not always happy, and the noblesse of France rests not on the surest of foundations. Mademoiselle NILSSON, the beautiful Swede, whose Ophelia in the new Opera of Hamlet has created so decided a sensation in Paris, will make a yet more brilliant match if she catches GUSTAVE DORÉ, for although the artist is not yet doré with a title, his rank is higher than that of any French nobleman of them all.

The EMPEROR OF BRAZIL has no sons, but two daughters, the eldest of whom, aged twenty-two, is married to the Count D'EU, son of the Duke DE NEMOURS, and grandson of LOUIS PHILIPPE. Should the Emperor persist in his intention to abdicate it is supposed that this daughter will succeed to the throne.

Few clergymen have been more noted, in the United States, as "revival" preachers than President FINNEY. The Rev. ALBERT BARNES, whose opinion of men and things religious is, perhaps, as worthy of respect as that of any writer of the time, has recently given the following sketch of Mr. F.:

"He had been a lawyer, and would have been distinguished as a lawyer, if he had continued to pursue that profession. Not always safe in his theological opinions, and not having been trained to great thoroughness in theological learning, he was nevertheless a man of great power, in showing to men the danger of false hopes; in setting forth the real nature of religion; in driving men from their subtleties and refuges of lies; in proclaiming the terrors of the law and the fearfulness of the world to come; in laying open to men the delusions of their own hearts; and, above all, in proclaiming the majesty of God and the greatness of eternal things, and in making all things else dwindle to nothingness before the Eternal One and the eternal world. Few men in our country have been as well fitted to act on the higher order of minds, or to bring men, proud in their philosophy or their own righteousness, to the foot of the Cross."

ALEXANDRE DUMAS is noted as much for pluck as for talent, and permits no man to belittle the literary profession. Not long since, when a great person proposed to him a literary labor, as a man who ought to be encouraged, he replied: "I am not a man who wants to be encouraged; I am a man who wants to be paid."

The POPE is a wag. Lately, when the French Minister went to call, he took occasion to ask a favor of His Holiness, which the latter did not wish to grant. To close the conversation he rose and gave his blessing to the Ambassador and his wife, who was present, saying, "I bless Providence with all my heart for having sent here, to represent that France which I so well love, a man like you." Here the two bowed, as is customary. The Pope stopped a moment to give them time to breathe in the incense, and then added: "For never has the representative of any nation tried my patience as much as you have."

When Mr. DISRAELI retires from the Premiership it is supposed that the Queen will make him a Knight of the Garter, a distinction usually conferred upon members of royal families and the higher nobility. Mr. PITT was the only other commoner who was offered this honor, and he, greatly to his sovereign's disappointment, declined to accept it.

It is not often that successful journals are originated in the parlors of prime ministers, and made to pay under the management of clever young members of the aristocracy. Such, however, has been the case with The Owl, which at one time made considerable talk in London. The when, the how, and by whom started are thus revealed by the London Bookseller:

At about midnight one Saturday some gentlemen were standing in the recess of a window in Lady PALMERSTON's drawing-room, and were busily talking together. Lord PALMERSTON came up to them, and asked what it was about which they were deliberating. Somebody answered that they were considering the possibility of establishing a new paper, in which his lordship and whatever was to be found in her ladyship's drawing-room—love, marriage, and diplomacy—should be heartily quizzed. "What next?" Lord PALMERSTON is represented as saying. "A conspiracy in my own house! You owls!" So the establishment of the new paper having been decided on, Lord PALMERSTON's term of reproach suggested a title, and on the same night, at the St. James Club, the distribution of parts for the first Number was made. There was no thought of profit, so the financial arrangements were soon made, and a small news-vendor was installed as publisher. Among the early contributors were Messrs. BORTHWICK and LAURENCE OLIPHANT, the Hon. EVELYN ASHLEY, Lord PALMERSTON's private secretary, Lord HOUGHTON, MAX SCHLESINGER, ODO RUSSELL, and the Hon. E. PONSONBY. Its deep insight into all impending marrying and giving in marriage in high life procured for The Owl celebrity and expensive advertisements, so that it was at once pecuniarily successful; and it was successful in another sense by reason of its wit and humor. But PALMERSTON died; the contributors were scattered, some going to India, some to Canada—leaving the kingdom on which the sun never sets—and the paper ceased to be what it had been. The editor of the Morning Post, however, who was one of the founders, stuck to it, and it is still profitable to its owners, though the public calls it dull.

Sack for Girl from 12 to 14 Years old.

THIS sack is made of light gray ladies' cloth, cut bias, and is bound and trimmed with narrow folds of gray satin, which are stitched on with white silk. Buttons of gray satin in front, at the sides, and on the lappets of the sleeves finish the trimming. The sack is fastened by means of hooks and button-hole stitched loops. Having cut from Figs. 17, 18, 20, 21, and 22 of the Supplement each two pieces, and from Figs. 19 and 23 each one piece, join the back, sides, and front according to the figures on the pattern. Set on the right front a strip of cloth an inch in width, faced with satin and finished with buttons as shown in the pattern; after which join the neck with the collar, which is trimmed with satin folds. Sew up the sleeves from 39 to 40, and from 41 to according to the length desired for the skirt, the pattern not being given of the full length; and on Figs. 6-8 allow also for the hem. Join the breadths according to the figures on the pattern. From 13 to the top, in the back breadths, leave a slit, and hem the edges. Hem the bottom of the skirt two inches wide. The flounce which is set on is about ten inches in width, gathered on the top, and finished at the bottom by a hem an inch in width. For the belt cut from Fig. 9 four pieces, join them in pairs, run the upper edges together, and bind the front of the skirt with the double binding thus formed. Bind the back breadths with a narrow binding, the ends of which are joined to the belt. Through each side of the narrow binding run a string, which is fastened on the front binding and serves to fasten the skirt.

Kitchen Apron.

THIS apron is cut gored, and is wide enough to protect the skirt of the dress. It is buttoned together behind, as shown in the illustration. This apron is also suitable to wear in the garden when gathering fruit or vegetables. The bodice is joined to the belt, and requires neither pins nor strings to fasten it on the upper edge, as a few whalebones hold it in its place. The original is of white and pink striped percale, finished with a large pocket, and trimmed on the outer edge with a percale ruffle. Cut from Figs. 1 and 3 each one piece, from Fig. 2 two equal pieces, and from Fig. 4 the pocket, allowing for hems. Join the pieces cut from Figs. 1 and 2 according to the figures on the pattern; hem the apron on the outer edge, and put on the button and button-hole as shown in the illustration; then take up the darts in the bodice, run pieces of tape on the wrong side for the whalebones, sew on a button and work a button-hole on the ends, and join to the apron as shown by the figures on the pattern. Conceal the seam by a facing on the wrong side, and sew on the ruffle, which consists of a strip of percale about an inch and a half in width, which is gathered on the apron with a cord. Hem on the upper edge the slit cut for the pocket, lay in pleats from \times to \bullet , sew the pocket on the apron as shown by the figures, and finish with a ruffle. Finish the back of the belt with a bow and ends.

Trimnings for Flannel Under-Skirts in Knitting and Crochet.

BOTH these trimmings are of red worsted. The first is knitted; while the second is worked in crochet. They imitate crimped ruffling, and are a pretty finish for the bottom of white or colored flannel skirts. For working the trimming shown in the first illustration cast 36 stitches on steel knitting needles of the requisite fineness. Knit backward and forward in a ribbed design. Each rib counts five rounds, and must appear entirely plain on one side and entirely purled on the other. In order to make the ribs lie in waves, make on one side a narrow plain border. This is done by knitting alternately two rows over the entire number of stitches, and two rows leaving the last three stitches on one side without knitting. Slip the first stitch of every round.

KNITTED FLOUNCE FOR FLANNEL SKIRT.

For the trimming shown in the second illustration make a foundation of requisite length and crochet on this. 1st round.—1 dc. (double crochet) in every foundation stitch. 2d round.—In every stitch of the last round 1 dc. 3d round.—* 1 dc. in the 1st stitch of the last round, 6 dc. in the following stitch, after which take the needle out of the stitch, take up the upper vein of the 1st of these 6 dc., and then the loop of the last dc., and draw the thread through both these loops at once, so that the 6 dc. form a kind of raised figure. Repeat from * to the end of the round. Repeat twice the second and third rounds. This trimming can, of course, be worked in any width. The trimming is seen complete on the illustration of the flannel skirt.

MATERIALS: Canes an inch in circumference, fine twine, copal varnish, black beads.

This cigar holder is made of slender canes or reeds, wound with twine, and lined with pasteboard covered on both sides with tin-foil. The materials are cheap and easily obtained. Begin with the bottom, which is made of canes arranged in the form of a star. Cut two pieces of cane each six inches long, and eight pieces each two and a half inches long. Hollow out the middle of each of the two long pieces on one side to the depth of about one-sixth of an inch; lay the two pieces together, fitting the cut sides, and join them with fine twine, as shown by the illustration. Slope one side of one end of each of the eight remaining pieces so that each two will fit together and form a point, as shown by the illustration. Pierce these eight sloped canes, and also the canes which were previously crossed, at the distance of one-sixth of an inch from the centre; then make a knot on one end of the twine and run the other end through the canes, as shown by the illustration; after which begin the winding, putting the thread around each cane and each point twice, and carrying the thread round and round till the canes are closely covered, winding also each cane separately where the points of joining cease. The illustration shows the central part of the bottom and cover of the full size. For the side, which is seventeen inches in circumference, cut twenty-four pieces of cane, each six inches long, and twelve pieces each five inches long. Pierce the first at the distance of three-fourths of an inch from the ends, and the last at the distance of quarter of an inch; then string all the canes on wire at both ends, arranging them so that a short cane shall always come between two long ones. Each piece is separated from the next by a large black bead, which must be strung on with the canes. Join in the round and begin weaving the rods with twine, which is also arranged in the round. Each strip of the design counts nine rounds. Now join the side to the bottom in such a manner that one of the shorter canes of the side falls upon a cane of the bottom.

a coating of copal varnish, and line the inside of the cover with some material which has been covered with tin-foil, and which is either glued on, or fastened to the canes by means of small brass tacks.

Netted Table Screen.

See illustration, page 533.

MATERIALS: Strong thread, white pasteboard, a horn peg with a screw, a circular piece of metal an inch and a half in diameter, copal varnish, green coloring powder, a mesh half an inch in circumference, a coarse steel knitting needle.

This screen will be found very useful in protecting the contents of dishes from the flies. It is netted of strong thread, stiffened in liquid glue, and coated with green copal varnish. Cast on the mesh with the thread 210 stitches (under edge); join in a round, and work over a coarse knitting needle 52 rounds. Then, in order to narrow toward the top, narrow regularly in every third round.

53d round.—First six stitches netted, then, alternately, two stitches netted together, twelve stitches netted, and, finally, six stitches netted.

56th round.—Alternately two stitches netted together, eleven stitches netted.

The narrowing alternates in this manner, so that the continuation of the work is plain. One row begins with the narrowing and the next with the plain stitches. The number of plain stitches decreases between each narrowing round. After the 77th round follow eight plain rounds. Work the last round (85th) over the larger mesh, after which run the stitches on a thread and tie them closely together. Now dip the netted work in liquid glue, wring it out, and stretch over a dish or frame thirty-eight inches in circumference by seven in height. When dry repeat the process till the screen is quite stiff, after which paste to the lower edge a strip of pasteboard half an inch wide, and in the centre of the top fasten the wooden peg with a screw, which is to be put through the centre of the netting, and afterward through the piece of metal mentioned among the materials, and in which a hole of requisite size has been pierced, and fasten on the inside. Coat the inside and outside of the cover with copal varnish, which has previously been tinted of any color desired—the original is green—and finish around the peg with a rosette of steel beads or ribbon.

Work Bag.

MATERIALS: Brown silk, pasteboard, narrow silk passementerie braid, brown silk tassels, brown silk cord. The arrangement of this bag is very convenient. The under part is of pasteboard with an embroidered cover of brown silk. Cut, first, of pasteboard from Fig. 26 of the Supplement four equal pieces—the sides and for the bottom a four-cornered piece of pasteboard four inches square. For the covering of each of these pieces of pasteboard prepare two equal pieces of brown silk. Having worked four of these pieces in point russe embroidery and half-polka stitch with brown silk twist, join two pieces of silk over each piece of pasteboard, and after this the four sides with each other, and with the bottom in the manner shown by the illustration. Cut next a piece of brown silk, sixteen inches long by seven inches wide, hem down one side an inch and a half wide, and stitch through the middle of this hem so as to form a shirr for a ribbon or cord; after which sew the other side within the pasteboard sides. Finish with the passementerie braid and tassels.

Pin Cushion.

See illustration on page 533.

MATERIALS: White cashmere, scarlet cloth, black velvet, golden yellow silk twist, white bugles and gold beads, black percale, white muslin.

This cushion is of a pretty shape; and the rosette of scarlet leaves on the top gives it an especially elegant appearance. The foundation is a round cushion of about two inches in height by five in diameter. The bottom is of pasteboard, covered on the outside with black percale. The cushion is next made of muslin and filled with dry sand or bran. For the upper cover cut a straight strip of white cashmere, twenty-eight inches in length, by six in width. Fasten this strip at one end, and lay it in in regular pleats, one-fourth of an inch deep, on one side, so that it shall correspond to the form of the foundation, after which sew to the foundation on one side, sewing on the wrong side and afterward turning over the cover. On the other side draw the pleats closely together and sew to the top (centre) of the foundation. Then prepare from Fig. 24 of the Supplement six lappets of scarlet cloth, and ornament these with point russe embroidery and bead-work, arranging the middle part of each lappet in appliqué figure of black velvet. These lappets are sewed on the cushion as shown in the illustration, leaving the cashmere plain under each, and arranging it so as to form a puff between each lappet. Lastly, make the rosette of the scarlet cloth. Cut from Fig. 25 for the outer and second row of leaves nineteen equal pieces, then ten somewhat smaller pieces for the two upper circles. Each of these pieces must be pleated as shown by the dotted lines of Fig. 25, and then arranged bringing \times on \bullet . Take a piece of the material a little over an inch in circumference for the foundation and arrange on this the four rows of leaves, ten in the outer circle, nine in the second, six in the third, and four in the last. The leaves must be sewed on the under side, so that the stitches shall not show.

Linen Bag for Smoked Meat.

See illustration on page 533.

This bag is intended to protect smoked meat from the flies in summer. The material is of coarse, light linen, and is thirty inches in height by fifty inches in width. The bottom of the bag consists of a round piece of linen, inserted. At the distance of ten inches from the bottom run in a hoop, which holds the bag in the proper shape. The upper edge is finished with a hem, through which run a string for closing the bag, and at the distance of four inches from the top work two round holes, through which is brought the rod shown in the illustration. This rod, which is about ten inches in length and an inch in circumference, is provided with two hooks. On the lower one of which the meat is suspended, while the other serves for hanging up the bag and its contents. Instead of the brass rod and hooks a wooden rod and iron hooks may be used.

MISCHIEF-MAKING.

MISCHIEF-MAKING does not end with what more properly deserves the name of slander. A great deal, perhaps the larger part, is accomplished in the world by those who have no deliberate intention of slandering their neighbors; and in this respect, I fear, it must be admitted that women are the greatest offenders, and simply, I believe, for this reason—that, generally speaking, neither their minds nor their time are sufficiently occupied. He whose special business it is to find work for idle hands will assuredly take good care to provide thoughts for idle minds. Was ever a highly-educated and fully-occupied woman found among the ranks of mischief-makers, of this class at least? A strong proof of the truth of the assertion that idleness has much to do with mischief-making may be found in a fact which any one well acquainted with clubs and mess-rooms will be able fully to bear out—namely, that men with much unoccupied time on their hands are not much behind women in the quantity, and very much before them in the quality, of the scandal they spread; only—perhaps for this reason—they are more cautious how and where they repeat it.

The worst part of this kind of mischief-making is that the stories are rarely entirely unfounded. If they were they would do infinitely less harm. But there is generally a certain proportion of truth in them, and it is the "mixing of things" which does the mischief. The fractional part of truth just forms the solid foundation on which the superstructure of falsehood contrives to stand steady. The evil eye goes prying about, and soon succeeds in detecting some flaw in a neighbor's character or conduct; and then its ready handmaid, the evil tongue, sets to work—colors, magnifies, invents, finds motives for actions whose causes are not clear, and the story passes from one to another, gaining something from each fresh transmission, until at last it wears itself out; but not until an impression has been created with respect to the subject of it which will long outlast the story from which it took its rise.

TREASURES OF THE PAST.

Here's shreds of silk and bits of lace and tiny little shoes,
And here's a broken-bladed knife my brother loved to use;
Here's sunny curls that hid blue eyes, rings that on fingers shone,
And books in which the written names are known to me alone.

These all are treasures of the past—links in a golden chain
That binds me to the by-gone years of pleasure and of pain;
I've but to touch a single link, and lo! as in a dream,
A vision sweeps the azure deeps of Memory's magic stream.

And as I stand upon the shore I see on every hand
The footprints of the loved and lost deep in the shining sand;
These all came here, they touched the tide, they sailed across the sea,
And their white hands are beckoning beyond the wave to me.

And if upon the further shore they wait and watch and pray,
Oh! Time, speed swiftly, surely on until the glorious day
Shall dawn in Time's blue horizon when I shall with them stand,
And, having passed the gates of pearl, shall reach the Happy Land.

Here's silks and laces, shoes and rings, and curls and books and all,
And each some beauty long since fled, some olden grace recall:
Oh! Love, keep well the sacred spell, hold guard my heart within,
And keep the sacred flame alight, above the soil of sin.

THE PURPLE MERINO DRESS.

"LINDA NEWHALL, I want a new merino."

"What good would a new merino do you here?" queried the young girl addressed, as she pointed to the wide prairie-fields, now covered with a light garment of snow. "A new merino! I would as soon ask for a shroud."

"Nevertheless, I do want a new dress, a merino, of a rich, warm purple. I think I could cut it myself from one of my last year's patterns, and I've a plenty of very passable velvet and bugle trimming that don't look so faded but what a little pains and new surroundings would make it quite respectable. I've been looking in the glass nearly half an hour, fancying how I would fashion it, until I actually saw the sparkle of the beads and the rich tint of the merino. I wonder if it would be wrong to pray for it?"

"Nonsense, Hattie," laughed her sister. "For my part I don't much care whether I ever see a new dress; there's nobody here to notice it or to admire you, no matter how well you look. John Roe might condescend to say, 'Law, Miss Newhall! when he comes over for milk, and young Randall would perhaps cast a few extra sheep's eyes, but that is all. There is nobody worth pleasing in this outlandish place.'"

"My dear, you are talking of the Great West, remember," laughed Hattie.

"I dare say it's good enough for those who like it, and I suppose I should be contented if we had a few neighbors like the friends we have been accustomed to."

"But we haven't, dear, and so let's make the best of it. Let us enjoy this blazing fire, and trim over our old dresses, though I do want a purple merino—such a one as Milly Stone had last year."

"Milly Stone," murmured Linda; "how far back in the past she seems! And yet it is only eleven months since papa failed, and we came out here. I wonder if Milly is married? Horace Blanchard was in her train, if I remember rightly: the one that you liked so well."

"That's the truth," laughed Hattie. "I never shall forget that last party; how little we looked forward to this. Horace was magnificent that night, and if I had had the slightest chance I should have fallen in love with him, no doubt. What an elegant man he was, and what would he think to see us in such a place as this! It's not bad, though—it's a great, glorious, boundless country—I love it, though I do get weary and lonely. Who knows, Lind, but papa may be a millionaire yet?"

"And he hasn't got money enough to buy either of us a new dress," retorted Linda.

"He uses all his money in farming, and is not yet 'forehanded' enough, as they say, to spend a penny in clothes. That will all come in good time, no doubt. Curious! I dreamed of Horace last night—we seemed to be together in a great picture-gallery. What a glorious array of costly paintings stretched from wall to wall! Well, we shall probably never meet in this world; and perhaps he is married, though let us hope not to Milly Stone, who would be a mere fashionable appendage, with a heart corresponding to her name—let us trust that he has found a better fate. There are some women I could resign him to."

The two girls were very busy in the wide apartment of the roomy log-house which they called their own. There was no paper on the walls, no carpet on the floor: but against the rough plastering hung several fine engravings, which they had managed to save from the wreck of their fortunes; and a few oil-paintings, which were the work of their own fair hands in more prosperous days. A huge four-post bedstead, with calico curtains, took up one corner of the room. A few pine chairs, a home-made dressing-table, two small lounges—also of home manufacture, and a number of braided mats completed the furnishing of the humble room. Hattie had put the finishing touches upon the bed, which resembled an immense, plump pin-cushion; and Linda had touched every thing with the long feathers of the duster, an article of luxury seldom seen in the midst of such rude surroundings. The girls were both handsome, but Hattie was the most attractive. There was a softness in her dark eyes, a delicacy of expression very rare. One would have thought she might be the most discontented of the two with her present lot.

Mr. Newhall had been a Philadelphia merchant, and his children had always been accustomed to luxury and the cream of metropolitan society. His beautiful house on Chestnut Street had for years been the resort of the good and the gifted, as well as the fashionable and wealthy. It was a great change from halls of beauty and plenty to the uncultivated West and a cabin built of logs. The girls had their choice—their mother had long been dead—to remain with relatives who would gladly have cared for them, or accompany their father, and they chose the latter, quite undaunted by all the stories of the hardships of frontier life to which they were forced to listen. Some books and a few choice pictures were transported thither—birds and flowers came in their turn. These were followed by Linda's piano and Hattie's harp, though the two instruments remained for months unpacked.

"And now, if you are through, Linda, we'll go down and see how Gretchen, as she calls herself, is getting along." As she said this Hattie drew a screen before the fire, and the sisters went below stairs. Gretchen was a large-limbed, sturdy-faced German girl, with a red daub on either cheek, suggestive of rude health, and black eyes that were almost cruel in their sharpness. She had just finished mopping up the floor and sprinkling the mats about—there were at least two dozen of them. In an immense fire-place a pleasant crackling sounded, and the huge blaze sent its yellow and crimson forked tongues up the wide chimney, and roared with a jolly cheeriness whenever the wind grew fierce. Here were chairs and tables in plenty. A bed, covered from sight by a curtain, stood on one side—four very small windows let in the light, and sometimes the snow; but taken all together the room wore an air of comfort and even refinement, for there stood the harp and piano side by side, and the fair fingers that used them knew also how to wield the implements of household labor.

Gretchen came in and hung the kettle on the fire. Turning to go out, she put her arms akimbo, as she cried,

"And there comes Bob!"

"The only gentleman within ten miles," echoed Linda; "we're always glad to see Bob, though his milk score is awful."

The "gentleman" came in—a pale, tall boy of fourteen, whose blue eyes kindled up at sight of the sisters.

"They say there's an accident over in the Hollow," he remarked, as they dealt out his pint of milk. "Henche's man told me—the train broke down at nine this morning, seven miles below; they repaired, and have been seven hours getting to the Hollow. I believe they've sent the engine back; but the people will have to wait eight or ten mortal hours in the snow."

"I thought I missed the signal this morning," said Hattie. "Is it a large train?"

"Six cars, and all full," replied the boy. "I'm going over there as soon as I get back. I'd make a speculation if I had any thing to do it with," he added, as he left the house.

"Saying there are fifty in a car, that makes three hundred people, all hungry," said Hattie, thoughtfully.

"What are you thinking of, Hattie? Come, help me set the table; papa will be in soon, and I rather fancy he is hungry too."

"How far is it to the Hollow?" asked Hattie.

"Papa says half a mile: it always seemed like a mile to me," Linda replied, bringing out a small pile of crockery.

"It can't be much more than half a mile. This is the nearest house—the Waters may hear of it, but they never think of any body but themselves. The snow is not deep enough for runners; wheels would get along very comfortably, don't you think so, Linda?"

"For pity's sake what are you talking about?" asked Linda, more and more perplexed, as she stood rubbing sundry creases out of the white table-cloth.

"What do they charge a cup for coffee at the eating-saloons in cities—ten cents, don't they?"

"Ten cents—coffee! Hattie, what in the world ails you?" queried Linda, impatiently.

"Hush, Lind, I'm calculating; don't disturb the circulation or a brilliant idea when it gets in my brain; I so seldom have one. Ten cups, a dollar—twenty, two—why I suppose, in the course of time, we might make them fifty—and there would be five dollars. Then the sandwiches, and—let me see, what else is there? why pies, to be sure! My dear Lind, you called me crazy this morning for baking two dozen pies—don't you see what a little mint of money they hold, darling?"

"I don't see any thing but that you are out of your mind, or going out—if you'll please enlighten me!"

"And the ham that blessed John Roe sent to me—to me, remember—it was boiled this morning, wasn't it? Don't look at me so, Lind; I'm not crazy, and there's no danger of my wits leaving me. I'm going to have that purple merino, and as many more pretty things as the money will buy—perhaps a merino for you."

"But how will you do this, pray?"

"Listen; those people in the Hollow, some of them at least, must be starving. They expected to get into Euston at half past nine to breakfast, and supper-time has come. Now you may be sure there are some great, burly masculines, who are going about like raging lions, seeking who or what they can devour. To-day and yesterday being baking-days, there's a week's bread in the house. This and the ham you and I can cut into sandwiches, exquisite ones—thin, touched with a fleck of mustard, trimmed of the fat—why, they'll give me a shilling apiece for them."

"Give you—a shilling—apiece!" gasped Linda. "What do you mean, that you will peddle these things—you, my sister?" Hattie Newhall, I'm ashamed of you. I won't be a party to any such transaction."

"Very well, then, I'll do it by myself; for done it shall be. The Bible tells me to feed the hungry—and I shall feed that train of passengers, if the thing can be done."

"Will you take the bread and ham and pies and coffee in your apron?" asked Linda, placing the tea-urn on the table.

"You seem to forget that Providence has been helping us lately in all manner of ways. There's a blind horse in the stable, and a light wagon, and Gretchen can harness up; won't you, Gretchen?"

"Won't I what?" asked the girl, stupidly, wiping her wet hands upon a great tow-apron.

"Harness up Ball to the light wagon; I'm going on an errand of mercy—to feed the hungry."

Gretchen said "Ya-as," with stupid eyes, and Hattie set about her preparations. First, she found the great farm coffee-pot, then she piled an empty table with loaves of bread, and brought out the ham. Then she tied herself in an immense white linen apron, and commenced operations.

"Why, Linda, I'm surprised you don't see the romance of the thing, with your immense bump of idealism," she rattled on, looking superbly handsome. "I thought you would clap your hands over it."

"You're not half so much surprised as I am," retorted Linda. "To think of my father's daughter going peddling bread and ham to a parcel of hungry strangers! It wouldn't seem so bad if you gave it—but to sell it!"

"That's the chief charm of the matter, I'm vulgar enough to confess," said Hattie, laughing; "we can't afford to give, and they can afford to pay any price. I dare say there are some poor, hungry souls there who wouldn't mind giving a ten-dollar bill for a good supper. I tell you in confidence; but I believe I did pray for that merino, and now I'm exercising faith I shall get it, as sure as you live." At that moment there came a rap at the door. It was Bob Green, who, the little gentleman that he was, took off his odd cap as he came in, saying that he had met Watchet, one of Kane's men, and learned that Mr. Newhall had sent word to his daughters that he should not be home till ten, as he had some important business to settle.

"Now if that isn't a train of providential circumstances I'm no Christian," cried Hattie, while Linda stood at the table irresolute. "Bob will help me, I know; and if you don't care about going, Linda, Gretchen will stay with you. I might have felt a little shaky if papa had come home and said no; but as it is, those poor souls have a claim on my benevolence, and I have a claim—well, I mean to have, on their pockets."

"What is it?" cried Bob, looking at the huge pile of loaves, cake, and pies.

"It's good-will toward men, my dear Bob, toward hungry men. Don't you know you hinted about making a speculation? Well, that put it in my head. You see what I'm doing, making sandwiches; and as Linda has doubts about the propriety of the thing, why, I shall take the burden on my own shoulders, unless you'll help me for a fair consideration."

"I will," cried Bob, with sparkling eyes. "I was over there, and they are in an awful state. One woman was actually crying, because the milk had given out, and she had nothing but water and cold cracker to give her baby; all the babies were crying, I think, and every body looked cross. How are you going?"

"I shall take old Ball and the spring-cart," said Hattie, working with redoubled energy—"I'm in for it now, and the fun of the thing recommends itself to my activity. The only trouble is, I can't get things ready quick enough. Gretchen, is the coffee under way?"

"I'll drive, and help," responded Bob; "and if you would allow me to carry a few apples—"

"Carry all you've got; we might as well fill up the wagon," said Hattie. "Linda, why don't you eat your supper?"

But Linda was thinking now. It suddenly occurred to her that there was fun in the thing—a certain excitement in seeing new faces and hearing strange tongues. It was not at all probable that any body there would know them, going as they were eastward.

"How shall you disguise yourself?" she asked. "I shall disguise myself simply by putting on a hood and veil; I don't think my nearest friends of old would know us in our backwoods' attire any way; that's the last thing I'm afraid of. Now, Bob, hurry and harness Ball, and we'll drive round for the apples; you can turn them into the wagon some way, you know, and you must ask a round price for them."

Linda now commenced cutting bread and ham with activity. Gretchen procured two or three large baskets, and lined them inside with some fine damask napkins which had been saved from the wreck of their household goods. Into these the piles of beautifully made sandwiches were placed, and covered over with the same kind of snowy cloths.

"There! that will tempt them; but only think, Lind, three hundred people! We can't possibly feed them all. Don't cut the pies too large," she suggested, prudently, "and they will go farther; we must have the big milk-pail for them. Now the trouble is, how shall we deal out the coffee? Bowls are too large, cups are too small." Gretchen en here interposed and declared that there were mugs in the back kitchen closet.

"So there are, Lind; we bought them when we first came, don't you remember, for the house-warming? Several are broken, though; but I fancy there are as many as half a dozen. Bring in the mugs, Gretchen; what a lovely memory you have got! I had quite forgotten them." The mugs were brought in, dashed with hot water, a stone-jar filled with sugar, a can of rich milk placed beside it, the coffee was steaming hot, and Hattie's ingenuity provided for its continuation at the same temperature by half filling an unused iron kettle with live coals well bedded in ashes. Old Ball stood at the door and Gretchen and Bob stowed away all the articles, placing the iron pot upon stones, and tying the baskets to the seats and sides of the wagon.

"Why, Linda, are you going?" exclaimed Hattie, as, coming back, she saw that young lady wrapping herself up in shawls, and winding a huge scarf over her hat. "I warn you if you do you will have to help. I will have no idlers on my hands. There are six cars, remember, and you must peddle out the sandwiches."

"I don't care," laughed Linda. "See if I don't do it well. There! They can't distinguish any thing but my eyes. I shall act the demure country-girl, and be utterly oblivious to all that is said, except in the way of business. Oh dear! what would the Stones say, and the Hathaways, and your handsome friend, Horace? I should die to have it come out."

"Please remember that we are on the outer edge of the State of Wisconsin, my fastidious sister, and that it is very likely we shall live and die here—you, the spinster schoolmistress of the district, if it ever gets rich enough in children, and I the maiden aunt. As to Horace, be kind enough to drop all reference to him. I have no fancy for the heart-ache—and—well, I have been foolish enough to think of him occasionally—on moonlight nights. Now, are we all ready?"

Gretchen declared that the young ladies should not go without her. Who would pour the coffee? she asked, in indignant German. No, no! She should make all safe and go, as the master was not expected. It was now getting quite dusk, and beginning to snow. An old canvas was thrown over the eatables; Hattie mounted to the seat beside the driver, Bob; Linda ensconced herself in a low chair between the baskets. Gretchen set off on a smart walk, and arrived at the widow Green's some moments before the others. A tiny log-cabin was this of the widow, whose story was a melancholy one. Seated there beside the blazing fire, quite gray at forty, and an invalid, her one room answering all the purposes of parlor, bedroom, and kitchen, every thing as neat as human hands could make it, one had only to look in her grief-stricken face to see that her life had been a sad one. At thirty she emigrated to the beautiful prairies of the West, rich in hope, in love, and five beautiful children, of whom Bob was the eldest—watched over and cared for by an indulgent, thrifty, and noble husband. Five years later and all her treasures but one were buried in lonely prairie graves, and she was left to struggle with poverty and failing health. The bright fire illuminated the room; there was no need of candles. The bed on one side was made with as much painstaking as if it had stood in the guest-chamber of some palace-home. Over it was spread a beautiful Marseilles quilt, which the widow had brought with her as a family heirloom. Neat engravings were pasted here and there. One corner Bob called his study; he had fitted it up with a desk of his own manufacture, a few rude book-shelves, a map of the United States, and as many pictures as he could find space for. Here lived mother and son, very poor, but loving each other with an absorbing affection, and both longing for the sight of home faces, which it was not likely they would ever see.

Gretchen took upon herself the task of getting the apples ready, as Hattie had instructed her; so that, by the time the cart came up, there was nothing to do but to put them in their appropriate corner.

In high spirits the little party drove on. It took but a few moments to land them in a place conveniently near the cars, but where they could not be easily seen, as they were hidden by a clump of trees. There the programme was announced. Bob was to proclaim sandwiches and coffee; then he and Gretchen were to distribute the hot and soothing beverage; while Hattie and Linda, each with a basket, were to sell the sandwiches. The matter now took on an aspect of grotesqueness that it had not assumed before. The train had stopped in a hollow place between two embankments, and was quite closely shut up in a snow-covered ravine. From the six small iron pipes the thick gray smoke ascended, curling spirally against the back-grounds of snowy banks and darkening sky. The place was quite isolated. There were no signs of farm-houses, no prospects of cheer; and, as Hattie had foreseen, the passengers were nearly ravenous. Several of the younger men were strolling along outside, smoking, stamping, and growling. Discontented faces looked out of every window. It was a cheerless position. Night was coming on, and nobody knew whether or not they must bear the detention till morning. The nearest stopping-place was thirty miles off.

"If we had been set down somewhere within a hundred miles of civilization," Hattie heard one young man mutter, "it wouldn't have been so bad; but there's not a human habitation to be seen on either side, confound the place!" Presently there was a great hubbub, a strange commotion; all the passengers were roused and on the alert, when a pretty, neat-looking boy, standing in the doorway, cried out in a shrill voice,

"Coffee and sandwiches for those who wish to purchase!"

"Fifty cents for the first cup of coffee, my boy!" shouted a man of aldermanic proportions.

"One dollar—and here it is!" cried a tall Kentuckian; "there's my card"—and, thrusting the card and the dollar into Bob's hand, he secured his coffee.

"I gave a dollar, but it's worth it," he muttered, as he took a sip; "real cream and white sugar—and coffee as is coffee."

"Well, this is an unexpected treat, I'm sure!" said a gentleman wrapped in many mufflers, as he took his pocket-book out; "sandwiches, home-made, and apple-pie with a crust equal to the Fifth Avenue Hotel. My friend, I have nothing less than a five dollar bill; if you've no objection," he added, catching sight of a peculiar expression in a pair of beautiful brown eyes, and a mischievous curl in two pretty, red lips, "I'll take half a dozen of those sandwiches for change, and another slice of pie."

"I will give you as many sandwiches as you please, at the regular price," said Hattie, for it was her; "and in a few moments will bring you back change for your five dollars."

"Oh, I beg you will keep it, my dear! And if it chances that there are any people on board too poor to buy, why give them the sandwiches for change, you know," he added, his eyes twinkling.

"Very well, Sir; if I don't find any such I shall remember that I am in your debt," said Hattie, and passed on.

"I would give almost any price for a little warm milk and water," said a pale, sad-looking woman, who was burdened with three crying babies, the smallest one in her lap, and the oldest one young enough to be there.

"You shall have it for a very small price, if I can get it for you," said Hattie, compassionately; and she spoke to Bob, who was just leaving with two empty mugs and his hands full of paper currency. "You look very tired," she resumed, turning to the woman.

"Oh, I am!" said the woman, the tears overflowing and running down her cheeks; "for four days I've been traveling with these children. You see, I lost my man out on the prairies, and I'm going back where I've got friends; for, indeed, I've had the fever so often that I think another time it would kill me, and then what would become of the poor babies? They're not always so fretty and worrisome—they're good little things enough, but they're beat out, I assure you, Miss."

"They're hungry, I'm afraid," said Hattie, in a low voice.

"Surely; but you see I've such a bit of money, though, as I said, I'd almost give it all for a drink for this one, which is so feverish, poor little thing, and do beg so hard. I've given her water till I'm afraid—ah! 'twas a sad thing the cars stopped—I'd been nearly home by this time—that is, to my sister's, which lives in Bradley and is forehanded."

"They shall have these, if you think they ought to eat such hearty food," said Hattie, making up a little parcel; "don't think of paying for it—you're perfectly welcome," she said, and went on, quite overwhelmed with the mother's gratitude, after she had filled a bottle with sweet milk.

Just two seats in front of this woman sat a gentleman of elegant and even fastidious exterior. His coat, which had a voluminous cape, was surmounted by a collar of the richest sable; the same kind of fur made a rim round his cloth cap. He wore neat gloyes, and a splendid traveling-bag was perched upon the brass hook above his head; a slender cane with a gold head and a silk umbrella occupied the same place. His cap was pulled very low over his eyes—his collar very high, so it concealed his chin, showing only the soft black mustache and a portion of a handsome pair of side-whiskers. He was further concealed by the shadow; for, though the car-lamp was lighted it hung at some distance behind him. As Hattie went by, her stock diminished, for it was the third basket, and this was the last car, he said, in a rather gruff voice,

"Is there any thing left for me?"

"Oh yes," replied Hattie, "there are some sandwiches and a few slices of pie—quite fresh."

"Do you live about here?" he further queried, as Hattie gave him the articles he purchased.

"I don't live about any where," she answered, composedly; "I live as most other people do, I suppose, between four walls, and under a roof."

"I beg your pardon; I did not think of being impertinent," said the stranger.

"Did I accuse you of impertinence, Sir?" asked Hattie. "Here is your change;" and as he took it she glided out.

"Well, this is curious enough," said the stranger, who had taken off a glove, and was pulling at his mustache in evident perplexity, showing as he did so a slender white hand. "I should have known her by that sign, if no other. Her face was so curiously bunched up, and yet—the eyes—the voice—and still, it can not be; the unconscious refinement, the elegance of motion, the—Pshaw! I must be mistaken. But that—I'll find out—I'll be certain. How kind she was to that poor woman!—just like her—fine breeding will show under any disguise; I must assure myself. How well she answered me! What a ridiculous question, to be sure! Curiously independent—always was, though; if it be her—still, I wonder, somewhat—can it be poverty that compels it?"

He hurriedly pulled on his glove, stood up, seemed for a moment undecided; looked at his watch, then left the car, rather unlike in his movements the man of elegant leisure that he was—stooping as he did so to pick up something.

Meantime Hattie and Linda had gained the spring-cart, breathless; Hattie arrived last.

"The animals are all fed," she laughingly cried; "but they cry piteously for more coffee."

"I sold every apple, and could sell more," exclaimed Bob. "I put the apple-money in the left pocket, and there's a heap there. Did you ever see such hungry people?"

"It's a shame they can't have more coffee; suppose we make another potful—will you and Gretchen bring it here? They think they may be obliged to stay two or three hours longer; perhaps all night."

"I will," cried Bob, "and bring some more apples; we've got more than we know what to do with."

"I will come too," said Gretchen; "I like the fun."

"Do you know," said Linda, solemnly, "I thought for a moment that Horace Blanchard was in one of those cars."

Hattie started violently. "Which one?" she queried; and then, "What nonsense!"

"Nonsense or not, there was that unmistakable air about him; for you know, Hat, there was something different from other men in Horace; he was so perfectly—what shall I say?—thorough-bred."

"But in which car?" queried Hattie, impatiently.

"The last."

Hattie felt a shiver and then a thrill; after that, if it had been light, Linda would have seen her cheeks burning. She forgot the humming and the grumbling, the crying of babies and the petulance of tired mothers—the human freight of discontented souls—and her heart went back to one time—one hour—but "Pshaw!" she thought, "why recall it?" She had long ago promised herself to give up such reveries and memories.

"There was a something about one of them," Hattie said to herself, musingly, "that gave me an impression—Of course, Lind, it wasn't he," she broke out, suddenly. "What fools we make of ourselves sometimes! Well, Lind, I've got my new merino, or as good as got it," she added, after a few moments; "but I've lost my handkerchief—my best one—which I was foolish enough to wear—and mamma's gift. What shall I do? Look for it, Lind. I'll run back with the lantern; we took only one track; it must be found if I have to go through the cars again;" and she started back.

The handsome stranger stood as irresolutely upon the platform of the car he had just left as he had stood a moment before in his seat. Then he stepped down into the snow, which was by no means deep. A few flakes fell upon his coat and freshened his face with their damp, tiny touch.

"I wonder where they are?" he mused, listening; "I was a fool not to speak at once—at all events, I can follow this footpath till I see—a woman with a lantern," he muttered, under his breath.

"Have you lost something?" he asked.

She started back and flashed the lantern toward him, then said, "Yes, a handkerchief that I prized because it was a keepsake."

"You are very fearless," he responded.

"We learn to be fearless in the great West, and to protect ourselves," she answered, still searching, but her hand under her shawl was clenched tightly over her heart.

"Allow me," he said, and took from his breast the handkerchief.

"You have it?" she cried, low and tremblingly.

"I found it as you left the car, Miss Newhall."

"The name is not there," half gasped Hattie.

"No? I never looked for it. Next time you wish to preserve a strict incognita don't wear that ring, it is unique."

"The jet and pearl, you mean," murmured Hattie, breathless with surprise.

"Yes, will you object to my escort home?"

"We brought a spring-cart," said Hattie, with a laugh that sounded strangely spasmodic, "and there are four of us."

"Is it a long walk?"

"Oh no! Bob and Gretchen might walk, but—"

"Well?"

"You must drive—Ball is not a remarkable animal, he is very old and very blind."

"I object to fast horses at night, and in a strange country. But I must stipulate that my baggage goes too. I am just home from Europe, where I have been traveling for the last ten months; came by the way of Canada; have been making a tour of the Lakes and looking over this Western country. It suits me. Shall I take my baggage along, Miss Newhall? No trunks; forwarded them directly to Philadelphia."

"You'll hardly find hotel accommodations, Mr. Blanchard," said Hattie; "if you are willing to rough it a little, you shall be heartily welcome. It will do papa good, the sight of a familiar face from dear old Philadelphia."

"To be sure it will; and I can get advice from him if I should want to invest in a few prairies."

"Bob will find the baggage," she said, and then turned hot for fear she had implied an undue anxiety. Bob came up, sent by Linda, who was nervous at Hattie's prolonged absence. He willingly procured the handsome valise, walking-stick, and umbrella, and in a few moments old Ball was jogging along toward home.

The girls were glad that the supper-table was set so invitingly; they ushered their strangely-formed acquaintance into the reception-room, as Linda laughingly called it, and then went up stairs to hold a consultation.

"The providence seems all on your side," said Linda, slyly.

"Yes, look at the money; heaps, as they say down South. I think I have earned my new merino. But what shall we do with—that man down stairs?"

"Provide for him," Linda replied, laughing, as she threw some sticks on the fire.

"We must give him this room."

"Of course, unless he sleeps with papa."

"It is so different from what he is accustomed to," said Hattie, looking about.

"It's good enough for us," replied Linda; "and if he don't like it, you know, he needn't stay. I'm not particular."

Hattie blushed and laughed, made a rough guess at the amount of greenbacks they had taken, put on a short white apron, smoothed her hair, and looked dangerously pretty.

That was a night long to be remembered. Papa Newhall, coming home all tired out, forgot his perplexities in the delight of meeting an old friend. Horace praised the cabin, and enjoyed his supper; the harp and piano set up their mellow voices, and Horace Blanchard's flute, which he always carried about with him, completed the tuneful trio.

Of course you see the dénouement of my story—a handsome residence built in prairie land by Horace Blanchard, who takes to wife the beautiful sister of Linda Newhall; settles Mrs. Green as housekeeper, though virtually the good soul has next to nothing to do; provides for Bob; and becomes, as he ought, the leading man of the West; goes to Congress; helps his father-in-law to a fortune; founds a city, which is named after him; and is remarkably fond of purple merino, through a longing for which he fancies he is indebted to all his good fortune.

FERN IMPRESSION WORK.

IMPRESSIONS of ferns, arranged in graceful groups or designs, are well worth the little trouble required for their production, and will last for years to ornament the house in the form of screens, lamp-shades, sofa pillows, toilette sets, etc. Their durability is no small recommendation, while their beauty will attract attention everywhere.

As a first experiment, let the learner take a piece of white muslin and lay it smoothly upon a table or lapboard (the latter being the best). Next arrange on it a group of smooth ferns, either green or dried, laying them flat in the centre, according to any design the operator may prefer. The fine, delicate ones are most beautiful, and the leaves and blossoms of the New Jersey climbing fern especially so.

Having arranged them as you mean them to lie, next secure them in place by means of small pins stuck through the points of the leaves into the table, thus fastening down every leaflet close to the muslin.

When all this is done take either India or indelible ink, dip into it a large camel's-hair brush, or something that will answer as well, and, holding it over the ferns, draw it back and forth across a comb, letting the ink splatter through upon them and the muslin around, continuing to do so until the muslin spaces around and between the leaves are well darkened; the pins may then be removed and the leaves lifted, when a perfect impression will be seen upon the muslin. The shading around the edges should be deeper nearest the ferns, and lighter gradually toward the outer edges, until it leaves clean muslin on the margin.

Then with a fine pen or pencil trace lightly the outlines of the leaves, etc., and draw the central veins down through each spray and leaflet. In this way may be made the most durable toilette sets, and pin-cushion covers, doilies, etc., as they will bear washing. Fine white satin jean will be found a suitable material for this purpose.

Screens and sofa pillows can be produced with still more elegant effect by using white or some other delicate shade of velvet instead of muslin, with designs in the corners and centre, or with a continued wreath all around.

Ivy leaves instead of, or mingled with, fern sprays will have an excellent effect. This art may also be applied to Bristol board lamp-shades, embellishing the title-pages of albums, and many other articles. Even counterpanes of plain muslin or Marseilles may be adorned with corners, borders, and centre-pieces done with indelible ink; in fact, to an ingenious person, numberless objects will suggest themselves, to which these beautiful impressions can be applied.

For articles not intended to be washed a still greater variety may be produced by using ink of different colors. Red ink is used in Canada and elsewhere in making chair covers and screens, the material being generally white velveteen or cotton velvet.

Swiss Muslin Waist with Simulated Braid Trimming.

THIS waist, or chemise Russe, is of Swiss muslin, trimmed with a simulated braid, or rouleau of pink satin ribbon an inch in width, and Valenciennes insertion and edging, each two-thirds of an inch in width. For the manner of making the trimming, see Fig. 8 on the opposite page and the appended description. For making the waist cut from Fig. 10 of the Supplement both fronts, allowing an inch and a half for the hem on the front; from Fig. 11 the back in one piece, and from Fig. 12 the sleeves, taking care to observe the contour of the under side. Having hemmed the fronts, and finished them with small buttons and button-holes, take up the darts, and join the backs and fronts according to the figures on the pattern. Bind the neck with a straight piece of Swiss muslin, three-fourths of an inch wide, after it is finished; cover this band with pink satin ribbon, which is wound diagonally with the insertion; gather in a frill of lace above the binding, and hem the under edge with a hem a fifth of an inch wide. Finish the waist, after having gathered the back, with a Swiss muslin belt an inch and a half in width. Join the sleeves according to the figures on the pattern, after which turn down the material on the right side at the distance of one-third of an inch on the bottom of the sleeves and sew on the trimming. Cord the arm-holes, and sew in the sleeves, bringing 26 on 26 of the front of the waist. Finally, put on the trimming, having first prepared it and pointed the ends, as shown in the illustration.

the same pattern as the tucked waist, Figs. 13 and 14 of the Supplement. The trimming consists of needle-work leaves edged with lace, which are set on so as to simulate bretelles, with loops of blue satin ribbon between, and surmounted with Valenciennes lace, which covers the seam. A Swiss muslin binding, trimmed with satin points and Valenciennes lace, is set on the neck, and finished in front with a bow, whereof Fig. 7, on the opposite page, gives the half-sized illustration. This bow is made of needle-work leaves edged with lace, and loops of blue satin ribbon, to correspond with the bretelles. The sleeve trimming is shown in the illustration.

Swiss Muslin Waist with Simulated Fichu.

THIS waist, or chemise Russe, is cut from the pattern given for the waist with braid trimming. The trimming imitates a fichu, and consists of Valenciennes insertion sewed on in the form of tabs, lace one-third of an inch and an inch wide, worked figures in appliqué, and blue satin ribbon an inch in width. The insertion on the front of the right side is underlaid with the ribbon, which is also used for the points which finish the neck and the sleeves at the wrist. The neck is finished in front by a rosette of the blue satin ribbon. The muslin is cut away under the insertion which forms tabs. The manner of sewing on the trimming is shown by the illustration, and by Fig. 3 on the opposite page.

Waist with Bretelles.

See illustration, page 536.

THIS waist, or chemise Russe, is cut from the pattern given for the tucked waist. The bretelles of the front and back consist each of two Swiss muslin pieces, two inches wide on the shoulders, and sloping to one inch in width at the waist. These strips are laid in narrow cross-pleats, and are joined by means of a guipure insertion about half an inch wide. The illustration shows the manner of arranging them on the waist. Cover the seams made by setting them on with guipure lace an inch in width, underlaid with pink ribbon. Cut the stuff away from under the bretelles. Finish the right front by a binding an inch in width, which is bordered with guipure lace, and ornamented with rosettes in embroidery. Finish the back with insertion in the middle, after which cut away the Swiss muslin underneath. Hem the neck very narrow, and finish with lace. On the front set a bow of pink ribbon and lace, in the middle of which is an embroidered figure. The trimming of the sleeves corresponds to that of the waist, and can be arranged from the illustration.

THE waist, or chemise Russe, the front of which is seen in the illustration, and the back in Fig. 4 on this page, is of plain muslin above, while the portion which imitates a bodice or peasant waist is of tucked muslin. If it be desired to make the waist tight, cut from the pattern given for the waist with braid trimming, and if loose, from that given for the tucked waist. Trim the seam, which joins the plain and tucked parts, with lilac satin ribbon, which is trimmed with embroidered rosettes edged with Valenciennes, pleated on in the manner shown by the illustration. Figs. 10 and 11 on this page give rosettes suitable for this purpose. The trimming of the sleeves corresponds to that of the bodice. Finish the neck with a collar of Valenciennes insertion and lace, the ends of which are ornamented with an embroidered rosette. Finish the front with a bow composed of two cravat-ends of muslin, lace, and embroidered rosettes, and cover the place where these ends are set on with a knot made of embroidery and lace. Loops and ends of lilac satin complete the bow (see illustration). The belt is of satin ribbon ornamented with embroidered rosettes.

Figs. 12 and 13.—Two trimmings, embroidered with white cotton in French stitch, the manner of working of which is shown on the illustration. These serve for trimming chemises Russes, standing collars, etc.

Figs. 14 and 15.—Two pointed edgings, which serve as trimming for chemises Russes, standing collars, cuffs, etc. The edge, Fig. 14, consists of green satin points of double material, to which are also fastened button-hole stitch scallops arranged in points. The embroidered scallops are fastened on a piece of muslin, and the satin points sewed to a satin ribbon. The points are then fastened together as shown by the illustration, and the muslin is trimmed with narrow satin ribbon. Fig. 15 consists of points of muslin and lilac satin, and is formed of double material.

Finish the muslin points with a Swiss muslin binding one-third of an inch in width, so that each point shall slightly lap over the next on the edge. The satin points are in like manner fastened to a lilac binding two-thirds of an inch in width. Then sew the two rows of points together, as shown by the illustration, so that the under edge of the lilac satin ribbon shall project a little below the edge of the muslin.

This bow is seen on the tucked waist on the opposite page.

CASHMERE SHAWLS.

FINEST of all woolen textures, and most exquisite in workmanship, is the Indian shawl. Uniting richness of design with freshness of coloring, it has no rival in the world. It is not only the most splendid tissue ever wrought by the hand of man, but it is also the most solid and most durable, whether it adorns the shoulders of a European beauty or girds the waist of an Eastern potentate.

The seat of this industry is the Vale of Cashmere, celebrated for "its roses, the brightest that earth ever gave," the chosen theme of the poet and the traveler. In this favored spot and its surrounding mountains the industrious inhabitants are principally employed in this laborious manufacture. The Cashmere shawl is woven from the wool of the Thibet goat; the material for the shawls (which is carried to Cashmere) is found next the skin of the animal, and is surpassingly soft and silky. When employed for fabricating shawls the wool is first made over to the women to spin—a difficult and costly operation. It is next passed to the dyer to give it its unalterable colors, then delivered to the weaver, who sets up his simple frame, and weaves, after the pattern given him, the segment of the shawl allotted for his task. The shawls are all made in separate pieces, and when the portions distributed to the different weavers are finished they are given to skilled workmen called ra-fu-gar, to whom is assigned the difficult duty of joining the segments together. These seams, however, generally require to be re-sewn in Europe before the shawl is offered for sale. The flowers and arabesque patterns are worked in by hand. When finished the shawl is well cleaned and covered with a strong paste, principally made from rice. The whole completed, it is delivered to the purchaser.

Shawls were formerly made in pairs, but since European dealers have invaded Cashmere more than two are made from the same pattern.

If destined for Europe the shawl has to be disencumbered of its provisional dressing. For this purpose it is washed in the river flowing from the Lake of Cashmere, whose waters are reputed to preserve the colors, a property attributed to the aromatic plants growing on its banks. A sheet of paper is laid between each fold of the shawl. It is inclosed in four or five envelopes, and packed with the utmost precaution.

So delicate and complicated a work can only be accomplished by workmen versed in it from infancy, and who, living upon a handful of rice, are satisfied with moderate wages. The best workmen scarcely earn more than from three to four cents a day. The low price of labor will always render Europe tributary to Asia for this luxurious production. A shawl which costs $400 at Cashmere, or at Umritsur, in the Punjab, where these shawls are also fabricated, could not be made for less than $5000 to $6500 by European workmen. The material only enters into 20 per cent. of the cost. Hence many French manufacturers have formed establishments at Cashmere and Umritsur, where shawls are made by native workmen; but in too many instances they have introduced their own designs, which have changed the national character of the shawl, and often, in these cases, the beautiful tissue is concealed beneath a mass of embroidery.

Shawls of inferior quality are also made at Loodiana, where this industry was introduced by a colony from Cashmere, recruited every year from the valley. The colors of those made at Loodiana are very solid, and bear constant washing. They are wanting in brilliancy of tints, consisting principally of brown, black, dark bottle green, and indigo blue. The colors most prized are a dull yellow, shades of amaranth, and, most brilliant of all, a kind of rose pomegranate of the finest thread, used only in shawls of the first quality. The favorite color in India is a bright copper green; it is false, but very brilliant and costly, and is chiefly employed where palms are introduced into the design. Another shade of the same color is used for the warp of the finest shawls, as is also turquoise blue, a most costly color.

At Loodiana the workmen are seated three together at the same strip, in front of a cylinder upon which the warp is rolled. Each has at least fifty shuttles. The chief sits in the middle, and guides the other two. In one pair of shawls is six hundred days' work; they would cost at Loodiana, if of the finest quality made, about $100. The white shawls with green palms are the coarsest.

These Loodiana shawls are heavy, the palms stiff and ungraceful, and they are destitute of the softness so admired in Europe; but this they gain, in a great degree, by wear and washing. From their cheapness, Cashmere can not contend with Loodiana in the Indian market.

What the Indian produces by years of manual labor the European now obtains in a short time by means of machinery. Shawls are made in the Jacquard loom by workmanship the most intricate and complicated.

Though inferior in softness to its Indian rival, the French shawl is the most beautiful and elaborate tissue machinery ever produced. It is also made of the down of the Thibet goat, originally introduced from Russia, at great expense, by Monsieur Ternaux, who produced, in 1810, the first Cashmere shawl ever manufactured in France. The web is entirely of wool, worked like carded wool, to produce a smooth tissue; but in the warp is introduced a thread of fine silk, called organsine (for which cocoons of the first quality are reserved), to give it sufficient stability to weave. The French shawl is finer and more clothlike to the touch than the Indian, smoother in surface from its more perfectly spun yarn, which is free from the knotty irregularities of the Indian web. Yet, notwithstanding these improvements, the French shawl never falls in the soft, elegant folds of the true Cashmere.

France has only three centres for the manufacture of shawls: Paris for the finest quality, Lyons, and Nîmes. The greater part of the shawls sold as Paris are woven in Picardy, at Fresnoy-le-Grand, and Rohain. The Paris manufacturers have always, by their taste and inventive genius, maintained their superiority in this manufacture. It is there that the use of the Jacquard loom has been brought to the greatest perfection, and its work-shops of design have the highest reputation. The pattern being "read," as it is called, on the Jacquard cards, the workman has given to him the warp ready dyed and prepared, and the materials necessary to form the web. When woven the shawl is trimmed, washed, and dressed. Since the introduction of European capital and industry the Indian shawl has much diminished in price, and has become a formidable rival to the Paris shawl, which formerly replaced the more costly production of the East.

The two kinds may always be distinguished from each other by one marked difference. In the French shawl there is a great loss of material, because the wool passes the whole width of the warp, only to appear where it forms the pattern, and being seen behind in loops, or brides, as they are termed, which are cut away when the tissue is finished to diminish the weight of the shawl. The Indian shawl, on the other hand, is woven like a kind of tapestry, each thread following only the outline it has to form, being fastened by knots on the wrong side. These remain in the state the workmen left them, adding much to the solidity and strength of the shawl, which therefore never ravels out.

But the great merit of the Indian cachemire consists in the harmony and effect produced from the proper distribution of color and the rich invention of their patterns; these give them an evident superiority over the French shawls, which last are chiefly distinguished by their well-chosen designs and the perfect regularity of their weaving, equally apparent both in the ground and border. These merits do not appear in the Indian shawl, where the execution of the pattern is more or less imperfect, according as the strips have been made by more or less competent workmen. The numerous seams required in these shawls to unite the different pieces that compose them offer also an ungraceful aspect scarcely consistent with the élégance they adorn. But as these faults serve to give them a special character they become often a "quality" instead of a defect in the eyes of the purchaser. It must always be borne in mind that the Cashmere wool is the most delicate and difficult of all tissues to work, and that the Eastern natives, by their success in weaving it, have earned the reputation of being the most patient and most skillful weavers in the world.

Although our observations have been strictly confined to the Cashmere shawls, yet we can hardly pass unnoticed the Scotch tartans, now brought to great perfection. The beautiful wool of the Cheviot sheep goes far to rival the production of the Thibet goat.

JINNY ANN JONES AND MRS. GRUNDY.

THE point in question was, should Mary Jane ride with Sarah Saddler, or should she stop at home because her frock was rumpled, and Sarah Saddler was at the door with no time to wait?

Now when a man gathers all his hopes and fears for one throw of fortune, or a child speaks all the present desire of its little life in one request, there is to me something solemn and touching in the spectacle; more especially in the case of the child, because children have no moral perspective. A great disappointment means to them, for the time being, despair; and some of the most piteous scars on the soul are childish griefs, whose sting is hardly forgotten by mature years. So, though I never interfere with Mrs. Lumpkin's domestic discipline, at heart I sided with Mary Jane, and was glad when, after a moment's hesitation, Mrs. Lumpkin said, slowly, "Well, yes."

But as Mary Jane was dancing out in a rapture she met my sister-in-law, Mrs. Fetish. "You are not going in that dress, surely!" exclaimed Mrs. Fetish. "What would Mrs. Grimkin say? Sarah Saddler will stop there. She told me so."

And before the Grimkin view of the case could be discussed time was up, and Sarah Saddler drove away. Mary Jane began to cry and continued to cry, for her grief was of the sort that grows on one. Every moment took Sarah Saddler further and further away on that rapturous journey. Mrs. Lumpkin shortly lost temper. First, she scolded Mary Jane. Next, she boxed her ears. Mary Jane perceived the necessity of corking herself up, and, wiping away her tears, went about with so much pain, anger, and sulkeness bottled up in her poor little rebellious heart, that I am convinced their mechanical equivalent might have lifted a ton. Mrs. Lumpkin, much disturbed by the occurrence, cut a breadth of her new dress on the wrong side, and forgot the roast, which burned to a cinder. And I looked at Mrs. Fetish, the cause of all this woe, and said to myself, here is—a Lumpkin paper.

Have you seen your children play Jinny Ann Jones? If so, you may remember that Miss Jinny Ann is always being hidden behind protecting petticoats, and always being hunted by the other half of the party. Precisely in this way Mrs. Fetish is forever playing Jinny Ann Jones with Mrs. Grundy. Most people have one skeleton in the house, but Mrs. Fetish has a Jinny Ann Jones in every room, and as you, or I, or her next-door neighbor, may be Mrs. Grundy, Mrs. Fetish must always first pop her Jinny Ann out of sight, next make sure that you have not seen her; and, lastly, lead you and the conversation as far as possible from the hiding-place. If a member of her family enters, then Mrs. Fetish is in dread lest he unsuspectingly should let Jinny Ann out; and no matter how long your stay, her whole endeavor is to strengthen you in the impression that the particular Jinny Ann whom she has just hidden is not in her house.

Jinny Ann Jones may be the old dress that she shoves under the sofa cushion, or the fact that she does not visit Mrs. Grimkin, or that she paid forty instead of seventy-five dollars for her cloak, or that she keeps only a maid of all work; but long experience has made me so familiar with Mrs. Fetish's tactics that I am never long in finding out toward what conversational corner Mrs. Fetish refuses to turn her eyes.

For example. I stop there for a friendly chat and discover, say what I will, that the conversation always gets back to one subject—real estate, and the high prices thereof. When this has happened some half a dozen times I say to myself, "Oh! Jinny Ann Jones again," and follow her lead.

"Yes. As you say, Mrs. Fetish, prices are extortionate."

Mrs. Fetish brightens at once.

"Extortionate. They are absurd, Mr. Lumpkin. To buy a decent house, and as I tell Mr. Fetish, I am sure I do not want any other, you must sink a fortune. For my part I prefer to wait, and if Mr. Fetish takes my advice he will stop where we are this year at least."

Then I know that Fetish, who lost twenty thousand in the last tumble of stocks, has said to her that he can not afford to buy this year. But Mrs. Fetish is quite satisfied. In her opinion she has pulled the wool well over my eyes; and she would smile, even if Fetish had lost fifty thousand, if only Mrs. Grundy and I can be made to believe that he stays in the three-story brick, because it is his whim not to yield to the extravagance of the day.

Or Jinny Ann Jones may be Arabella Fetish's runaway match with Gil Blas. Gil is a "ne'er-do-weel." Most runaways are. He has little money, no capacity for business, and expensive habits. Arabella can dance, has a fine taste in dress, and might have married a block of buildings, brown-stone houses, Madam, near Fifth Avenue. Just as she almost fancies herself mother-in-law of this brown-stone block, Mrs. Fetish is rudely pushed on one side by the ne'er-do-weel. All her watchings, her sacrifices, are made useless. A larger-hearted mother might writhe under the blow; but true to her life-long habit, Mrs. Fetish's first instinctive thought is to hide this large and inconvenient Jinny Ann from Mrs. Grundy. She takes no time for quiet weeping, but is up and at her work with the energy of a bee or ant, and before Mrs. Grundy can wipe her spectacles she has her story ready.

"Any Jinny Ann Jones in here?" "No indeed. Taken by surprise? Not at all. It was a romantic marriage. They would be married quietly; and, of course, Arabella might have married the brown-stone block; but, as all the world knows, my daughter was not the girl to sell herself. Beside, there are qualities quite as desirable as money (for by this time Mrs. Fetish has manufactured a redeeming trait for Gil Blas). Arabella's husband is of the Node family. How could he be expected to know any thing of economy? And the Nodes are charmed with Arabella, who is spending the summer with them, etc., etc."

Now is not here singleness of purpose, and a heroic and unflinching fidelity? When a man or woman patiently accepts an affliction, the better to glorify God, and is hardly distressed except by a sin, we call that Christian faith. But we see Mrs. Fetish bear affliction with positive heroism, not to offend Mrs. Grundy, and cast down, not by real distresses, such as Arabella's unfortunate match, but only by the fear of losing her slippery footing before that misty South Sea Idol, what shall we call it? For my part, though no one knows better that Arabella is not spending the summer with the Nodes, etc., etc., I confess to a certain admiration for the pluck and ingenuity of this dauntless, resolute, worried little pagan, that leads me, spite of myself, from my original subject to consider the virtues of the devotees of Mrs. Grundy.

Virtues say you? Virtues say I. Is not faith a virtue? Even when misplaced, as in a Brahmin or an idolater! Do we not praise it? But how much greater is the faith of the Grundyite! The Brahmin has his revelation; the idolater his idol; but the Grundyite has neither revelation nor visible shape. Who knows where to find Mrs. Grundy? Who can describe her? Who has ever traced her? Old Fetish tried. His wife was badgering him to move up town. Stoves were sold on their right, a dentist was on their left; a hair-dresser had opened shop in front of them. All genteel people fled before them. And—

"My dear, what will people say?" piped Mrs. Fetish, unceasingly, in her husband's ear.

"My dear," Fetish answered as often, "I could not make the move you desire at present, because it would involve me over ears in debt. Even if we could rent this house at once, we could not rent it for such a price as we should be obliged to pay up town. And I should have besides my heavy losses this year the expense of moving and new furniture, you know."

"But what will people think?" insisted Mrs. Fetish, and at last grown desperate.

"Who are people?" cried Mr. Fetish.

"La, Mr. Fetish, how odd you are!"

"Odd! I do not think so. You ask 'What will people think?' I ask 'What people do you mean?'"

"Why, I do not know. There are the Retts, and the Smalls, and Mr. Cross's family."

"Retts! Smalls! Cross!" Mr. Fetish took down the names in his note-book, and shortly after called on Peter Cross.

"Mr. Cross," asked Fetish, after some desultory talk, "I suppose you know that I am still living down town?"

"Yes."

"What have you thought of my doing so?"

"Why, I never thought of it at all," replied Peter Cross, in some astonishment.

Mr. Fetish wrote down the answer, and called on the Smalls.

"I suppose you have noticed that we do not move up town," Mr. Fetish observed, in the course of the conversation.

"Well, no; I have not," answered Mrs. Small.

"Pray, why should you move up town?" Mr. Fetish called on Mr. Rett.

"Have you heard any thing about my house?"

"No."

"Any thing about me?"

"No."

"Any body ever wondered to you why I live in such a neighborhood?"

"No."

"Sure?"

"Quite sure."

Mr. Fetish went home and showed his wife the entries in his book. Mrs. Fetish was horror-stricken, and cried for vexation.

"Now, Mr. Fetish, how could you do such a thing? I wish you were like any body else. And that is not what I meant. But there are people who think and talk of such things too. You heard Mrs. Bubble yourself, when she said that she really could not visit below Fourteenth Street."

"I thought that you despised Mrs. Bubble."

"So I do. She is shallow and conceited, and she has no judgment."

"But for a shallow, conceited woman whom you despise, and who has no judgment, you would drive me to involve myself in debt, which would harass us perhaps for the rest of our lives."

"Now, you know, Mr. Fetish, that is not what I mean."

But what, if this is true, does she really mean, and who is Mrs. Grundy? I myself have tried the experiment. When Mrs. Lumpkin's soul was exercised about our carpets I obtained from Mrs. Lumpkin a list of twenty-five persons, whom she said were signified by "people," and "they say." I visited the twenty-five, and demanded and received their candid opinion about our carpets. Twenty-three had never noticed them. One lady thought them pretty, and one would like more green in the pattern.

Now, who is Mrs. Grundy? I am inclined to believe that she is not the people whom we know; for what a monstrous thing that any man or woman should pay twenty-five or a hundred dollars extra, or wear tight boots, or tell a lie for the sake of an indifferent neighbor or acquaintance? Still if People, Mrs. Grundy, and They Say, the Trinity in whom Mrs. Fetish believes, are not persons whom she knows they evidently can not be those whom she does not know. Therefore we come to the inference that Mrs. Fetish is wearing herself thin and sharp, and constantly sacrificing solid advantages for the favor of an abstraction, without name, shape, or place. And in so doing I maintain that she and her sect exhibit a faith greater than is required of a Christian.

Observe next the spirit of sacrifice which marks every Grundyite. Mrs. Fetish is fond of Amelia Ann, her second daughter, who has reached the ripe age of nine years. Mrs. Fetish knows that Amelia Ann should eat plain dinners in the middle of the day, mind her dolls and her lessons, and get to bed by eight o'clock. But children's parties, especially the Bubble parties, are pleasing to Mrs. Grundy, and not to attend them attaches to a child in the Fetish circle a sort of social taboo, just as would happen to an idol-worshiper who failed to appear at the great yearly feast. Mrs. Fetish is straitened in pocket, but she squeezes out the necessary boots, sashes, gloves, and tarlatans demanded by Mrs. Grundy, though to do it Heaven knows what she herself goes without! Under this one count alone we find then that Mrs. Fetish offers her own time, money, strength, and better knowledge, and Amelia Ann's lungs, stomach, circulation, lessons, and good looks on the altar of an abstraction without shape, place, or name, except Mrs. Grundy. Talk of sacrifices made to Moloch after that!

Again there is, or there was, Arabella. Mrs. Fetish, apart from her Grundyism, is a sensible woman. She knows that girls between sixteen and nineteen are not altogether a fair match for the world; and that it is only in romances that a young girl of this age can defeat the brilliant villain of the story, outwit his shrewd lawyer, terrify his brutal agent; cure her lover, whom the most skillful physicians have given over; rescue the crew of a sinking vessel, while all the old sailors are whimpering on the deck; and achieve undying fame by her first book.

On the contrary, in real life such young persons are amazingly ignorant, and deceived with singular ease. I write this deliberately. I may be mobbed by the next indignant boarding-school that I meet; but it is pleasant to die for the truth, I have been told by those who have tried it; and I repeat, amazingly ignorant, and deceived with singular ease! Mrs. Fetish knows this; also, that this world is full of good-looking, well-mannered men and women, ready to deceive.

On the other side, she knows that there is in this ignorance a certain charm of candor and simple trustfulness, as lovely and as easily brushed away as the down on a peach; but Mrs. Grundy delights in matinées, and other shows of which I hardly know the names; and Matilda Bubble is continually present without chaperon or guardian; and if Matilda is present, so must be Arabella, not to be left behind in the race. Naturally these damsels are not long troubled with that charm of which I was speaking; but from pushing their way habitually and from choice through crowds, and from much self-reliance, they acquire a surprising hardness of look and manner that leads an old gentleman like myself, with stiff, old-fashioned notions, to sigh and say to Mrs. Lumpkin that lilies and violets are dying out.

It is said that Arabella met Gil Blas at one of these matinées, and spiteful people hint that it is lucky that an acquaintance so conducted terminated in nothing worse than a runaway marriage. It is certain that it is not only Arabella who goes. Amelia Ann goes also, with other little girls of her own age. She is too wise to believe in fairy stories. At an age when her mother was playing with her dolls, the tinsel and lime-lights of the stage are her picture-books. Painted, décolletée women are her fairies. The poses of the ballet form her notions of grace and stir her ambition. Twenty to one if you should come suddenly on Amelia Ann and her young friends you would find them pirouetting on one leg, with the other stretched straight out; and I question if Amelia Ann could not have mastered the French conjugations in the time that she has spent in trying to stand on the end of her toes. Speaking of that, I am reminded of Gertrude Bubble, about whom Mrs. Grundy is in hysterics just now because Gertrude has taken to the stage. Poor Gertrude! She only admired what Mrs. Grundy delighted to honor. She and Amelia Ann are only imitating the women whom they see received with rapturous applause. How are they to discern all the elements in that applause, any more than the materials of which the rose and green glory is made that is shed on the stage? But, as Mrs. Fetish uneasily reflects, every body does it. So Arabella meets Gil Blas, and we are glad that the story is no worse; and Amelia Ann pirouettes secretly in her mother's drawing-rooms. But if Grundy approves, why should Mrs. Fetish be more squeamish than others about the modesty, honor, and womanly tastes of her daughters!

No doubt Mrs. Fetish would protest against this view of the case—that is, against the wording. Mrs. Fetish, Mrs. Bubble, and Mrs. Grundy herself would be shocked at the thought of such frightful carelessness. They would never be guilty of it, except in practice; and it is only when you put what you see of lives given over to Grundism in plain words, as I am doing, that we begin to appreciate the enormous sacrifices constantly demanded from this devoted sect. Indeed, to attempt any enumeration of the persons and things tabooed by this relentless divinity would be impossible, and I must content myself with a few prominent objects

TABOOD.

Unfashionable relatives. One of the most charming women that I have ever met is an aunt of Mrs. Fetish, whom she only sees on the sly, for fear of Mrs. Grundy.

One's own taste in dress. Only yesterday I heard Mrs. Lumpkin bemoaning herself over her new dress. She said that it was made en pantiers; that it was so called because you were made to look in it like a donkey between his panniers; that she did hate, at this late day, to join the tribe of Issachar, but if the Empress and the Princess Metternich would wear such things, she, Mrs. Lumpkin, did not see how she could help herself.

Your own opinion about a man, a woman, a song, a picture, a book, or a landscape. Mrs. Fetish has not owned such a thing for years.

Attempts at economy, and all mention of the name.

Poor people, failures, misfortunes.

Little liberties taken with your own house—such as opening its windows, sitting in its door, carrying bundles out or in, and staying in it through the summer.

Any thing old or mended, or that hints, however indirectly, at want of money.

Imagine the position of a woman like Mrs. Fetish! She has but one maid, and nearly all the sewing of the family; also the fine ironing, the desserts, and the marketing on her shoulders. She is in reality an anxious and overworked woman, full of petty cares and small contrivances. But Mrs. Grundy's ideal woman is an extravagant woman of leisure. Therefore Mrs. Fetish spends her whole life in representing a Mrs. Fetish of this sort. Think of spending your whole life in hiding away your real life, its sayings and doings, and all the while submitting meekly to the system of taboos above described! Where else shall we find such fidelity, such patience, such persistency, such eternal vigilance?

Mrs. Fetish cost us all a troublesome day. She is as irritating as a bed of nettles, and as infectious to Mrs. Lumpkin as scarlet-fever; but I end as I began, by admiring the magnificent fidelity of these New York dervishes. Pagan it may be, but it is still magnificent and disinterested. Mrs. Grundy has no titles or insignia to bestow, no Paradise to promise; nothing but the certainty that at the first hint of your misfortune, sickness, or poverty, she will turn her shadowy back upon you. Wonderful Mrs. Grundy! More wonderful Mrs. Fetish!

ICED MUSLINS.

ICED muslins for summer!—It has, doubtless, occurred to many a one, while admiring the beautiful effects produced by frost on windows, to imagine how delightful it would be if a sensation of coolness could be produced in the sultry days of summer by the aspect of those effects artificially reproduced. The imagination has been realized. It is known that, by means of almost any ordinary salt, reduced to a liquid, and applied with a brush to window-panes, those fairy-like forms of crystalline foliage may be successfully reproduced; and that, with a little chemical ingenuity, any tone of color may be given to them, from snowy white to richest purple or coolest green. That process is well known; but another step in advance has recently been taken in the same direction, by means of which muslins may be similarly iced for summer wear. The line which separates a pretty experiment from a commercial product is that which may be drawn between results obtained by an original manipulation, which can only be reproduced by a repetition of the same original means, and those results which, once perfected, can be reproduced ad infinitum, by mere mechanical processes. Daguerreotype was only a pretty toy till Mr. Talbot discovered the means of producing the same effects on paper, and a process for multiplying the image when once produced. An analogous method has been discovered by Mr. Bertsch, and practically applied by M. Kuhlman, for multiplying, as from an engraved plate, the exquisite effects of the crystalline foliage just described. The process is simply as follows: The elegant crystalline ramifications being produced in the first instance upon polished metal, instead of glass, a sheet of soft metal, such as lead, is then laid upon the saline crystallization, and a powerful roller is passed over it, by means of the steady and powerful pressure of which an exact impress of the foliated ramifications, in every minute detail, is secured. The metallic seal thus obtained is, however, too soft to print from, but an electrotype in copper is readily obtained, by means of which any number of impressions can be taken, in any tone of icy grays, or pale silvery greens, or any other cool tint. In order to secure continuity of design, without stop or interruption, the first manipulation takes place upon a polished cylinder, by means of which a continuous pattern, "never ending, still beginning," is imparted to as many thousand yards of any textile fabric as may be required. So that, for the first time in the fanciful story of fashion, iced muslin, for the summer season, may be had in any quantity. O ye nymphs of icy heart, let me see you clothed in the appropriate livery of iced muslin!

FORTUNE-TELLING.

THE fire-light dances upon the floor,
All sounds are hushed, we have closed the door,
That naught may disturb the secrecy
Of the wonderful, charming mystery
Revealed in the cards, which are surely wise,
Scanned by the truth of her dear, soft eyes.

There's a witching sound in the voice that takes Its spell from the music each accent wakes!
I listen enraptured at each sweet tone,
And fear my fortune is still unknown,
Marveling much if her mystic art
Has raveled the secret hid in my heart.

Pursued by distress, which is clubs I know—
But who heeds clubs, where my love can't go;
But my real distress is not far away,
It lies in my suit should her will say nay.
Does she know my suit? I can hardly guess;
'Tis all in the hand which my life would bless.

A doubt in a spade—may it sweep the crust
Of all worldly thought to a silent dust;
May the dust give birth to a flowering hope,
That shall hold no blight in its aim or scope,
Until but a single heart I see,
Which is always the highest card for me.

A diamond lady she says I'd win,
Though she knows I hold it a shameful sin
To look for the sparkle which money buys,
Compared with the light of her own dear eyes;
When truer meaning and brighter rays
Flash out in her smile and speech and ways.

"Now shuffle the cards—divide them again,"
I ask that no fate may divide us twain.
"There's the Queen of Hearts, so stanch and true;
I think she lingers to be with you."
"For life!" I whisper. "No, no," she says;
"She only follows your fortune's maze."

"Then muse of a wish and shuffle again."
"You know my wish," is my answering strain.
"I dare not know it," she says to me;
"The cards must evoke the prophecy."
I think you'll have it, though not quite sure,
For you must not believe all a woman's lore."

"Have done!" I exclaim, "the hour is late;
In the cards don't lie my future fate:
It dwells in a certain tender spell
A magical presence has woven well;
In a woman's love, shall my fortune be,
Bestowed as the dearest boon for me."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE mental cultivation produced by the study of good pictures is wholesome and valuable. Life, with many, is altogether too prosaic; and the awakening to a sense of the beauty about us is ennobling. We understand and enjoy Nature better from having studied her through artistic representations, and unconsciously increase our pleasures by an added value and beauty to the most familiar and common things. And any intelligent person who will keep his eyes open, and study the best pictures within his reach, will soon become sensible of a new power—and that without having made any laborious preparation, or sacrificed much time. Yet it is scarcely sufficient to drop into the Fifth Avenue Gallery of Art, to give a languid glance at the "Old Oaken Bucket," to exclaim, "How pretty!" and then saunter out again; nor is a careless, hasty tour through the rooms of the Academy of Design likely to improve the taste much, though it may give a momentary pleasure. Paintings should be examined slowly, and not too many at a time. There are few luxuries attended with so much fatigue as that which a picture-gallery imposes, according to the ordinary method of examination. The eye and mind become weary, and only a confused impression of an endless variety of subject and color remains. Far better search for all the fine points in a few paintings than to rush through the whole list in a single visit.

And when you are tired of studying the pictures, and want to rest eyes and thoughts a little, it is amusing to study the people. Indeed, it is very curious to notice the different methods of "seeing the pictures." Those two ladies came in five minutes ago, walked leisurely through a couple of the rooms, have seated themselves comfortably, and are now loudly discussing Mrs. Somebody's party and the difficulties which attended the arrangements for dancing. What do they care about Art? They can say they have been to the Academy of Design, if they are asked—is not that enough? There comes one—an artist, perhaps, with wild-looking hair, and wilder eyes. He rushes through the rooms, stops, gazes fixedly at one painting, then at another—suddenly takes out paper and pencil, and makes an off-hand sketch. A young lady enters—her glance sweeps the sides of the rooms, but rests on nothing. Here come a couple—the lady's mind is apparently absorbed in finding the numbers in the catalogue, but the gentleman shows a good deal of discriminating taste. These two gentlemen must be regular critics. Notice that quiet lady carefully studying the paintings—and that merry child who eagerly picks out all the flowers and kittens. Surely those are lovers softly chatting apart—they are painting their own life-pictures. A sarcastic critic mercilessly ridicules every thing in audible tones. That ill-matched couple are not enjoying the exhibition highly—the lady is yawning, and her husband can scarcely keep her awake. And so the panorama passes on.

Apropos of paintings, the Palais de l'Industrie in Paris is now occupied by the annual Exhibition of fine arts—pictures, sculpture, engravings, and architectural designs. A very great improvement has taken place this year in the arrangements of the Exhibition by turning the ground-floor of the building into a garden, where the sculptors' contributions are seen to advantage. Here is a floral and horticultural show. Fruits and flowers are placed on plots of green-sward, round about which are pathways and seats for repose. In the centre of the garden some monumental sculpture is placed, while the ordinary figures, busts, and groups are tastefully scattered round the garden; the whole producing a pretty effect, and forming a pleasant retreat from the hot and often crowded picture-galleries above. The galleries of the Palace of Industry are large, convenient, and well lighted. On Sundays the Exhibition is opened gratuitously. The entrance fee on other days is one franc.

A certain newspaper in North Carolina announces that ten promising young men in that vicinity are anxious to procure situations as sons-in-law in some respectable families. In return they are willing to be used as parlor ornaments, keep pound-cake from mouldering, scatter papa-in-law's greenbacks, and make ten fair damsels extremely happy. Here is a chance for somebody who ought to be improved by dotting parents.

The dreadful gloom which has hung over Port Jervis since that terrible railroad catastrophe is now, in some measure, passing away. Several of the wounded still remain at the hotels, many having sufficiently recovered to be taken to their homes. There is reason to believe that there are others besides those known to be dead who are yet unaccounted for. An infant, about five months old, was found at the wreck, and, no one claiming it, was adopted by a gentleman of the village.

A Century Plant in Troy is in full glory of blossom. The present owner has watched for this flower twenty-five years. A description of this rare plant, as given by the Troy Times, will interest many of our readers. The leaves are about three feet in length, lanceolate, about four inches in width, slight and flexible. From the midst of the leaves, which grow in a compact tuft at the base, rises a long, slender stem, perhaps four inches in diameter and fifteen feet high, cylindrical in form and crowned with a group of flowers, perhaps twenty in number, each mounted on a separate peduncle. The flower is funnel-form, with one pistil, six stamens, and six petals, about six inches long, and the prevailing color a beautiful crimson. The petals are whitish on the inside, folding closely about the stamen about half-way up, then spreading. The stamen has a crimson filament holding up another thickly covered with its olive-green dust. When the bloom is fresh the petals incline together at the top, but after a few hours curl outward. The plant continues in bloom for several weeks, during which fresh flowers replace the drooping blossoms, so that the beauty of the crown is not diminished.

There was doubtless more honesty in the following petition, which a little Parisian grisette was heard to murmur while kneeling in Notre Dame, than in multitudes of set prayers offered by the wise and learned: "Oh, beloved St. Joseph, grant me a good husband, plenty of ironing to do, shirt-collars without starch, and charcoal without smoke, and to my dear old aunt an easy dying; all as speedily as may be!"

A very poetical answer was it which the driver of a coach in Pennsylvania made, when he left his horses to get some water for the young ladies inside. Being asked by a stranger what he stopped for, he replied: "I am watering my flowers!"

The following beautiful incident may teach a lesson of trust to all, as well as show what loving reliance children have in those who have never deceived them:

Some time ago a boy was discovered in the street, evidently bright and intelligent, but sick. "What are you doing here?" inquired the gentleman who found him.

"Waiting for God to come for me," he said.

"What do you mean?" said the gentleman, touched by the pathetic tones of the answer, and the condition of the boy, in whose eyes and flushed face he saw the evidences of fever.

"God sent for mother and father and little brother," he said, "and took them away to his home up in the sky; and mother told me when she was sick that God would take care of me. I have no home; nobody to give me any thing; and so I came out here and have been looking so long in the sky for God to come and take care of me as mother said he would. He will come, won't he? Mother never told a lie."

"Yes, my lad," said the gentleman, overcome with emotion; "He has sent me to take care of you."

The child's eye flashed, and a smile of triumph breaking over his face, he said:

"Mother never told a lie, Sir; but you have been so long on the way."

The Princess Marguerite has, of course, received many elegant presents on the occasion of her marriage. Among these is a magnificent jewel casket, presented by the municipality of Turin. It is of massive gold incrustured with Oriental lapis lazuli, and enriched with every variety of precious stones. The figure at the top of the lid is seven inches high, and represents Aurora. The jewel case stands on four feet, each two inches high, and chased with foliage. An arabesque, formed with three hundred and fifty-two pearls and four emeralds decorates the centre. Upon the four faces in mosaic, the field of which is rubies and the cross pearls, the four escutcheons of the House of Savoy stand out in relief on a gold ground. At the side of these escutcheons there are eagles' heads and oak branches in relief, and these are surrounded with a ribbon on which are inscribed the insignia of the Order of the Annunziata, surmounted by a helmet adorned with leaves. There are also other inscriptions indicating the growth of the House of Savoy. The Roman ladies have also sent an elegant present of a basket made of precious stones, one stone alone being valued at 27,000 francs. It was presented to the Princess by a deputation of nine Roman ladies. The Neapolitan ladies have offered the "Pearl of Savoy," a gold locket mounted with diamonds. In the centre there is a large pearl surrounded by diamond leaves and a fine pear-shaped pearl hangs from the medaillon. The taste and workmanship of this beautiful basket are alike exquisite.

The "American Woman's Educational Association" proposes to establish an institution of learning in Aiken, South Carolina. Its object is to train women for the practical duties of life, there being a preparatory, a collegiate, and a professional department. While knowledge from books will be judiciously inculcated a special aim of the Association will be to fit American women for positions of usefulness and independence in remunerative employments; and also to instruct them in all the duties of a thoroughly competent housewife. Several years ago a school of this character was established in the West, and has proved a complete success. Aiken is said to be a favorable and healthful location; the winter being short and mild, the summer heat never extreme, water plenty and pure, and the surrounding country beautiful.

Yes, there are undoubtedly two sides to the question which is discussed so frequently. There are two sides to almost every question; and one must look on both sides to see all the bearings of a matter. As a general rule violent advocates of two opposing courses in life are alike to be distrusted, and good common-sense leads one to take a middle path. Certainly, the mission of woman in this Nineteenth century is a topic which has brought out the most antagonistic views and feelings. Wisdom will sift out the truth and use it, no matter how much error and bitterness is mingled with it. With which suggestion, we make one or two quotations from exchanges:

"Judging from the tone of advocates of 'woman's rights,' it would appear that women are adapted to shine in every position in life except that of mothers or housekeepers; that their true position is the doctor's office, the lawyer's study, and the halls of Congress. Now whatever women are really adapted for one thing is clear: their 'advocates' are remarkably adapted to pick out the most comfortable places in life for the ladies, and leave the worst for the men. We have said they were to be lawyers, doctors, 'Congressmen'; in fact, any thing of the kid-glove class of profession that may be come-at-able; but what is very remarkable, while claiming so much generally considered to be masculine, they never urge their right to be sailors, coal-miners, wood-haulers, or farm laborers! In this particular they evince a clearness of perception as to what is 'nice,' which shows how superior woman's judgment is to that of man, who has so unrighteously usurped her place."

It is quite evident that the writer of the above had some spite against the whole subject of "woman's rights," if not against woman herself, for daring to have any rights at all; but that is no reason why the grain of truth hidden in the paragraph should not be picked out and used. An editor of more good sense, as well as of more gallantry, remarks, in an article on the "Position of Woman:"

"Give her free choice, and does any sensible man fear that a refined and educated woman will choose any work unfitted for her simply because she has the privilege of doing so? Woman has a right to do whatever she can do—and her own instincts will guide her to her appropriate work. All she wants is free choice—the same that is given to the meanest white man alive. The feeling that places obstacles in the way of the culture and the honorable employment of any human being—man or woman—is but the relic of a barbarous age, and must yield before the advancing idea of individual liberty—liberty of conscience, of judgment, of action."

An exchange says that "nothing on the face of the earth equals cool water as a remedy for burns." The burned portion should be soaked several hours in water. Persons whose hands have been severely burned have experienced such relief by placing them in a basin of water at the bedside that they could sleep comfortably all night, and wake to find themselves almost as well as ever! The remedy is very simple, and easily tried.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE civil marriage of Mademoiselle Patti with the Marquis de Caux, so often announced and so often contradicted, has at last been celebrated; the religious ceremony will not take place till Mademoiselle Patti is free from all her theatrical engagements. The Marchioness de Caux will then be appointed superintendent of all the court theatres, when she will be, in a nobiliary point of view, one of the greatest ladies of the court.

The Marquis de Caux is of very ancient nobility. He even claims to be descended from the old Seigneurs of Normandy, who styled themselves kings. The name of the King of Yvelot has been rendered illustrious by Béranger's ballad. The King of the Pays de Caux was one of the ancestors of the brilliant Marquis, whose celebrity is to-day more modest. He passes for the best dancer in Paris, and has filled the fatiguing post of leading the cotillion in all the court balls for several years past. This winter, however, either because the Empress dances no longer, or for some other reason, he has renounced these functions. He was chosen, on account of his ancient nobility, to meet the King of Spain when the latter came to visit the Exposition. As is known, the Spaniards lay great stress on old nobility and the observance of rules of etiquette. The King Don Francisco de Assis must have been satisfied.

THE PRINCESS DE METTERNICH AT THE OPERA BALL.

Physically, the Marquis de Caux is still young, of average height, and elegant mien. He is fair, with a handsome mustache and scanty hair. He is courtly in manner, and very fastidious in his dress. All winter he has been a faithful habitué of the Théâtre Italien, always seated in a position near the orchestra, where he could most easily admire the diva Patti, and be recognized, moreover, by the invariable rose in his button-hole. The Marchioness de Caux has fifteen months more to devote to her scenic engagements, after which it may be asserted that she will disappear, at least from the public, and lyric art will have lost its brightest star.

There are fêtes peculiar to Paris, and which present so marvelous a spectacle that not only strangers are surprised thereby but also the Parisians themselves. Such was the ball given at the grand opera in behalf of the national work for the aid of the wounded of all countries. Nothing was lacking to attract the multitude. The Christian end proposed; the list of Lady Patronesses, which numbered the best-known names in the diplomatic and official worlds—Madames de Metternich, de Seebach, the Princess de Sagan, the Countess de Pourtalès, the Marquise de Gallifet, Madame Fleury, the wife of the General, the wives of the Marshals Canrobert, Randon, Niel; Madame de Moltke, etc.; and, lastly, the brilliancy of the decoration, which was designed to surpass any thing of the kind ever before invented.

The ball was to begin at ten o'clock, and as early as eight an immense crowd thronged the environs of the opera to witness the arrival of the carriages, and was with great difficulty kept back by a squadron of horse-guards in full dress, who prevented the pedestrians from blocking up the open space opposite the entrance of the theatre. The Opera-house was illuminated from the bottom to the top with jets of gas which ran along the lines of the building and formed over the peristyle a gigantic eagle and different symbols. Immense carpets covered the ground in front of the Opera-house and of the vestibule. Within, the walls were buried under clumps of exotic trees, which mounted to the ceiling. The staircases were lined with two rows of cut flowers, reflected by huge mirrors placed on all the landing-places. The green-room and the corridors were decorated in the same manner. The amphitheatre had been transformed into a vast saloon, where were seated, in a double row of crimson velvet easy-chairs, the whole Committee of lady patronesses, dazzling the eye with precious stones. Immense temporary staircases had been constructed at the right and the left, to facilitate access to the parquet; and the stage had been leveled in such a manner as to form only one vast ball-room. At the end of the theatre was the orchestra, led by Strauss. Skillfully arranged corridors permitted the promenaders to make the tour of the ball-room behind the seats of the ladies without being too much obstructed by the crowd. The four rows of boxes were filled with beautifully-dressed women; and, what was rare on such an occasion, the ladies of the demi-monde were in so small a minority as not to be distinguished.

At a quarter of eleven the Emperor and Empress entered their box, at the right of the stage, and the ball was opened by an official quadrille, in which figured Madame de Metternich, de Pourtalès, de Moltke, and Canrobert, and the Duke of Sagan, Count de Solms, Count Degu, and M. de Moltke.

The Empress wore a tunic of light green faille over a puffed dress of white tulle, which was trimmed with white blonde and caught up at the sides with clusters of blush roses mixed with diamond roses. The coiffure was composed of a diadem of diamond roses, and curls falling behind. The Emperor was in black, with the grand cordon of the Legion of Honor.

The Princess de Metternich wore the most ravishing toilette that it is possible to imagine—over a dress of white tulle puffed, a tunic caught up, à la Pompadour, of pink gros grain, glacée with white. This tunic was confined by fanciful bouquets and trains of rose geraniums; the sash of white tulle was caught up behind in a pouf by clusters of rose geraniums. Corsage bordered with rose geraniums. Diadem of olive leaves in the hair; and a double row of diamonds around the neck.

It is fitting to say a few words about the Princess de Metternich, whose illustrious name has gained still greater éclat and popularity since the arrival in France of Prince Richard de Metternich. No woman ever more absolutely swayed the sceptre of fashion. Every thing here is à la Metternich—bonnets, cloaks, costumes, and equipages. This Hungarian lady was determined to reign triumphant over all the Parisians, and she has succeeded. It is true that she has been aided by an immense fortune and the highest position that it is possible for any one to hold who is not of royal blood. No matter! This young lady is not less historical than Madame Récamier or Madame Tallien, and has certainly more mind than either of them. Madame de Metternich is still very young, between twenty-five and thirty, and is not pretty. She calls herself ugly. The upper part of her face is nevertheless very beautiful; a well-defined forehead, large, brown, expressive eyes, a rosy complexion, light chestnut hair, too large a mouth, an irregular nose, and an imperfectly oval face; such is Madame de Metternich. To all this her expression lends a marvelous charm. Her air is amiable and winning. Can such a portrait be styled ugly? Her slender and graceful figure admirably sets off her dress, and her little arched-foot looks charmingly in the boots that she has brought into fashion.

To dress her insures a dress-maker's fortune. She has a wonderful gift of imparting an artistic and classical elegance to every thing she wears. She is now the queen of fashion. It is said that, in the future, Madame de Metternich may play a great political rôle, and that her mind is equal to the loftiest occasions.

Madame Canrobert, who was seated by the side of the Princess de Metternich, wore a dress of green tulle with a tunic of green faille caught up with clusters of broad leaved lilies, and leaves trailing from the long trained skirt. Her coiffure was very simple—a cluster of lilies with braids behind. Madame Canrobert has regular and finely-cut features, exceedingly white skin, and jet black hair. The blonde Countess de Pourtalès formed an admirable contrast in her black Watteau dress, with a full short tunic of black lace looped up here and there. Her coiffure consisted of rosettes of black velvet with centres formed of diamond stars, and a large butterfly of diamonds on the side of her head. The grand cordon of Bavaria, of white watered ribbon with blue net-work, brilliantly set off this costume, somewhat severe but in perfect taste.

The Countess de Seebach was in white faille, with a profusion of white bows, looped up, and tunic bordered with white lace. The Marchioness de Gallifet was in white taffeta with three rows of pinked quilling, and a tunic of yellow faille caught up by full clusters of ebony leaves.

The Duchesse de Mouchy was in white silk with two tunics, glittering with magnificent emeralds, her bridal present from the Emperor. She likewise wore these jewels at the marriage of her brother, Prince Achille Murat, to the Princess of Mingrelia, which took place recently in the Russian Church. Mingrelia, by-the-way, is the ancient Colchis. The young Princess of Mingrelia is very beautiful. She wore a dress of white faille covered with a tunic of white lace, caught up with clusters of orange blossoms and white leaves. Her coiffure consisted of a small diadem of orange blossoms and diamond foliage. The ceremony was a brilliant one. The witnesses were Marshal Canrobert and Prince Joachim Murat, the brother of the bridegroom. All the Parisian world of fashion, invited by letter, witnessed the ceremony, which was performed according to the rites of the Russian Church.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

A SPRING-TIDE TALE.

THE days have grown, the years are long
Since first I drank that fount of song.
The failing lips were faint and old
From which that stream of beauty rolled.
The waning eyes were touched with night
Which lent to me that inward light.
He fast was fading from his place,
I knelt, a child, before his face;
Yet were our lives not far apart,
The poet is a child in heart.

It was a simple Spring-tide tale.
I feel it now, the breathsome gale
That swayed and kissed the almond flowers
Which flushed that sunny nook of ground,
By cedars flanked, with mountains round.
From peak to peak the joyous hours
Danced in the sunlight, each alone,
And following each a sister flown.

I mark the chasing shadows pass
The lark's light spur along the grass.
With gold encrowned, yet humbly sweet,
Fair blossoms breathe about our feet.
Roused to what glory round him lies,
The cuckoo shouts his quaint surprise.
A sympathetic music weaves
A chain of song through all the leaves:
To that same strain 'twixt heaven and earth
Which heralds here the violet's birth
Some wild bird, singing on its spray,
Rocks in the dim woods far away.

He sang: I seemed to live anew.
A child I sprang; a soul I grew.
The common room with books strewn o'er,
Thus listening, seemed as heaven's floor.
Soft in that gathered hush-like rest
I drew the Spring-tide to my breast.
Never again should pastime weak
Keep back my foot from mountain peak.
Never again should heedless prate
Knock idly at my soul's shut gate.
I was awake, abroad, and full
Of that keen joy no time can dull.
Henceforth, the world of my delight
With other grace was robed and dight;
The gracious clouds grew arched with light,
The cedars plumed before my sight.
The happy brooks with silver feet
Came rushing forth my steps to meet.
The surging winds through inland trees
Bore me rich sounds of far-off seas.
With song and I 'twas May-time weather,
And we two danced the woods together.

Thou art not silent, art not gone,
Oh! living soul, in meekness flown;
True Poet, father of all good,
Who ever gave me flowers for food.
Who can not read the scroll on high
When such a sun goes down the sky;
And though its own long day be o'er
Leaves still a light unknown before?
He to his steadfast course was true,
I the soft cloud that took his hue.
'Twas his to warm my duller frame,
To set my misty mind aflame;
'Tis mine alone—'tis all I crave—
Even with the parting light he gave
To cast a glory on his grave.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER IV.

DERRICK had suggested the possibility of Cuthbert's improving his position by the formation of acquaintances among his new neighbors, and now gave him every opportunity for that purpose—sending him through the county on collection tours or other business, which sometimes kept him away for three days together, and taking pains to introduce him to every body who called at the Roost. At first Cuthbert made little progress. Half a dozen years of pedagogy had put a pallor in his cheek, a stoop in his shoulders, and a precision in his manner which ill consorted with the bluff speech and bearing of the stalwart hunters and graziers among whom he was constantly thrown. His naturally shy disposition was nowise improved by his quick perception of the fact that these hale centaurs looked upon him as a milksop, and felt for him no stronger feeling than good-natured contempt. He was unspeakably grateful to Derrick for having snatched him at a stroke out of the most helpless penury—so grateful that it seemed to him a kind of half treason even to confess to himself that he was not satisfied with his lot. And yet, his present life was so different from that landed proprietorship—that world-respected position of a well-to-do country gentleman, with cattle on a thousand hills, tenants, crops, improvements, hospitalities, all of his own, which he had pictured to himself, reproaching his unfilial hard-heartedness the while, between regrets, on the journey from Mellenville to his father's death-bed. Robinson Crusoe was grateful enough for his island and his goats, but he could not help sighing for the plum-pudding and roast beef of Old England. Cuthbert, do his best, could never recover the shock of being dashed from the pinnacle of prosperity. To push the metaphor, the bones of his manhood seemed broken, though he had escaped with unspilled brains. The pang of his disappointment hurt him too deep for utterance even to his wife. The subterranean fire which burned in his nature lay in strata so far down that he could not get at it by any digging—could not open any access to it for the rain of human pity or the quenching breath of prayer. Men had never called him proud—nor was he, in the usual sense. His surface showed no inaccessible hauteur; he was self-diffident, deferent to others, to a degree that was a vice of character. But all the more because his pride lay so deep, the injury which it had sustained weakened his whole nature. All his overlying faculties suffered a partial paralysis from it. He felt as if he had struck flag forever—made his final surrender to circumstances. The schemes of self-improvement in favorite studies of which his academy labors had so long allowed him to steal only sweet, hurried tastes; the tours he had marked out to be taken in company with his wife; the education of his little girl according to long-cherished theories of childish development; books to be written; multitudes of things to be done when wealth should bring him elegant leisure—none of these were out of the range of human attainment—a longer manhood lay before him than many shallower natures have needed to retrieve much worse disasters. But the whole fabric of his visions had been based on the props which one rude shock had entirely knocked away—and without the base he could not reconstruct the visions. There are some men who can climb to the top of the hardest ladder, but once knocked down can never climb up again. Cuthbert was one of these. His trouble left him half-hearted in every thing, and took the cheery vim, the sense of motive and remunerativeness, out of every effort he made, from carrying out his ideal of life to picking up a pin.

Derrick's quick eye saw the process which had taken place in him. As Cuthbert was mechanically climbing a column of figures one hot afternoon in the office at the Roost, the Doctor said to him, "Come, Kearney, put down that pen, and run over to the course with me. There's to be a fine run at five o'clock between Brown Sue and the Deil's Own—and you've got the dyspepsia."

"Have I?" said Cuthbert, with a faint smile. "I never have any pain in my stomach."

"That's not necessary. Dyspepsia's a devil of a lodger. When he puts up at your hotel he don't always begin by smashing the furniture in his own room. He's apt first to pull a bell that rings in the business office—makes himself known in the head, you know—or shows his ugly mug at the attic windows—that's to say, the eyes; and yours look fagged as any thing. I've watched you a long time, and if you don't take care you'll be a confirmed dyspeptic. So come and stir your blood over at the course for an hour with me! But first a prescription—let's see—Spiritus Frumenti, 5 iv; Aq. Pura, quant. suff.—less the better."

"You really think it will do me good?" asked Cuthbert, timidly, remembering the severe Puritan traditions which shortly after blossomed into Maine Law in the land whence he came.

"Do you think I'd prescribe it for you if it wouldn't, or take the medicine myself?" replied Derrick, bringing from a closet two tumblers and a bottle of the oiliest old whisky made in Bourbon County.

Cuthbert took the hearty horn which Derrick measured him with a wry face, and the same instinctive twinge of conscience which from sheer force of habit must be felt by even the most thoroughly converted Jew on his first taste of pork; then put on his hat, and accompanied Derrick to the race-track. As he went he felt a marvelous change stealing over his views of life. For the first time since that terrible evening in May, when he sat silent with his wife and Lily, he saw that ruin has no existence to a resolved spirit. The old self-respect which had buoyed him through his worst distresses as a pedagogue quietly returned to put its hand under his chin, and lift his head to the full stature of a man. As he passed through the long, straggling main street of Orlenville he met several people with whom he was acquainted, and felt a serene satisfaction in looking them full in the face instead of hurrying by them with a shy nod. Something infused a conscious grace into the bow he gave them; there was a spiritual pleasure in the courtesy, an animal enjoyment in the mere muscular effort of the act. He wondered inwardly how he could ever have supposed that Brewer, the grocer, always said to himself, when he bought coffee of him, "Oh, I needn't give him the best—he's only a hanger-on of Derrick Dalmager's;" he felt sure he had wronged Sparhawk, the attorney, in charging him with an habitual sneer when they met; he was convinced that Flicker, the village tailor, did not feel contempt for him as an ousted pretender to the Dalmager demesne, and did not make a mental note of him as the person who, when he ordered his mourning suit, had said, "Garnet Run is my place—send there." There was more goodness in the world; more confidence between man and man; more delicacy, mutual respect, toleration, and allowance than he had suspected. The perspiration poured from beneath his Panama as, with shoulders erect, he strode up street with Derrick at a gait which tasked even the young Kentuckian's wiry sinews; yet, as he wiped his forehead, he could not refrain from the enthusiastic observation what a lovely day it was; he had never, even in New England, seen the grass and trees greener at this season of the year. Derrick eyed him narrowly. "You feel better, don't you?" said he, with a quiet smile. "Yes, indeed; this little run in the air refreshes me marvelously," answered Cuthbert.

So the Doctor prescribed him "this little run in the air" every afternoon.

On the race-ground the Doctor at every step met some new friend or acquaintance. Wherever he stopped for any longer recognition than a bow he gave Cuthbert an introduction, and the young man came out of himself with a brilliancy which took his friend entirely by surprise. All the facts he had ever read about the turf, without the least interest in the matter which could naturally fix them, seemed voluntarily to reassemble themselves in good order, where his memory could lay ready hand on them, and he talked horse in a way quite delightful to several old comrades of the Doctor, who had heretofore supposed his knowledge of that animal limited to parsing and defining him. He made himself agreeable to every body—even, what was quite a new sensation to his self-depreciative nature, to Cuthbert Kearney—and said so many witty things, told so many good stories, that he was invited, as a most desirable ornament, to grace the members' stand. When the horses were stripped he made a happy guess, and chose the Deil's Own as his favorite—but it did not seem a guess to him; he felt inspired with a sudden light which revealed all the animal's points; and his heart throbbed with an ecstasy unknown since boyhood, as he followed the undulating pair of contestants with straining eyes all round the ellipse—then saw his choice pant up the home stretch and under the string, winner by just a neck.

"I told you so!" said he, breathlessly, when the joyful shriek in which he had joined the winner's friends died away, patting Derrick on the back with the first show of spontaneous familiarity he had ever made in his intercourse with that stronger nature.

Derrick looked around, concealing his surprise under a gay little laugh. "I wish I'd known what a prophet you are," said he; "it would have saved me five hundred dollars." He drew out his pocket-book, paid his bets, and the two went home to Garnet Run in the barouche which Derrick had ordered Perro to bring for them to the race-course gate.

"Kearney," said Derrick, as they drove, "I never dreamed how much there is of you. Why, you've been quite another man this afternoon. Keep this up, and you'll take with our people like mad. I'd hardly know you for a Yankee—you came out of yourself in such a free and easy, hearty style. Keep it up, my boy—keep it up!"

The effect of the prescription was wearing off in the evening breeze and the quiet of riding; Cuthbert's head and shoulders were subsiding again into their old melancholy droop; and the afternoon which they had left behind them seemed to him something strangely unreal. He answered the Doctor with a shame-faced glance—his pale, beardless cheeks suffusing like a girl's at a congratulation which his self-consciousness was half disposed to regard as irony. But the Doctor met him with a sincere gaze of admiration, and his spirits rose again until on dismounting, and feeling his little girl's welcoming arms around his neck at the porch, he heard her whisper,

"Do you feel sick, dear papa? Your breath smells just like grandpa's."

Cuthbert had learned the only way by which he could escape from his worst tormentor. He was his own jailer—his own dungeon. There was literal truth in Derrick's expression—he had "come out of himself." There was something so heavenly in the escape, that if once knowing the means he had refrained from using them, he would have been a stronger man than any prisoner in the Bastille who had sat motionless in his dungeon, with the master-key to all the barriers in his hand. And Cuthbert either was not a strong man, or was strong only for his own torture. Once "out of himself," and strength came to him. Say that this going out was only the prelude to a more terrible coming in; that the strength was only a semblance. Granted, the first assertion; but the return was far off—set down for no certain day—and while the ticket-of-leave held good, no franchised bondsman, no uncaged wood-thrush, no racked person whose cruel ropes are slackened, knows sweeter ecstasy of deliverance than did this poor quivering nature, let out into fresh air from the fires which gnawed him too far down to be rained out by woman's loving tears, or quenched by the hand of a confidant. The second assertion he would not have granted, nor can any fair, discerning mind grant it—however much in sympathy with the spirit which condemns the use of stimulants. The strength afforded is not mere semblance. Stimulus confers on a nature fresh to, or unjaded by it, a quickness of perception, a masterly promptness and giant facility of execution which enables the man to perform feats looked back on as incredible by his cooler head. If the man could remain for one year, without necessity of advance or danger of retrogression, at the point where he is left by the second glass of whisky, he could conquer the world. Just because the freedom of humanity would not be safe from him, all this divine power and ease is made a thing so evanescent—he hangs motionless just for an unappreciable instant on the pivot of an earthly omnipotence, and then the scale descends. He drinks again to retain the equilibrium; but that delicate poise is irrecoverable; he swings out of balance the opposite way. In the truth and the transitoriness—not in the spuriousness of the power—lies the danger of the fascination, and this was its danger to Cuthbert. While the effect of his doctor's prescription lasted he was all that his unstimulated nature dreamed of being, or bitterly owned it never could be: the sharp-sighted man of business, the quick-witted man of society, the sparkling conversationist, hopeful in his forecast, cheery and tolerant in his outlook on the world. When he argued he persuaded, and he gained his point when he used policy. He said the right thing at the right moment; his brain was clear and his hand steady; all his nature partook of inspiration—perceptive and executive faculties alike. He had come to Kentucky an awkward horseman, as most pedagogues, and no shot at all. Now he learned to ride and to shoot, that he might not lie beneath contempt among the people whose opinion must influence his fortune; and when he had primed himself, as well as his rifle, his aim was true as a sunbeam. When his own moral girths were tightened, so to speak, by a visit to the Doctor's closet, the fearlessness of his seat and the mastery of his hand compared favorably with any of his neighbors. With his growth in reputation among the rapid-paced men about him, as "not such a no 'count sort of fellow after all," a change crept over his own opinion of himself. He had been more of a "no 'count" person in his own eyes than in theirs. Now, partly because he really had made himself capable of taking a much larger share in the favorite activities of people round him, by acquiring habits and accomplishments which, without stimulants, he would never have plucked up heart to attempt; and partly because he daily drowned out that terrible voice which kept deriding his life as a failure, for several hours at least in the twenty-four, he felt a pride in himself which was the sweetest emotion he had ever known save those of husbandly love and fatherhood. Sometimes, especially in the early morning, his dejection was even deeper than of old—so deep that this pride of self-escape seemed dearly bought—for he questioned whether it was not paid for out of the husband's and father's store. But he banished the question more and more successfully every day by the plea: "It is my best friend—my doctor's—prescription." For a while his wife gently murmured at his breath—no longer fresh as a baby's—and seemed disposed, remembering the same traditions of Puritan abstinence in which Cuthbert had been brought up, to chide him on high moral grounds; but at length the medical plea answered her also, and every monitor was lulled except Lily, whose tender eyes had always a touch of sadness in them when she kissed him.

Congeniality of habits gradually drew many of Derrick's friends closer around Cuthbert. He had little money to lose; and gambling, even when stimulus relaxed the morbid ties of his native caution, had no fascination for him, but he went on the turf from a love of its intrinsic excitement, because he had become acquainted with horses, and felt thrilled to his fingertips with the passion of contest; for the sake of the convivial pleasure which attended races, and the society of men who appreciated his new self as none but his wife and child ever had his old one. Little by little the habit of drinking grew upon him. The prescription in a few months lost its effect, and it became necessary to double the dose. His nervous system was utterly lacking in Derrick's great qualities of balance and self-control. He was one of the men who can no more hold themselves for years at a certain limit than they can jump off the eaves of a house and say, "I will stop at the third story." The doubled afternoon prescription soon got to be preluded by plentiful wine at the dinner which he daily took at the Orlenville Hotel with Derrick, unless the latter was off on his visits, and that presently led to a social "nip" from the closet bottle about eleven in the morning, with friends who dropped in at the Roost as he was drawing his first long breath over the office books. The dispatch with which he cleared off his business increased so manifestly with this change in his habits that before the winter set in he had abolished all limits whatever, and took a drink whenever he felt like it during the day. However artfully such a progress may be described, the condensation of its steps into a few lines must always make it seem abrupt, and leave the reader with a sense of impatient wonder that here—and here—and here again its victim took no warning. But in the case of a man who, like Cuthbert, rapidly loses susceptibility to any given measure of stimulant, and is compelled to produce the same effect by larger and constantly still larger doses, the progress is so insidious that warning comes too late. He only knows he has been drinking for a short time, and that he is no more affected by it than at first. The process is as gradual to his consciousness as if it consumed many years; and he is perpetually under the influence of drink without being aware of it. At Owlerville his companions were all like him; and Derrick, who alone could have felt the right, had never the idea of warning him. At home he never drank, and the remainder of his day's excitement which he brought there at evening was insufficient to alarm a wife who had never seen three intoxicated people in her life among the stern granite hills which sentinelled the virtue of Mellenville, and relied, moreover, on the Doctor's wisdom with a reverence like that she gave her Maker. Only when Cuthbert staid away from home for a night or two running did she grow gently querulous and pour her lovely mouth at him; but even this demonstration was always answered by the plea of the Doctor's business in another part of the county, and presently ceased altogether however long her husband might be gone. Only to Lily did the change never lose its strangeness. Perro one day, as a tribute of his heart's unspeakable devotion, brought in to her a live partridge which he had snared in the woods behind the house. "Here's a lubly pet for my little Missie!" said he, and laid the poor fluttering thing with its legs tied into her small warm hands.

"DO YOU THINK I'D PRESCRIBE IT FOR YOU IF IT WOULDN'T, OR TAKE THE MEDICINE MYSELF?"

"Perro, my dear old boy," said she, "don't its papa and mamma feel bad? Don't you think they're crying for it?"

"Oh no, Missie!" and he cast a worshipful smile on her innocence, showing his great white teeth from ear to ear. "Him no got fadder—no got mudder—dey gone dead long 'go, I specks. Dis full-grown bird, Missie."

"Is it a papa or a mamma, Perro?"

"It's a gempleman bird, shuah, Missie. But you don't like it, I can get you plenty more tuder kind. Seed a hen and a lot o' young chicks close by whar I cotech dis."

"Oh, Perro! Those are the mamma and the little girls—just like my mamma and Lily that you love so much! I know you do love me, too, Perro; and I want you to go with me right away, and take me where you caught this."

"Yes, Missie," answered Perro, too glad to serve her any way; and, lifting the household angel to that broad shoulder he was never so proud as when he could make her howdah, toted her up the hill to the cedar and chinquapin brush, where he had spread his net.

"Hark!" said Lily, as they passed the edge of the wood. "I hear something rustling."

Perro stopped, peered cautiously through the leaves, and pointed.

"Yes!" he whispered. "See 'em, Missie. Dat's dem same hen and chickens, shuah as I'm alive, p'ecious!"

He put her down as she asked and gave her his jack-knife. She cut the string that hopped the bird and set it gently on the ground. "Go, poor little papa—go back to your wife and your little Lily. Don't let them cry for you any more!"

But she knew not the nature of partridge papas. For a moment he rolled his black bead of an eye toward her face in appealing terror, crouched motionless on the dead leaves; then, realizing the liberty of his numbed legs, he leaped into the air, and right over the head of his putative family whirled away to answer the challenge of some belligerent male who was drumming fur in the centre of the wood—away from the bosom of domestic bliss to lose his plumes or his very eyes, perhaps, in the convivial society of some rollicking good fellow belonging to his own unsympathetic sex.

"Dat's de way wid dem he-birds," said Perro, with a sad shake of his head. "Don't care nuttin' for de she or de little ones after he's done courtin'."

But Lily looked after the flying partridge with eyes of piteous wonder; then through the leaves at the unconscious mother left to peck for her babies alone, and, hiding her face in Perro's sack pocket, began crying as if her heart would break.

"Oh, Missie! Missie! don't, dear, p'ecious darlin'!—don't, deary dear!" groaned Perro, clasping her in his arms in great distress, as he kneeled to take her head on his shoulder.

"You kept him—away—from them—just long enough to make—him—forget them," sobbed Lily. "Please don't do it again, or I'll think you're like the Doctor."

Perro gazed at her with a face of blank, unutterable astonishment. Then he seemed to catch an inkling of her meaning, and his own honest eyes filled with tears of the sincerest grief as he answered:

"Nebber—no, nebber! Nebber, sweet Missie! You forgive Perro dis time. Nebber—no, nebber again!"

When her blue eyes were dried he lifted her to his shoulder again with more than Old World chivalrous tenderness, and saying, "Now, beau'ful Miss Lily, ride home on her own ole brack ephelant!" ambled easily down the hill toward the house.

The autumn sun was setting, and its level rays streamed red across the lawn as they passed the wall of roses, where, by the window which it was still warm enough to keep open, leaning on the sill strewn with faded petals, the lovely face of Lily's mother, with a pensive loneliness it had not learned when first we saw it there, looked out into the dying daylight.

"Kiss me, blessing!" said the mother, and Perro reverently held her down to press the two sweet likenesses of the same mouth against each other. "Perro, has Mr. Kearney come home yet?" "Not yet, Missus." "Isn't it very late for him?" "Pretty late, Missus." "And the Doctor—?" "Massa Derrick say not be home till nine o'clock, Missus; him gone over to Beeport see very sick lady; say Kledda sit up give him some hot suppah, ma'am."

Mrs. Kearney sighed.

"Mamma feel very lonely?" said Lily, patting her face with gracious sympathizing tenderness.

"No-o, not very," she replied, smiling unutterable love at the little comforter. "Hold her there a minute, Perro, till I put something round her shoulders."

She ran away for a moment, and, coming back, wrapped her darling in a soft knit shawl. "Now, Perro," said she, "if she likes to play elephant with you a little longer, she can stay out on the lawn till the dew falls. Go out toward the gate, birdie, and look if you can see papa coming! He must be very tired, and he'll be so glad to see his little mouse!"

Perro gamboled away with the child throwing back kisses at her mother from his shoulder, and gleefully singing, "I'm a bird, and a mouse, and a puss, and a dove!—and a what else, Perro?"

"You're a p'ecious—and a darlin'—and a-a-Lady-baby-lamb!" recounted the elephant.

"I'm a Lady-baby-lamb!" shouted Lily, with a robin-gurgle of laughter at this last feat of her black philologist in the compounding of petnames. Her laugh went back to the rosy wall like a silver cascade tinkling right out of heaven into her mother's heart, then suddenly hushed as, coming near the gate, Lily caught sight, far down the road in the Owlerville direction, of a man coming toward the gate on foot. The sun had just set, and in the twilight he was too far off to be recognized. But though they could only make out the outline of his form, his behavior was manifestly most singular.

"Oh dear, Perro!" said Lily, "what do you think is the matter with him? See how he keeps going across the road. I'm afraid he's lost his way. See! now he's going back to the other side of the road again. Look! he leans against the fence as if he were dizzy. Now he comes over to this side—poor man, his legs bend right under him! Let's run right out and help him, Perro, dear old elephant. I'm so afraid he's sick!"

"No, Missie," said Perro, with one of his mournful head-shakes. "Him no want de doctor. Tink dat's ole Lon Thomas—libs in de little house a mile up de road; swore off at de 'tracted meeting down at Massa Pulpiduster's only two week las' Sunday, gone got drunk agin!"

"Drunk!" said Lily, standing on the top rail of the gate, held up by her faithful worshiper, and looking down the road with wide open eyes of anxious wonderment; "what's drunk, Perro?"

"Glad my sweet Missie nebber know, an' nebber had to break her sweet heart o' knowin'. Shouldn't ha' said dem words 'fore her, no how, but s'pose got tell her now. Drunk's takin' too much bad stuff, p'ecious lamb."

The object of her innocent interest drew slowly nearer in painful zigzags, with his chin dropping helplessly on his breast, and a battered hat smashed down over his eyes; his legs, as Lily had noticed, bending almost double at every movement—now inward, as he tottered feebly the distance of a child's step; now outward, as he made an effort to mend his pace by one frantic stride—until his foot caught a long sassafras root which had been washed bare in the mid-road by late fall rains, and he fell heavily forward on his poor face.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER.—The plainer napkins are folded for the table better; elaborate folds being too suggestive of hotels and restaurants. A good way is to roll them in a conical form for the goblet, or to fold them simply over the bread or roll when laid by the side of the plate.

C. D. M.—It is not necessary to thank a gentleman for escorting you when he has entreated the privilege, though it is certainly polite to express your pleasure at the entertainment you have enjoyed through his courtesy.

MABEL MOORE.—Braid your hair in three plaits and cross it at the back. Tie with narrow ribbons behind each ear. The velvet crosses of which you speak are made abroad, and could scarcely be executed neatly by an inexperienced hand. They are inexpensive, and may be found at almost any first-class fancy store.

ELLA HOLMES.—Linen back moiré is from $2.50 to $3 per yard, and can be found, in high colors, at any of the dry-goods establishments quoted by us. Silk moirés are from $5 to $8.

LIZZIE MASON.—At a few very fashionable weddings in New York lately the groom has been dressed in the English fashion, viz.: blue cloth coat with gilt buttons. Vest of the same. Lavender pantaloons, necktie, and gloves. The full dress style given in the New York Fashions of the Bazar of May 30 are adopted, however, by both grooms and guests at very gay and at very quiet weddings. The coat of black cloth is cut swallow-tail, with a broad collar rolling to the waist and faced with silk. The skirts are lined with silk, and sometimes with white silk. The vest may be either black or white. If black, it should be of the same cloth as the coat; if white, of corded silk. The vest collar must be also very low, with only one or two buttons to fasten it at the waist. The pantaloons fit the figure closely, and set better over shoes than boots, though gentlemen usually prefer boots for weddings. Necktie of white muslin folded, or of white silk. Black and lavender satin ties are also worn. Shirt fronts are merely double of the linen, and finely embroidered around the studs or in a vine up each side of the studs.

Standing collar broken at the pointed corners beneath the chin. Deep square cuffs plain or embroidered to match the bosom. Very small studs, with gold button at the neck just visible under the neck-tie. Large sleeve-buttons. Handkerchief with hem two inches wide. Silk beaver and white gloves.

MARIE.—Bismarck is no longer fashionable. The brown we alluded to as in demand for traveling dresses is a dead leaf color, and not the reddish tinge so much worn in the winter. A simple but stylish traveling dress has a gored skirt of brown cashmere, with a six inch flounce set on around the bottom. It is bound at the lower edge, and may be gathered at the top or in box-pleats. A fold of the cashmere two inches wide, piped with satin, conceals where the flounce is sewn on. The polonaise is of worsted poplin, striped brown and white. It buttons all the way down the front, and is looped up at the sides by three large pleats, with a brown button on each pleat. The trimming consists of three rows of brown braid with a cord fringe at the edge. Coat-sleeves.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

LOVE OR MARRIAGE?

A NOVEL.

By WILLIAM BLACK.
8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

An interesting plot, honest, earnest thought, and graceful language.—London Review.
The composition of a cultivated mind; it is full of thought, of careful writing, of pithy, of pungent, of epigrammatical remarks, and it is eloquent in suggestiveness.—London Leader.

The tale is simple enough, but well told, and in that lies its chief charm.—Athenaeum.

This novel is one of great power.... It is certainly the production of an imagination—we may almost say of a genius—which we should conceive fully capable of works of art that might live.—Spectator.

There is a freshness and freedom from affectation about this book that is extremely captivating.... It is a long time since we read a story of every-day life with such unflagging interest.—Examiner.

We must take it out of the category of works composed by the Camillas who skim over the fields of action and display their ankles in the fight. The characters of Helstone and old Glencairn are well conceived and developed. The latter especially is a good study, and seems to have been thought out fully and carefully by the author.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The author who can thus rivet the attention of the reader has accomplished no small victory in novel-writing, and such a victory is Mr. Black's beyond all question.—Star.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

BOSTON, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

FACETIÆ.

How long does a widow mourn for her husband?—She mourns for a second.

RECIPE FOR FINDING A HUSBAND.

More common-sense and less wit.
More useful occupation and less music.
More study of the Mysteries of the Kitchen and less of the Mysteries of Paris.
More mending of shirts and stockings and less making of bracelets.
Less display of toilettes that appall the purses of candidates for wedlock.
More proof to men that they will find in a wife a helpmeet and not an embarrassment.
This recipe, if thoroughly tried, will greatly lessen the number of bachelors.

Two friends, one an Englishman and the other a Frenchman, chanced to meet at the Paris Exposition.

"What! you in France, my dear William!" said the latter. "I am delighted to see you. How do you do?"

"Not very well. I have been married since I saw you last."

"That's good."

"No it isn't; for my wife was a shrew."

"I am sorry; that's bad."

"Not altogether; for she brought me a dowry of ten thousand pounds sterling."

"Ten thousand pounds! That's good. It consoles you."

"No, it doesn't, for I invested the money in heads of cattle, and they all died of the disease that has just been raging in England."

"That's bad."

"Not at all; for the skins brought me more than I had paid for the cattle."

"Then you are indemnified."

"No, not altogether; for I bought a fine house with the money, and it has just been burned."

"Oh, what a misfortune!"

"Not so great a one either, for my wife was in it and she was burned with the house."

PATENT LOVE-LETTER.

DEAR MISS,—After long consideration and much meditation upon the great reputation you possess in the nation, I have strong inclination to become your relation. If oblation is worthy of observation and can obtain commiseration, it will be an aggrandizement beyond all calculation of the joy and exultation of PETER H. PORTATION.

P. S.—I solicit your acceptance of the love and approbation, and propose the annexation of the lives and destination of Peter H. Portation and Marie Moderation.

THE ANSWER.

DEAR PETER,—I have perused your oration with great deliberation, and a little consideration at the great infatuation of your weak imagination to show such veneration on so slight a foundation. After mature deliberation and serious contemplation, I fear your proclamation is filled with adulation, or saying from ostentation, to display your education, by an odd enumeration or rather multiplication of words of like termination, though different in signification. But as I admire association and am in favor of annexation I acknowledge my inclination to accept with gratification the love and adoration set forth in your declaration, and will, with preparation, love, and animation remain with resignation and respect in the appellation of MRS. PETER H. PORTATION.

P. S.—I suggest the information that we meet in consultation, and make some preparation for the final consummation of the intended annexation, when I will bear with resignation the relation to your home and occupation that Mr. Peter H. Portation would then bear to myself.

MARIE MODERATION.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Majority.—The stage on life's road where one first becomes sensible of the going of youth and the coming of age.

Man.—A monster created after the beasts and before woman—possessing the good qualities of neither.

Marriage.—A union for lovers; a prison for the indifferent.

Marry.—To get one's self transported for life with hard labor.

Mars.—The god of war—Mars more than he makes.

Mascot.—A line young ladies should never adopt.

Mask.—What we all wear to hide our feelings.

Master.—Woman when she does not strive to be mistress.

Mercy.—The draught after the pills of justice.

Mind.—A jewel-box—the jewels vary in value.

Miss.—Counts if she is pretty; a decided hit if she is rich.

Money.—The friend man labors to bring in by the door for woman to throw out of the window.

More.—What the horse-leech's daughter (note the gender) always wanted.

Mother-in-law.—Apparent injustice.

Muff.—A thing to keep her hands warm and her heart cold.

Music.—The echo of angels' sighs or fairies' laughter.

Myth.—Classical truths.

It is asserted that the Princess Salome, of Mingrelia (the ancient Colchis), the young lady just married to Prince Achille Murat, has been enabled to trace her descent directly from Jason and Medea. In that case, of course, her husband will have no reason to complain that he has been *fleece*d!

TO HUSBANDS.

The edict is spoken!
And skirts shall no more
Of daughters and wives sweep
Society's floor.

But, husbands, rejoicing
Too soon would be wrong;
If the dresses are short,
Still your bills will be long.

When is a woman's hair
Like a swan's breast?—When It's down.

What is the worst kind of husbandry?—When a man in clover marries a woman in weeds.

The London Times begins an editorial: "Now that Italy has come by her own, would she be so kind as to take back her organ-grinders?"

COMPLIMENTARY.
ADOLPHUS (who is short-sighted). "Now, my Love, I think you'll find this is your Train."

TOO BAD!
EMILY. "What do I think of the Flower, Mr. Robinson? Why, more than I do of the Pot, by far!"

MODEST APPEAL
LADY (to big drum). "Pray, my good man, don't make that horrid Noise! I can't hear myself Speak!"

The man who wrote "I'm saddest when I sing," was a fool to sing much.

"Oh, for a thousand tongues," as an urchin remarked when inside a molasses hogshead.

"Massa," said Sambo, "one of your oxen is dead; 'toder too. 'Fraid to tell you of boff at once, for fear you couldn't bore it."

Is the "coming woman" any relation to the "passing bell(e)?"

A learned coroner being asked how he accounted for the mortality this year, exclaimed, "I can not tell; people seem to die this year that never died before."

OBSERVATIONS BY JOSH BILLINGS.

If a man wants tew get his actual dimensions, let him visit a grave-yard.

If a man wants tew be an old bachelor, and get sick at a boarding-tavern, and have a back-room in the fourth story, and a red-haired chamber-maid bring his water-guel to him in a tin wash-basin, I have alwuz sed, and I stick to it yet, he has got a perfeck right to do it.

When a man loses his health, then he fust begins to take care of it. This is good judgment. This is!

It is getting so nowadaze, if a man can't cheat in some way he isn't happy.

Success in life iz apt to make us forget the time we wasn't much. It is so with the frog on the jump, he can't remember when he was a tadpole—but other folks can.

An individual tew be a fine gentleman, has either got to be born so or brought up in it from infancy. He kan't learn it suddenly any more than he can talk Injun korecky by practicing on a tommy-hawk.

PUTTING TO RIGHTS.

When the box of Pandora the deities packed
With troubles and ills and anxieties weighty,
They felt that one evil to crown them was lacked,
And were quite at a loss, till implacable Ate
Slipt into the parcel of curses and spites
A malevolent genius for "Putting to Rights."

But Prometheus, you know, wouldn't come to the scratch,
And preferred to live on as a bachelor lonely—
Approved not so Bryant-and-May-like a match,
Guaranteed on that box as ignitable only;
So poor Epimetheus, the fable recites,
Became the first victim of "Putting to Rights."

Ah, why did he foolishly hasten to ope
The box which contained his beloved one's trousseau?
For out trooped the bad fellow-travelers of Hope—
(Since—as doubtless, you know—the gods meant them to do so)
Like ravens, those birds of ill-omen, their flights—
But the biggest and blackest was "Putting to Rights."

And, alas, ever since, when a man takes a bride,
Though the prospect before him seems sunny and flow'ry,
He's sure to discover, whate'er may betide,
That there's one fatal gift forms a part of her dowry—
One terrible drawback to married delights—
She is safe to be given to "Putting to Rights."

The books and the papers he fain would peruse,
The notes and the mems that want keeping an eye to,
The documents priceless 'tis ruin to lose,
The pressing epistles he ought to reply to,
Have all disappeared like some dream of the night's—
For his wife has been busy at "Putting to Rights."

Oh, woman is all that is lovely and sweet—
The right thing to take, as they say of good brandy;
But pray you be warned against taking her "neat,"
If you'd keep all your books and et ceteras handy.
Be warned, ere too late, ye unfortunate wights,
Against wives with a mania for "Putting to Rights."

You may wed, if you will, with the girl of your choice,
And think you a happiness nothing can mar gain;
But take my advice, while you still have a voice
In the matter, and make her assent to a bargain—
She must—ere her faith at the altar she plights—
Undertake to abstain from all "Putting to Rights."

AMBITION.

THE beautiful engraving which we give herewith is from the picture by William Morgan, whose pencil has depicted many similar scenes of household life. The moral is too obvious to need pointing out: the eager-eyed child, clutching at the bubble ambition, which, flung by the hand of his elder brother, has mounted to a tempting distance beyond his reach. The mother, anxious to please her darling, is holding him up at arm's-length, but not quite high enough as yet to grasp the object of his craving. Will he thus find helpful hands in after-life, ready to help him to his goal, or be left to climb each step of the way alone and unaided? But ambition is a noble thing, not lightly to be decried. "He who does not aim at the top of the tree will never reach the lower branches," says the Spanish proverb; and all the great deeds that have been wrought in life have been the outgrowth of true ambition.

THE IMPULSES OF THE AGE.

VITALITY is the distinguishing mark of the age. None can complain of it as dull and monotonous except those who groan under an unwieldy sense of themselves, and have a proportionate ineptness for sympathy with others. Whether its life is as earnest as its high trusts demand, or is earnest in the right direction, we shall not inquire; but beyond cavil it is a living age, that delights in action and considers solid deeds the splendid outlet of impassioned ideas and chivalric sentiments. What distinctive thoughts it has, what aims and aspirations are held very closely to its heart, are warmed and fed and nurtured there, and are there renewed with fresh inspirations as the conflict waxed hotter with opposing forces! Certain good people profess to think, and doubtless do think, that we are threatened with a sickly offspring from the ill-matched union of "misty science and feeble sentiment." What are our "confessions" beside St. Augustine's? Our denials compared with St. Anthony's? Our "soft encyclicals" from timid bishops weighed in the scale with Luther's fervid outbursts? Admit, then, that we have no prayers like those with which John Milton shook heaven and earth, and no Alpine thunder-claps like John Knox's, we see not any more convincing force in such arguments than there would be in the reasonings of a geologist who should depreciate the present structure of the globe because, forsooth, the era of convulsions and volcanoes had passed away. The age is full of impulses—strong and energetic impulses—not altogether generous nor yet simply selfish, but mixed and chaotic, yet struggling to purify themselves through their own ordained interaction.

Where we might least expect the presence of this impulse, we find its warmth and power most sustained and most fertile in rare benefits. Thus the scientific men who have been deemed cold and ungenial, are the most patient, enthusiastic, and loving workers of the day. A thought like the telegraph, or ocean steam-navigation, or a Pacific Railroad, or African exploration, or photographing, they keep steadily before them until it emerges into form and takes its place among actualities. The recovery of material nature to man's service so that it shall feed, clothe, house, educate, refine, adorn, ennoble him in an easier, broader, more princely manner than Solomon ever imagined, is not that a grand conception and worthy too of the enthusiasm which it has aroused? Men who talk of our civilization as flimsy and superficial, have surely never reflected that science was never to such an extent the very foundation of social life, of commerce, of statesmanship. And the same sort of impulse is extending into Art; music, sculpture, painting, architecture, are feeling its renovating vigor; while every form of literature, from the commonest school-primer to the splendid works of archæology, bears witness to the same inspiring energy.

Nor is this impulse, with its outgushing heartiness, less perceptible in our current politics. We mean the politics of principles, not of parties. With the noisy quarrels of the hour we have no concern, and none with the struggles for party ascendancy; but as an index of progress, pointing out the direction which the new statesmanship of the popular heart is likely to pursue through this generation, we may note the general enthusiasm in behalf of the brotherhood of humanity. Still more strikingly is this impulse apparent in those practical schemes of Christian effort which signalize this age. The men who dare to tell us that Christianity is dead or dying, are most grossly untrue to themselves and to the age; for it never had the permeative power, the silent and subtle electric force that works through the solid substance of modern society, and the vindicating array of grandeur which now characterizes its operations alike in the individual will and upon the wider area of the thinking and toiling world. Men like Arnold may tell us that

"From David's lips this word did roll,
"Tis true and living yet,
No man can save his brother's soul,
Nor pay his brother's debt;"

but thousands feel otherwise, and in this steady and settled unison of the Gospel with their deepest instincts, and in the answering echoes which their hearts in all genuine moments give to its uttered truths, they can not be mistaken unless the soul itself is a cheat and a lie. Believe, or pretend to believe, as such men may that Christianity was once credible but is credible no longer, they themselves by the very intensity of their skeptical despondency, by the unconcealed pathos of their inward wrestlings, and by the confessed unsatisfyingness of their hard and dreary negations, give no wavering testimony to the majestic truth of the sanctifying and saving system which they reject. Are not these doubts which men utter with bated breath, these unbeliefs which they hesitate to trust, and only entertain with fearful suspicions of suicidal wrong, evidences themselves that Christianity in our time has made skepticism considerate of others and jealous of itself? Viewed in this aspect, these doubters are walking gropingly in the midst of those huge shadows which Christianity, as it meets with obstructions to its splendor, casts over the face of the world.

The present age ought indeed to be the best that the world has yet seen, summing up, as it does, the experience of all which have gone before it, and which, especially of late, have been so rich in devices and inventions calculated to ameliorate the lot of humanity. But there are some men who, like Lot's wife, will always persist in looking behind them; and who, if set back no matter how far in creation, would continue to sigh for the good old days, were these days those just preceding the flood.

STUDYING AT HOME.

MOST of our school-teachers seem to have an entire misconception of their duties. They apparently think that they have nothing to do but to sit in magisterial dignity and judge of the accomplishments of their pupils. They examine, but do not teach; and thus the business of almost every school consists in saying, not in learning, lessons. The academy is known only as a place of recitation, not of study. The teacher confines himself to listening to the former, and leaves the latter to the superintendence of the parent. The chief duty thus devolves upon one who is incapable or careless of its performance, and, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is totally neglected.

There is no greater farce than this studying at home, as it is called. Master Tom, on returning from school, gives his bundle of books a fling in the hall as soon as he enters, and there they remain, unopened, ready strapped and conveniently placed at the door, to be carried back next morning. He, of course, knows nothing of the lessons he is called upon to recite, but he is kept in countenance by the sympathy of nine out of ten of his class who are in the same blissful ignorance as himself. To the usual question: "Have you studied your lesson?" he has the ready answer: "I have been over it a great many times"—for he has taken care, as is usual with the artful innocence of youth, to save his conscience and his back by the ingenious device of jumping a score of times over his unopened books.

The boy in this shows himself wiser than his master, and we heartily approve of all he does except the constructive lie he tells—for which, however, he is not altogether responsible. It is preposterous for a schoolmaster, after imprisoning a lad for five long hours, and keeping him during that whole time at the hardest of tasks, repeating like a parrot what he does not understand, or sitting in a constrained posture and silence, afraid to move or utter a word, to give him lessons to study at home. These lessons, if properly studied, would require as many more hours of labor and confinement as are daily passed at school. If lads did not instinctively resist this absurd demand, there would be few left with bodies and minds sound enough for their future work of life.

It has been said with truth that children learn more during their hours of play than of study. There can be no doubt that they exercise their mental and moral faculties more usefully in a game of base-ball than in puzzling over a page of the Greek Reader. Both are necessary, but we are inclined to think that there is too great a preponderance of the latter.

Five hours daily are quite enough for all study, and absurdly excessive for recitation alone, which would require much additional confinement and labor for preparation for it. By the present system, which makes great pretensions to comprehensiveness, there is no thoroughness of education. There are a great many things taught, but few learned. The schoolmaster with us is too exclusively the schoolmaster. He should be the educator, to draw out and develop the faculties of his pupil; and for this purpose it is essential that he should know him thoroughly. Such knowledge can not be acquired by merely seeing him at the hours of a formal recitation. The teacher must be by his side at his studies, in his walks, and on the play-ground. The five hours taken for school, which, as now conducted, result only in the dangerous over-cramming of the few and the superficial varnishing of the many with a useless learning, will give time enough for all the education of the young, which should devolve upon others than themselves.

IDEAS OF BEAUTY.

THE ideas of beauty are as various as the philosophers who have written about or the people who have admired it. Plato would not admit its existence except in the mind. Leibnitz held that it consisted in perfection. Burke pretended that all objects which have the power of relaxing the nerves are beautiful. Sir Joshua Reynolds was of the opinion that beauty was mediocrity; and Hogarth taught that it was nothing but a crooked line.

Nations are as much at variance with each other on the subject as the philosophers. The Chinese think that a woman who hobbles on a pair of club-feet is the perfection of female beauty; and the fashionable Thibetan woman does not deem herself presentable until she has daubed her face with a thick black paste "a good deal like conserve of grapes." The Hindoo dames stain their nails black with henna; and the Japanese their teeth with a dye of the same color. The Hottentot beauty is esteemed no beauty at all until she has fattened herself up to at least fifty stone, and has reached such a development that she can suckle her baby over her shoulders and carry the rest of the family upon her natural bustle. The Peruvian squaw is deemed of no account in society until she can show an ear with a hole in it big enough for her admirer to pass his arm through up to the shoulder.

As for the Americans—we do not allude to the indigenous tribes of savages—they reverse the Hottentot standard of beauty. With them thinness is in as high a repute as blubber with their African sisters, and they will pare themselves down to impalpable shadows with as much diligence as the latter will bloat themselves into oleaginous fullness. The Hottentot women are said to give their skin and flesh extensibility by constant kneading, and to cram themselves with pounded maize soaked in mares' milk, in order that they may swell out to the desired fatness; and the American to pinch their bodies, even to the crunching of the bones, with jackets of steel or corsets, and to drench themselves with a mixture of chalk and vinegar that they may be reduced to the fashionable tenuity.

Which of the two, the fat or the lean, is the true standard of beauty? And we might ask, Who is the barbarian—the Hottentot or American?

FINISHED.

THERE is nothing we know of that ever tends to be finished in this progressive but imperfect world but the education of our daughters. At a certain period of her life, say from fifteen to seventeen years of age, Miss Angelica suddenly distributes photographs of towering chignon and locks of hair among her school-teachers and favorite companions, and bidding a weeping farewell to them, with pledges of eternal remembrance, leaves the "Female Institute" forever. She now throws aside her dog-eared spelling-books, dictionaries, grammars, geographies, philosophies, and what not, and she and the ologies part never to meet again. Her education is finished. Her mamma promised that the summer quarter should be the last, and it was; so that marvel of intellectual accomplishment, Miss Angelica's education, was completed precisely at three o'clock in the afternoon of a hot day in June.

This finished damsel leaves school but to enter the world. Her physical charms, or perhaps papa's supposed wealth of dry-goods or real estate, attracts about her the young drones of fashion at Saratoga or Newport, and with their ceaseless buzzing she may well be deluded with the idea that she is a full-blown beauty. The winter's succession of balls, parties, and operas brings an additional swarm of admirers, who by their eager attentions confirm her still more in the supposed idea of her completeness.

Starting with the notion that on leaving school she had finished her education, and strengthened in the delusion by the silly or interested admiration of the so-called world, it is impossible, of course, to do any thing more in the way of solidly educating so self-complacent a person. And yet she is but a child in knowledge as well as in years. Test her, and you will doubtless find that her recollection of her spelling-books, dictionaries, and grammars, but so lately discarded, is so dim that she will be hardly able to spell out correctly a billet-doux, and that her conversation will be only vulgar insipidities expressed in bad English.

She, however, is fulfilling her vocation, which, according to would-be fashionable mothers, is to do her best to catch a husband by the display of those outside charms with which many American girls are so generously endowed. To marriage will probably succeed maternity, and then where will this finished school-girl, this full-blown beauty of the past, this mother of the present and future, find those resources necessary for the proper education of her children? If they are to be finished like herself, then the corner-stones of this republic will be, though with an external polish, of a material so flimsy that they must soon decay and crumble.

Suppose, however, that these finished girls should fail to get husbands, either from want of beauty or loss of wealth, and are too proud to do what they are, from their ignorance, only capable of doing, and that more imperfectly than an Irish Bridget—namely, to serve as domestics. What then is left for them but destitution or a life of dependent misery?

The obvious remedy is the recognition by parents of the fact that the education of their daughters can never be finished. The wise are always learning. Michael Angelo, who was of the greatest of the great men of this world, was met one day, when old and decrepit, tramping on foot through the snow, near the Coliseum, and was asked, "Where are you going?" "To school, to try to learn something," was his answer. We by no means think that our daughters should always be kept at the Female Institute; we, in fact, would rather that they went to a school of a different name, and of a more masculine gender.

It behooves mothers to continue the education, wherever it may have been, of their daughters systematically long after the usual period of leaving school. Thus, well disciplined to the latest moment, they would, on getting married, be not only more agreeable wives but more useful mothers. As for those who remain single, their maiden forlornness would be diminished by the resources of a good education, and their independence secured by the ready means it could supply of a dignified support.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Madame Mush.

MY DEAR MADAME,—I can hardly help laughing now when I remember the occasion which leads me to address you this letter. But really if, upon the highway of life, we mean to preserve our self-respect, it is necessary that some kind of protest be made against your conduct; and if, as I am told by my friend, Mr. Peter Paul Pry, your feeling upon the subject is shared by a great many people, it is only the more imperative that the absurdity be exposed.

When I was younger I remember reading a very charming little story, in which it was related that a poor, ignorant, almost degraded country woman in the interior of Pennsylvania, perhaps, used to cure the toothache by tying it to an apple-tree. It was my habit as a child to pity the ignorance of the poor woman, and to wonder in what kind of place and among what kind of people such a ridiculous superstition could prevail. My sister, Mrs. Smith, said, with ready humor, that the only way in which she knew how to cure a toothache by tying it to an apple-tree was to tie the aching tooth fast to the tree, and then run away as hard as she could. But I felt that this was not the way in which the old woman did it. She believed that there was some magic about it, and that by some kind of mumbling and turning she could weave a miraculous sanitary spell.

Imagine my horror, dear Madame Mush—who had not thought of this story for many and many years—upon suddenly discovering in your own person, in the splendid rooms of our friend Mrs. Knickerbocker, the superstitious old woman of the interior of Pennsylvania! As I think of it coolly here at my table now, I am alternately disgusted and amused. Do not misunderstand me! You did not propose to tie a toothache to an apple-tree. Far from it. Superstition, my dear Madame, is a Mephistopheles. He adapts his mask to his circumstances and his company. But it is always Mephistopheles. I saw the poor, ignorant old Pennsylvania country woman under your velvet and lace as distinctly as I see vulgarity under Mrs. Tilbury's affectation of refinement.

It was at Mrs. Knickerbocker's last dinner. I arrived a little late, for I found at the last moment that I had no proper gloves, and was obliged to step out of my way to buy a pair. The company was already assembled, and there was some unaccountable delay. Mrs. Knickerbocker said to me, "Where can your friend Mr. Pry be?" And I was confounded, for I had never known him to fail upon such an occasion.—I will say here, Madame, parenthetically, in defense of my friend that he was just upon the point of arriving at the exact hour, and was hurrying along the street toward Mrs. Knickerbocker's steps when, passing a couple of ladies whose garments of course entirely concealed what was coming up behind, he was suddenly overthrown, precisely as we both were on a previous melancholy occasion, and by the same cause, namely, the string of Mrs. Rooster's infernal poodle (excuse my just vehemence!), and the consequences to Mr. Pry's trousers were so extensive and so lamentable that he was obliged to call a coach, and drive all the way back to his rooms in order to change his apparel.—I begged Mrs. Knickerbocker not to wait for Mr. Pry; then I saw you, Madame, talking with her very earnestly, and after saying a few words to her youngest son, Van De Witt Knickerbocker, which seemed to affect him unpleasantly, our gracious hostess ushered us into the dining-room, while young Van De Witt disappeared.

The dinner proceeded, and still the youth did not return. But presently Mr. Pry came in with a smiling salute of mysterious apologies in regard to his delay. Immediately I saw Mrs. Knickerbocker whispering to a waiter, and soon after Van De Witt entered, and took his place quietly at table. The dinner was stately and pleasant enough, in the grand style; but I was more interested in the mystery of the coincidences of the appearance and disappearance of young Van De Witt than I was in the solemn platitudes of Mr. Hundredweight or the vivacious follies of Mrs. Stanhope. So when we were sipping coffee I said, gently, to Mrs. Knickerbocker that I hoped young Van De Witt had not been unwell. She looked at me very gravely, and answered:

"Don't you know why he left the room?"

"I certainly do not."

"Why, you dear innocent Mr. Bachelor, don't you see that if he had sat down with us there would have been thirteen at table? And Mrs. Mush told me that she could not possibly sit down with thirteen, so I told my son to go up stairs until Mr. Pry came, and if he did not come at all, to go out and dine at his club."

I could scarcely believe my ears. It is such a pointless absurdity, such a stupid superstition.

Why, my dear Madame, it is incredible that at this day there should be any body such a consummate dolt as seriously to be troubled by such a whim. You needn't shake your head and say that it is very easy to laugh, but that you have known very remarkable facts in regard to thirteen sitting together at table. Remarkable fiddlesticks! I know all kinds of remarkable facts. During this last year I have lost two friends, and I dined with each of them within the twelvemonth; the party upon one occasion being eight, upon the other six. In the last twenty years I have dined I don't know how many times with thirteen at table, and counted them; and more than half of those dinner parties I can assemble to-day with precisely the same guests. You can be just as superstitious, and with exactly as much reason, upon any other number as thirteen. Am I never to dine with a party of eight or a party of six again?

There used to be a great deal said about the punishment sure to fall upon those who went pleasuring upon Sunday. If one sail-boat of all the sail-boats in the country which were out upon one of all the Sundays in the year was managed by some ignorant fellow, and was capsize by a summer flaw, so that somebody was drowned, there was a kind of horror sought to be inculcated in regard to his death, as if he had been especially smitten as a warning. Why, my dear Madame Mush, the thousands who came safe to shore probably proved as much as the one that was lost. That is to say, nothing at all was proved, except that a man who does not know how to manage a sail-boat is very likely to be capsized in a flaw, and if he can not swim, to be drowned. So, after one of these absurd stories, winding up with an impressive warning of the mortal peril of sailing upon Sundays, had appeared in one of the newspapers, another the next day contained a story of a clergyman who was standing at a low window, and losing his balance, fell out and broke his neck. "What an impressive warning," said the paper, "does this melancholy event afford against clergymen looking out of low windows upon Tuesdays!"

Mrs. Mush, this illustrates the folly of your superstition about thirteen at table. I defy you or any body to show that there is any more striking coincidence between mishaps to those who form one of a party of that number or of any other number proportionally. Besides, if the folly is exposed by a single failure of the coincidence the whole superstition falls, and there is probably not a single person of your acquaintance in whose experience it has not failed a great many times. If you say that it is a generally received superstition, and that you do not care to reason about it, I shall reply in the politest terms that I can possibly find, that all the fools are not dead yet by any means. Suppose it is a generally received superstition. It is no more so than the tying of toothaches to apple-trees was in the Pennsylvania region of which I spoke, and I have never seen a person who was not ashamed of yielding to the deplorable weakness of which I speak. They all say that they do not wish to talk about it. Why not? If it be true, it is the greatest of wonders. If it be a miserable and inexpressibly contemptible folly, it ought not to be suffered to prolong itself under the shade of courteous silence.

If you did care to reason about what you call your "feeling" upon this subject, you would discover that the fancy is one of the medieval religious conceits. The Last Supper was a feast of thirteen; therefore that number at table is accursed, and one of the guests will pay the penalty by dying within the year. Don't you see upon the same principle that twelve is an unhappy number because there were twelve apostles, and one was a traitor? I will go through the numerals, and show you, upon various grounds, why every number is unlucky. My dear Madame, does a thief in the candle send you terrified to bed? Do you shrink from passing under a ladder as if you had sealed your doom if you did so? Do you always pine in apprehension of a great misfortune if you chance to see the new moon over your left shoulder? Do you tremble when you break a looking-glass, lest the evil one should carry you off before sunset? Do you insist upon throwing an old shoe away from a newly-married pair as they drive after from the church-door? Does it break your heart to meet a funeral?

There is no end to these old women's phantasies. There is nothing that happens that may not be wrested into these signs of evil. And among ignorant old country women such weaknesses may be pardoned. But in you and your friends they are simply despicable. If you must have superstitions, have them beautiful and significant. Don't go cowering about under the slavish fear of the evil-eye. Believe, if you will, that when a lovely child dies the angels are enamored of him and wish to spare him sorrow. Believe that in every trembling tree is a dryad, and nymphs in the soft seclusion of groves and vales. Believe that Pan blows his sweet reeds by the river, and that the sirens draw the mariner to his doom with resistless song. Believe that a crazed youth has been beloved by the moon, and that the dogs you hear far off at midnight are the hapless hunters that beheld Diana unawares. Cherish any generous, poetic belief, but don't shiver at broken looking-glasses, nor quiver under stout ladders, nor shake at a swollen candle-wick, nor lose your appetite because the fourteenth guest did not come to dinner. Leave, my dear Mrs. Mush, leave, I beseech you, to the most ignorant, most wretched, and most degraded of remote, interior women the business of tying toothaches to apple-trees. It is the absurd but necessary prayer of your obedient servant,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

TABLE LINEN.

MERCHANTS inform us that there is unusual variety in their importations of table linen this season. The rivalry incited by the French Exposition produced marked improvement in the designs and quality of all cloths for household purposes. Barnsley damasks are staple goods and always popular. The well-known Silesia, soft and heavy, with clear distinct figures, is a favorite with all who use it. The tiny snow-drop pattern so long sought after in Scotch and Irish damasks is not now in such demand as the inch wide stripes and square blocks. These are two yards wide, at prices varying from $1 to $2 a yard. Another style has a red border surrounding the whole cloth.

Among finer goods are shown some beautiful English and French linen damasks. They are imported in sets, consisting of a long cloth and two dozen napkins. Each cloth is woven in an elaborate design, with corresponding patterns on the napkins. One especially handsome cloth, marked $40, is two and a half yards wide and four yards long. In the centre the American eagle is represented, surrounded by a border of flowers and foliage. The large napkins are seven-eighths of a yard long by three-quarters wide. Stars are in the centre with a border of stripes. The two dozen napkins are valued at $25 a dozen, making the set of cloth and napkins cost $90. Another set has an Egyptian design of the sun with diverging rays as the centre-piece. Hieroglyphics, the sphinx, and winged lions are in bold relief on the border. Still another has a medallion centre, with corner pieces representing antique vases, nymphs, serpents, and cupids. The border is a design of fringe with tassels.

When a handsome outfit of table linen is made at the upholsterer's, it is customary to provide an under-cloth of thick Canton flannel cut the exact length and width of the table. This is to be placed under the damask cloth, and serves to shield a handsome table from injury, brings out clearly the figures of the damask, and gives the cloth a purer white look than when it is simply placed over the dark table.

Five-eighths of a yard square is the usual size for dinner napkins. In fine goods they are larger. Small tea napkins, or doilies, are made in neat designs of checks and snow-drops. Cotton damask fruit doilies, red and white together, are $1 75 a dozen.

Light-colored cloths for lunch or for fruit suppers are useful and pretty in the summer season. They should be of the same color as that which prevails in the decoration of the china with which they are used. They are shown in linen damask, pink and white, or buff, with patterns of flowers and fruit. With napkins to correspond, the price is $12. A beautiful dessert cloth that looks like satin brocade is of mixed silk and linen in pale amber and white. The pattern is elaborate, covering the whole cloth. A pretty fringe borders it. $16 is the price asked for the cloth and doilies. Striped toiletines and worsted damasks in dark, rich patterns of crimson or green with gilt are shown for dessert and wine cloths. They are two yards wide, and are sold by the yard at from $3 to $5. Plain Turkey red toiletines with white checks, stripes, and damask figures are sold at $1 85 a yard. They make serviceable lunch cloths for everyday use.

BED LINEN.

We were shown many things dear to the hearts of housewives in the way of bed linen. First was the substantial muslin sheetings, ten quarters wide, at seventy cents a yard. Utica Mills is a leading brand in these goods. Scotch linen is shown in all the sheeting widths, from one and three-fourths of a yard to three yards wide. The price ranges from $1 to $2 40 a yard. Heavy Irish linens three yards wide are seen in all grades. It is not advisable to buy very heavy linen, as it breaks sooner than a soft material. Richardson's linen for pillow-slips is in several grades and widths.

The pillow now most admired is the square French shape. Plain pillow-slips are of Irish linen, with a tuck an inch wide stitched around them, with a fluted ruffle rolled on the edge of the tuck. Overlays or sham slips, used in the daytime, are imported by several houses. They are half of a pillow-slip, fastened securely at the corners by loops and buttons. A sheet overlay is trimmed to match the pillow-covers. This false sheet is merely a breadth of yard-wide linen as long as the bed is wide. It is embroidered or ruffled at the ends and on one side. In the daytime it is turned down over the top sheet far enough to display the trimming and conceal the other covers. One set shown us was marked $34 for the three pieces. The trimming was a border of embroidered medallions set in Valenciennes insertion and edging. Wide ribbon, the color of the carpets and curtains of the bedroom, was placed under the lace. An imported set was embroidered in the finest French work. A vine and scalloped edge formed the border. In the centre was a floral monogram. Another set had a row of Hamburg insertion around it with a fluted ruffle.

The ruffle was of thick linen cambric, two inches wide, with four small tucks at the edge. In the centre a broken wreath was embroidered, in which were the initials of the owner. Puffs of cambric, and bands of linen, feather-stitched on each edge, are pretty trimming. If elaborate open embroidery and lace are used they are best displayed over a pink or blue case made of silk or cambric.

Gauze blankets for the summer were shown us. They are as soft as cashmere, and light and thin. The price is $11 a pair. American blankets cost only half as much as the popular Whitney blanket, and some of them, the Schuykill brand particularly, can scarcely be told from a genuine Whitney. Good Schuykill blankets are sold for $12 a pair. Fine French blankets are almost an inch thick, yet are soft and light. One beautiful pair is marked $40.

Marseilles counterpanes are displayed of several grades, ranging from $5 to $25 in price. Plain ones have shell or diamond borders with medallion centres. The expensive Empress quilt has an elaborate design with raised figures. The handsome counterpane from the Exposition has a ground-work of pale lavender that throws the white figures into bold relief. Honey-comb spreads at $2, and the striped Allendales for summer are staple goods. Toilette covers of plain white Marseilles, or strewn with pink and buff flowers, are chosen to match the counterpane.

Nottingham lace spreads, as low as $5, are exceedingly pretty. They should be lined with silk or cambric. Another, fit for a fairy queen, is of tamped lace, gorgeous with roses and daisies displayed over pink silk.

French chintz and cretonne in delicate colored grounds, with stripes and figures of some darker shade, make neat and serviceable spreads. They are sold by the yard at prices ranging from fifty cents to $1.

In mosquito netting we were shown the round meshed lace and gauze with square meshes. Pink gauze is about half the price of lace, and looks quite as well when made up. We rarely advise the purchase of an inferior article, but as all colored netting fades it is better to buy a gauze net at a lower price, and have a fresh new one often. Square and oblong canopies are more used than round or oval ones. Upholsterers trim the canopy with white ball fringe. A framework of bamboo sticks, that open and shut like an umbrella, is made to support the canopy. By pulling a tassel in the centre it is spread out for the night, and may be closed during the day. Many persons object to injuring handsome ceilings and bedsteads with hooks and pulleys. To obviate this an arrangement has been invented by which the netting is suspended from a standard erected at the foot of the bed. This is a very simple contrivance, requiring only a few minutes to set it up. It collapses into a small compass, and is set away in the closet in the daytime.

TOWELING.

The Turkish bath towels are shown in brown, unbleached linen, and in soft white cotton striped with red. The rough linen is used for friction, while the smooth cotton serves as an absorbent. They are a yard and a half long, worth $1 25 apiece. Barnsley damask towels are exceeding fine, with blue, buff, and pink borders, and a wide fringe. Another brand, well-known to housekeepers, is the Commodore. The Irish loom towel is much sought after. It is unbleached, being offered for sale just as it is brought from the loom. Honey-comb towels are also unbleached, but soon become white, and are very strong and durable. Soft linen towels for cleansing glass are plaided in two colors, green and red. Where there are two servants in the kitchen this is a useful mark by which each may distinguish the towels appropriated to her use.

MUSLINS AND CALICOES.

A new brand of yard-wide muslin, called Manville Hundreds, lately introduced in the market, is preferred by many ladies to any of the old-established goods. It counts a hundred threads to the square inch, while other muslins never exceed ninety. Although of such close, firm texture, it is very soft and smooth, with remarkably even threads. It is sold at present at twenty-eight cents a yard. The always popular New York mills muslin is quoted at the same price, and Wamsutta at twenty-five cents.

Merrimac calicoes, in light grounds and chintz figures, are now fifteen cents. Pacific Mills and Sprague's prints, in neat figures and stripes, are also fifteen cents. A coarser quality is sold at fourteen cents. The Amoskeag and Waurega calicoes for comfortables are twelve cents. An American cambric made at Lancaster, Pennsylvania, is coming greatly into favor. It is in as handsome designs as the finest French goods, is of very nice quality, seven-eighths of a yard wide, at twenty-five cents a yard. Imported cambrics of precisely the same pattern are forty or fifty cents.

PERSONAL.

MR. BUCHANAN's last days and hours were marked by complete Christian resignation to the inevitable result. He had been ill for some months, but not until Sunday, the 31st ult., did his physician despair of recovery. Such of his relatives and friends as could be summoned were with him at the last. He prayed and took the Sacrament at six o'clock on Monday morning. "God bless my country!" were his last words, frequently repeated in a whisper. One of his last requests was that President JOHNSON and Ex-Presidents PIERCE and FILLMORE should be invited to attend his funeral.

General COLE is said to while away the hours in his cell at Albany in making ornaments and curiosities from wood, and has also made a small house for some white mice which were given him. He does not allow his children to visit him, on account of the unpleasant influence the scene of their father in jail might have on their minds.

Magnificent bequests are becoming the order of the day. GIRARD, and PEABODY, and CORNELL, and VASSAR have set examples that are becoming contagious. Baltimore's wealthiest citizen, JOHN HOPKINS, an octogenarian, has made a will in which he bequeathes a million and a half, with a large suburban estate, for a great University, and another million for a hospital in the city. This was "HOPKINS'S choice," and a very correct one.

Miss KELLOGG's high personal character is justly winning for her the best possible social status in England and on the Continent. A private letter, recently received, says: "Miss K. dined yesterday at Buckingham Palace with the Duchess of Somerset, and was escorted to the table by the Duke of Newcastle." Her artistic success has been complete.

Cincinnati's prominent "personal" is Mr. PROBASCO, a gentleman who has amassed a fortune in the hardware trade, besides having another fortune bequeathed to him by a brother-in-law. He is now the richest man in Ohio; has a $20,000 house, situated amidst 30 acres of lawns and ornamented grounds; possesses a superb gallery of paintings, and one of the largest and choicest libraries in the country. The most expensive books in Europe have been obtained for Mr. P. regardless of cost. The collection of Bibles and editions of Shakespeare is remarkable. He is now having constructed, in Europe, an elaborate fountain for the city, toward the erection of which his deceased relative, Mr. DAVIDSON, bequeathed the sum of $40,000. This will be one of the finest works of art in the United States. It will be placed on the Fifth Street Market Square, and will be done in about two years. Mr. PROBASCO is a man of liberality in public enterprises, and is occupied in various works of charity. He is highly esteemed by the community, and enjoys the confidence of the good.

Mr. Speaker COLFAX's devotion to his mother is one of the notable traits in his character. As soon as he had received the intelligence of his nomination to the Vice-Presidency he sat down at his table, and, amidst the confusion and enthusiasm around him, wrote a note to his mother announcing the result. He said to those around him: "She is anxious to know, and I do not like to keep her in suspense." The Bazar thinks that was filial.

A fresh paragraph about the marriage of PATTI: "Her civil marriage is only a sort of record of the betrothal, and does not entitle them to live together. It is the contract, not the consecration. The Marquis de CAUX has just got leave of absence and gone to London, where PATTI is singing, and will remain near her during the London season, which closes in July. It is already announced that PATTI is engaged at the Italian Opera for the next (autumnal) season. TAMBERLIK and FRACHINI will probably support her; and Miss HARRIS, KRAUS, and GROSSI are already engaged.

We suppose that Queen ISABELLA's eldest daughter, who is about to be married to one of the Bomba family, may be regarded as a very high "girl of the period." She is said to be good-looking, but—such a temper! Some time ago one of the priests offended her, and she put down her royal little foot that she wouldn't go to meeting any more. None of her governesses could stay longer with her than a couple of months, and she laughs at her mother when ISABELLA exhorts her to behave herself. As for her father, if he is her father, he has no authority over her whatever. In Madrid people believe that, if she does not like her intended husband, she will tell him so to his face, in the presence of the whole court. As an insurance man remarked, it would be risky to "write" on connubial happiness with her unless as a special hazard and at a very high premium.

Sir ROUNDELL PALMER is now concededly at the head of the English bar. He is widely known, also, as one of the most luminous and eloquent members of the House of Commons, and for the elevation of his personal character, his unaffected piety, and his active participation in many good works. At the University he took the most distinguished honors, and in 1837 he was called to the Bar; but although he devoted himself to the practice of his profession with great assiduity he did not wholly relinquish his literary and scholarly pursuits. His love of poetry has withstood all the influences of a lawyer's prosaic life. It is only a few years since he found time, even amidst the multiplied labors and distractions of a leading practice at the Bar and a foremost place in the House of Commons, to publish an admirable collection of hymns, under the title of "The Book of Praise;" and he subsequently contributed to one of the meetings of the Church Congress an elaborate, eloquent, and, at the same time, admirably critical paper on "Hymnology." That was not, indeed, the first or the only indication of his interest in the work of the Church. Throughout his life he has been one of her most attached and earnest members, having, like Sir WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, taken an active part in her work both as a Sunday-school teacher and in furthering various movements of a religious and benevolent character.

WILLIAM CHAMBERS, the eminent Edinburgh publisher, is writing an autobiography to be published at the close of the year. Beginning his career a poor boy, he has not only made a great fortune, but he has created and circulated, in company with his brother, ROBERT, an immense amount of sound and interesting reading. It is not too much to say that these brothers, since the year 1832, when they started their now famous journal, have done more for the education of the laboring classes than any two men besides in Great Britain.

AUBER, whose new opera, "The First Happy Day," is now having a successful run in Paris, is in his eighty-ninth year, and is one of the few geniuses who is not impelled by his muse to create. He is essentially a man of pleasure, and of the world, and averse to application. "I have never," he not long since said to a friend, "known any other music than en-vie. Every body says my music is gay. I wonder at it. There is not a single motif among those my admirers find the happiest which has not been written between two yawns. I could show you whole passages where my pen drew zigzags instead of bars and quaver lines, owing to sleepiness and fatigue. Often it has happened that my eyes have closed in spite of my efforts to keep them open, and my head fell upon my partition. The only explanation I can give of this is that there is some truth in somnambulism." In appearance AUBER is a little mummified old man, dressed with military precision, and elaborately decorated. His eyes are snuff-colored and his face intersected in every possible direction with lines and wrinkles.

A notable lionne of Paris is Lady HARRIET COWPER, the only legitimate daughter and heiress of the last Earl of Blessington, and the step-daughter of the famous Countess the light of whose beautiful eyes were celebrated by BYRON. Her first husband was Count ALFRED D'ORSAY, to whom she was married as she entered girlhood, her father having desired to secure his vast estates in Ireland to him, and her step-mother having wished to install in the Earl's household the accomplished young Frenchman, who had conceived a violent passion which only died with him. Lady HARRIET was signally unhappy in her married life. She was deserted by her husband, for whose debts her property became involved to a very large extent. On the death of Count ALFRED D'ORSAY, his widow espoused the Hon. SPENCER COWPER, one of Lord PALMERSTON's step-sons. Subsequent to his marriage he inherited a considerable fortune, which, with his wife's remaining estates, enabled them to live in princely style in Paris. Lady HARRIET is a woman of sincere piety, and though she does not believe in good works, is impelled by a benevolent disposition to frequent acts of charity, all performed without ostentation.

One of the most eminent French writers of the time—M. LOUIS BLANC—in a letter to the Temps, draws this very pleasant picture of the leader of the British forces in Abyssinia: "There is one opinion as to the ability shown by Sir ROBERT NAPIER—on his consummate prudence, his cool, judicious delay, and the rapidity of his movements when, all his measures being taken, it became necessary to strike the decisive blow. I have had occasion to make the acquaintance of Sir ROBERT NAPIER, to converse with him, and to observe him closely. The idea he at first gives you of him is that of calm power. The first time I ever saw what struck me in his person was the gentle expression of his features, the gentleness of his manners, and the softness of his voice. I remember hearing him say that he had always an aversion to sporting, from a repugnance to killing poor defenseless animals. I know nothing more admirable than the love of humanity in an energetic nature. One is not the less a soldier for being a man, and Sir ROBERT is an instance of it. Most assuredly he is not the person who would ever have allowed these words to escape him, 'In a battle minutes are all—men nothing.' What was particularly and most justly remarked in his conduct of the Abyssinian expedition was his carefulness of the lives of the soldiers intrusted to him, the care which he took of their comfort, and his foresight, proved by this fact, that the army, after the fall of Magdala, had provisions for three months. But that prudence did not hinder him from displaying singular vigor, and the firmness which he required in circumstances where he differed in opinion from those around him, and where it was fortunate for England that his authority as Commander-in-Chief caused the superiority of his judgment to prevail."

The village of Henderson, Texas, possesses a treasure in a buxom school-girl of fourteen years, who is known to society by the name of DIONYSIA BOADICEA JEFFALINDA JACOBINA CHRISTIANA BUCKIANA CALEDONIA SUSANNAH EMILY WYATT WILKINSON MOORE WYNNIE. This young lady is a cousin of a young man of that village who, in the short span of his life of 22, has done and suffered the following things: He has had over a hundred personal encounters; has shot mortally three men; not mortally, eight; is now resting under seven bail-bonds; has been through the war from the beginning; married, buried an infant daughter, and separated from his wife, who is now going to school; and is now living upon his father's substance in possession of a pair of fine boots, a spavined horse, a Mexican saddle, a silver watch, three revolvers, and a Derringer, and $1 in specie. He expects to attend the Waco races, but does not expect to lay heavy wagers.

Mr. DISRAELI made a singularly happy speech at the Royal Literary Fund. He spoke of the value of books in influencing the societies of the world; and to this influence attributed the secret respect which animates even the most obtuse mind toward the man of letters. No man can deny the prodigious effort which such a speech demanded, coming as it did at a time when the speaker's thoughts were engrossed by considerations of which it is the fate of few men to experience. Mr. DISRAELI emerged from the heated air of party conflict into the serene atmosphere of intellectual peace. He brought with him no echo of the shock from which he had temporarily escaped; his language was chaste, scholarly, artistic; he discoursed of literature in the tone of the enthusiast who has abandoned for a while the lettered industry of the library, and steps forth to speak with kindred minds upon the topics dearest to his heart. Mr. DISRAELI's love of letters will always win for him the sympathy which his love of politics had else denied. He could have made a no more eloquent appeal to the hearts of the people than thus descending from the pinnacle of politics to take by the hand the poor and sensitive man of letters.

Mrs. STANTON says, in the Revolution, that she has "taken care of seven babies; yet has worked in the cause of women twenty years or more. We have addressed our Legislature many times, spoken on education, temperance, slavery, and written many articles for the press. When we went to Albany to address the Legislature, we took our nurse and babies to the Delavan House, left them safe there in a room, went to the Capitol, found it filled with ladies, and made our speech. It takes no longer to speak than listen. When we finished we shook hands all round, and went home to our babies, and the rest of the women to theirs. If we were a member of the Legislature we could spend the few hours every day at the Capitol which other women spend in fashionable calls, shopping, gossiping, dining, dressing, and idling."

A young lady, beautiful of course, (KITTY CLOVERTOP she signs herself), writes, "I always prefer white petticoats, white stockings, and white table-cloths, to colored ones, which are not the lively of neatness."

Crochet Brooch.

MATERIALS: Gray silk twist and steel beads. This brooch, which is shown of the full size in the two accompanying illustrations, is worked in crochet of gray silk twist and small steel beads. The crochet part is then stretched over a circular piece of wood of the requisite size, and the back is finished with a pin. See the first illustration. For making such this the upper diagonal stitches only with silk, in the manner shown by the pattern, which clearly illustrates the method of working.

Fig. 4 is a design similar to the former, and consists of stripes of different widths. The narrower stripes consist of long, alternating cross stitches (eight threads high by two threads wide), worked with fawn-colored worsted in four shades. The lightest shade may also be worked in silk. The foundation of the broad stripes is worked in ordiinary cross stitch with dark brown worsted: the stars are worked in point russe with colored wool and silk.

Fig. 5.—This design is in plain long cross stitch, over four threads in height by two in width. The dark stripes are of violet worsted, the light figures of lilac worsted, while the point russe and cross stitches are of straw-colored silk twist. This pattern is very pretty and effective.

RIAGES.

A CELEBRATED practice in Abyssinia connected with the polygamy of their princes, and of a milder kind than was in use till lately in the Turkish seraglio, was their method of obviating the inconveniences of a too numerous royal progeny.

The superfluous sons were allotted to some out-of-the-way spot cut off from all communication with the rest of the world, and usually on the top of some lofty mountain. A certain quantity of clothing and provision was regularly supplied them. So far they were not badly treated in ordinary times; but in any periods of political commotion they were apt to fare badly; starvation and a miserable death by slow degrees was then their common fate. We owe to this custom of Abyssinian despotism the pleasing fiction of Rasselas's happy valley. Abyssinian marriage is usually a mere contract by which both parties agree to join themselves and property so long as mutually agreeable; and, if we are to believe the Portuguese missionaries, they were accustomed to contract so loosely as to admit of an easier dissolution of the bond. Where a mutual understanding was not practicable, and the wife was the transgressor, she was more severely treated than the male offender. Bruce asserts that there is no pretense to any form or bond of matrimony, excepting so far as the contract may be mutually regarded (a statement, however, to be taken with some qualification); that they separate and unite again at all times and places, with the utmost ease, without respect to any intermediate alliances. Upon divorce the sons belong to the mother, the daughters to the father. The feast is an extensive business; the peculiar national manner of eating being then carried out in extenso. Whether it is the long fasts that induce such enormous voraciousness and absorption of raw food, described in a very graphic way by Bruce, we do not know; but that would seem to be the most natural

The foundation is light gray cloth. The appliqué figures are of different colored cloth, and are sewed on, as shown in the illustration, with button-hole, chain, and herring-bone stitch. Point russe and knotted stitch are also used in the embroidery. The colors of the cloth and sewing-silk are a matter of taste.

Tapestry Stitches for Slippers, Cushions,
Traveling-Bags, Covers, etc.

The designs given are pretty and easily worked. The foundation is canvas, and the material for working either worsted or silk, or both, in mixed colors.

Fig. 1.—This design is worked in long stitches, six threads in height and one in width. These stitches are worked in alternate rows, three threads in a figure. In the patterns the foundation is of a dark reddish-brown, and the figures gray, while the single cross stitches are worked with corn-colored silk.

Fig. 2.—This design is worked in long alternating cross stitches, the foundation with dark green worsted, and the figures with worsted and silk in light green.

Fig. 3.—This design consists of wide and narrow stripes. The foundation of the wide stripes is of fawn-colored worsted, worked in cross stitch. The stars in these stripes are worked in point russe in Turkish style with different colored worsteds and silks, while the centre is composed of a Smyrna stitch (double cross stitch), four threads in height and breadth. The narrower stripes are of black worsted and corn-colored silk; the under row in diagonal stitches, alternately one black and one corn-colored over four threads in height and breadth, and after solution of the national inclination. As to divorce, it is of the commonest and everyday occurrence. Bruce relates his having met with a lady in the same room with six men who had all stood in the conjugal relation to her successively, and none of whom had any relation to her then. Although Gobat states that after the third divorce they are not able to take another wife, unless by becoming monks, it sometimes happens that the Church intervenes, and the solemnity of the ceremony varies with the desire or disinclination for the perpetuity of the matrimonial bond. Supposing the former to be in favor, they are married with an imposing display of ecclesiastical pomp, incense, and chanting at the door of their temples, followed by a liturgical celebration within doors, and often by communion. For the Abyssinians, we may remark, excel even the Roman Catholics in strictness of fasts, veneration for the Virgin, reverence for relics and saints, and other superstitious observances.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER V.

"PERRO, oh, Perro!" cried Lily. "Come quick—come and help him!"

"Let me put you down and den run home, Missy darling," answered Perro; "taint a sight for your dear little eyes, nohow."

But Lily would not be denied her share in the merciful mission, and, taking her on his shoulder again, Perro made all haste to the fallen man. As they drew nearer something made his heart fail him; again he sought to send the little girl back, and again she refused to go. Reaching the sorrowful object Perro raised it from the ground, and, throwing her tender arms around the poor, limp neck, Lily uttered the piteous cry, "Oh dear, dear papa!"

Cuthbert half opened his bloodshot eyes, brokenly murmured something about the Doctor's prescription, then permitted Perro to lay him down on the sward behind some bushes where he would be concealed from the road, while Lily, with her own little handkerchief, wiped the blood and dust from his bruised face, mingling entreaties to him to wake and answer her with kisses of unutterable love. Finding her appeals of no avail she lifted her eyes to Perro's face in an agony, and asked if he would die.

"No, Missy darling, he no die," replied the poor fellow, sadly, half uncertain whether this were an alleviation of the case or not. "We'll sit here and wait till it's so dark nobody see him; den I carry him home on my back and put him in de bed."

For half an hour the two kept their broken-hearted watch silently beside the unconscious man; the twilight deepened into darkness, and Perro, now deeming it safe, lifted Cuthbert's light form in his arms almost as easily as Lily's, and, with the little girl beside him, trudged to the lower gate of the Garnet Run property. By entering here he hoped to work his way round to the back of the house and put his charge to bed without attracting the attention of any of the family. The precaution was vain. Alarmed by their long stay Mrs. Kearney had come out to look for them, and seeing no signs of them from the upper gate was now coming round to the lower one. As Perro noiselessly dropped the latch behind him Mrs. Kearney emerged from behind a clump of southern-wood.

"Oh, Lily! oh, Perro! what—whom have you got there?" she exclaimed, in a stifled scream of astonishment.

Hearing his wife's voice Cuthbert woke to semi-consciousness, and breaking from Perro's arms staggered with a maudlin smile into those of his wife, and, putting his smirched cheek against her own, kissed her.

With a gesture partly of agony and partly of indignant insult she pushed him from her, and, as Perro caught him again, sank abjectly down upon the turf, and, burying her face in her hands, moaned as if her heart would break, while Lily, ever led by her instinct where need and grief were the sorest, left her father for the first time to kneel silently and clasp her mother's neck and kiss her cheek.

Perro stood for an instant undecided, then turned slowly to bear his burden home, when a sound of wheels and a cheery voice proclaimed Dr. Dalmager at the lower gate. It was his frequent custom when he arrived late to enter here and drive directly to the stable. Perro laid Cuthbert gently on the grass and ran to open to his master. Derrick was about driving past, with the good-humored nod which he had for all the servants, when the sight of the group on the grass made him draw rein again. For a moment he sat dumfounded, then took in the whole situation with one sweeping glance and leaped from the carriage. Ordering Perro to deposit his inanimate load on the back seat, and granting Lily's tearful entreaty that she might sit beside her father and hold him in his place, he gently, even caressingly, lifted Mrs. Kearney from the ground and helped her to the front seat, then took his own beside her, and, bidding Perro meet him at the portico, drove slowly to the house.

"Weep, dear child, it will do your heart good," said Derrick, taking both reins into his left hand and with his right arm drawing the sorrowful woman closer to his side; "there! rest your dear, tired head on my shoulder and cry your fill. It's all my fault—I should have staid in the village to look after the poor fellow—if I had it wouldn't have happened; so you must let me comfort you—dear, dear child!"

Such a strong, manly arm was Derrick's! Such a feeling of limitless support and protection in it as the young wife had never known before! Such a deep, manly voice—so full of gracious music, yet with a tone of command in it, to which it was so sweet to submit! As both arm and voice wrapt in her senses she seemed folded from alarms, and cherished as in some impregnable, heavenly hiding-place. A strange security and peace began cradling her heart; she felt the gratitude of a rescued child; lulled by the magnetism of his tender strength she reposed her beautiful cheek on his broad bosom and little by little grew calm. Her sobs ceased; the choking lump subsided from her throat; when he bent over her golden hair and with his own bearded face brushed it back from her eyes, even pressed on it one light, gentle kiss kind as a mother's, she was not startled—she only lay in a quiet dream of thankfulness that, so far away from all help and strength and kinship, Heaven had sent such a priceless friend as this. So slowly did Derrick drive, as he said, in order not to jostle Cuthbert from his seat, that all trace of tears had disappeared from her eyes when the carriage reached the portico, and something almost like a smile of gratitude rewarded the Doctor when he lightly lifted her down. Pain and, alas! something like contempt, chased it away again as Perro drew out that helpless load from beside Lily and carried it into the house.

"Lie down on the sofa and rest," said Derrick, when they came into the saloon. "That tender heart of yours is too much for you! You will be sick to-morrow. With a temperament such as yours you should be sheltered like a young rose from every thing hard or rude or painful in the world."

He fixed his great black eyes on her face as he said this with a look of such unspeakable tenderness that the woman meeting it must have been stolid indeed to have needed any verbal gloze for the expansion of its meaning into, "Would to God that I were that shelter!"

"Lie down; I will see to making your husband comfortable for the night, and then come back to you."

She would have deprecated this interference with her wifely duties by a faint remonstrance, but Derrick's tender, resistless hand laid her head like a tired child's upon the sofa-pillow, spread the afghan over her, and tucked it in about her shoulders to protect her from draughts, before she could finish her request to be allowed to accompany him. Then he glided noiselessly out of the saloon and crossed the hall to the room where Perro had already undressed Cuthbert and left him with a wax-light and water-pitcher on a stand at the head of the bed.

The poor schoolmaster was sleeping heavily. Derrick turned down the quilt, and shading the slumberer's eyes from the wax-light with his hollowed hand, gazed into his swollen, disfigured face with a bitter smile. For several seconds he stood in motionless silence, seeming to feast on the spectacle; then half in soliloquy, half to the sleeper, he muttered:

"For you—you poor, pigeon-livered, maudlin milk-sop, the most beautiful woman Heaven ever gave a fool! You, fox-fire, moonshine nature—spiritless, nerveless thing, with a face of dough and a heart of ice, and gorgeous, glorious beauty to drive a man mad with passion, thrown away on you—you, the master of a woman one would go to hell for! For me, loneliness—loneliness and the seeing of all this! Me, with a volcano in me for a soul, and a heart forever burning itself up in its own fire; no woman's love, no kisses, no caresses—me, fearing nothing, daring any thing, every thing!"

Turning away he leaned upon the mantle, held the wax-light to his face, and regarded himself steadfastly in the mirror. His large black eyes, full of impassioned lustre; his raven hair, thrown back in great silky waves from his spotless olive forehead; his regular features, clear cut as a young Greek god's—made him more beautiful than in the contemplation of privacy his own eyes had ever before beheld him. His smile grew less bitter as he gazed, and he resumed his soliloquy in these few broken words:

"Me—daring every thing! Every thing!" He paused again, then, with compressed lips, added, "Yes! every thing!"

Drawing the quilt once more over Cuthbert's face he set the wax-light where he had found it, and curling his lips with involuntary scorn as he shut the door on the poor schoolmaster's brute-like snoring, went down stairs to rejoin the wife and child. They were still in the dark, but had the lamps been lighted they would have seen his face pleasant as ever with its old placid smile.

It was Lily's bedtime, but the Doctor would not hear of Mrs. Kearney's going to undress her. "Mind the physician, and rest after your excitement," said he, with gentle firmness, and rang the bell for Kledda. Lily kissed her mother good-night, and went away to be put into her little crib by the nurse, but did not stay there long; for when, after midnight, Cuthbert's wife came to seek her pillow, she found the child nestled beside him, with her small hand resting on his cheek, as if sleep had overtaken her petting him, and her long brown lashes still wet with tears. The sight pierced her with a sharp momentary pain, seeming to reproach the comparative evanescence of her own sorrow—for the hours which had passed since Lily's bedtime had seen few tears in her eyes—and the witchery of Derrick's voice, no less than his clear, cool sense and tender tactfulness, had soothed her into a different being from her whom she dimly remembered prostrate in an agony of weeping upon the turf by the southern-wood. What had happened since then that her affliction seemed so much less? Hearing the many charitable allowances which Cuthbert's friend made for him, and the view taken of such cases by practical, sensible men whom Puritan traditions had never made morbid—had she come to feel that her husband was, after all, not so badly lost? Or had she found that his sum total did not represent her whole earthly capital? Granting her loss, had something been slowly interposed to make it up? Was she less desolate than she had dreamed, or was it henceforth out of Cuthbert's power to leave her desolate? She was not one of those natures which lie awake analyzing such questions. Neither will we do it for her. She thought her heart's quick revulsion due to the tears still on Lily's cheek, so wiped them away without waking her, and lying down, glad of the sweet, innocent barrier between her and him whose stertorous breathing she heard with less alarm and disgust now that Derrick had told her "he would be all right in the morning," was presently as sound asleep as either of the two beside her. In one room only at Garnet Run the light burned all night, and the pillow was smooth till daybreak—in Derrick Dalmager's.

Who can adequately depict the horror of shame and anguish into which Cuthbert awoke with the first tinge of dawn? It would be intelligible only to the man capable of feeling its counterpart, and of such, happily for our sanity if not for our morals, I suppose there exists not more than one in any million, promiscuously assembled from even the most highly Christianized portion of mankind. The morning after one's first experience of absolute intoxication is notably unpleasant, even to a person whose spiritual development rises no higher than the Dead Rabbit type, involving a variety of physical sensations both painful and disgusting. When the victim has any social position to forfeit, his wretchedness receives complication from the doubt whether some one has not seen him, and will not report his plight, and it will be still further increased if he is a man with pride of personal character to be wounded by the reflection that he has lost his self-control. Ascending further in the scale we find additional tortures wreaked on the Pharisee by a violated ideal of mankind; on the affectionate man, by a rebound of grief which he has brought into his family; on the religious person, by a sense of sin against the divine law. When we pile the sum of these agonies upon one man, whose native susceptibilities are keen as the most sensitive woman's; whose emotional system, ill-health, and sedentary habits have spent thirty years in morbidly sharpening to a preternatural acuteness; whose life-long education has been in that Puritan school which beyond all others makes human responsibility terrible, the Unpardonable Sin coextensive with the catalogue of human errors, and, among those errors, drinking, either with or without drunkenness, not many degrees better than murder, nor any than unchastity—when this is one man, we can not wonder that the avalanche which fell on him out of the cool gray dawn nearly extinguished his consciousness in the moment of its return. His wife still slept sweetly, and, thinking what she must have endured for his sake overnight, he had not the heart to waken her—but he kissed the rosy finger-tips of her soft, dimpled hand lying on the coverlet with a greedy humility, as he would fain have made reparation by pressing his lips upon her very feet—he crouched and bent himself till his forehead touched the foot-board in an agony of utter self-abasement. "A dreadful looking for of judgment to devour the adversary" possessed his soul; an unutterable terror of despair rolled up over him like a pitchy cloud thickening and still thickening out of some bottomless infernal caldron. Every text which had been mined from the Hebrew ore-bed and forged on the pulpit-anvil of his boyhood's memory into a thunder-bolt of curse and doom shot, red-hot, through the darkness against his naked soul. He was one of those "simple who pass on and are punished;" "being often reproved and hardening his neck, he should be suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy." He was one of those drunkards to whom Isaiah prophesied woe, and of whom Paul declared that they should "not inherit the kingdom of God;" with whom the righteous must not "keep company," not "even eat;" whose Lord should "cut him asunder and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites"—"who should dwell among weeping and gnashing of teeth." His head was snapping with a wild rhythmical pain; without, within, from waist to throat, his whole trunk burned as if he had swallowed molten lead, and he was possessed by an intolerable thirst; but these bodily sensations were unheeded as such, and seemed only an antepast of the terrific spiritual pangs threatening against such sinners. He was ruined on earth—he had sinned away his day of grace in Eternity. Such was the waking-up of Cuthbert Kearney.

Trembling in every muscle, the cold sweat starting from every pore, and his eyes staring from their sockets with an insane wildness which made him fear to look at himself in the glass, Cuthbert rose and dressed himself. Fiend in human shape as he felt himself, he stole into his clothes, as it were, on tip-toe, lest he should disturb the innocent slumberers by a sound. To have had waking human companionship—to be looked at by a reassuring, loving, conscious face, would have been like the one drop which Dives cried for; yet he would not break for his own wretched sake one breath of that innocent peace upon the pillow—no, not though he had momentarily to control himself lest his anguish should make him shriek aloud. The sun was just rising when he tottered down the stairs and thrust his burning face into the bland, early breeze which dallied with all glad, living things outside the wall of roses. He leaped from the low window-sill, and went groaning across the fields, as Cain might have wandered with the brand upon him, waking on the first morning after his brother's murder. Every step he took seemed to open before his eyes new and still more infinitely branching vistas of calamity. Whichever way he looked he was ruined. He had sold the birth-right of his soul; he had broken his wife's heart; entailed on his idolized child a future of life-long misfortune and disgrace; and lost even his means of getting them life's commonest necessities, for he could not doubt that Derrick Dalmager would dismiss him from his place. As these exaggerations of self-punishment fell heavier and heavier he began to think of all he had read concerning mania potu, and the more he thought of going mad the madder he felt himself going.

"THROWING HER TENDER ARMS AROUND THE POOR, LIMP NECK, LILY UTTERED THE PITEOUS CRY, 'OH DEAR, DEAR PAPA!'"

He had scarcely escaped from the house when Lily awoke and missed him. Till this morning her simple, childish toilette had always been made for her by the loving hands of mother or nurse; but the intense yearning which she felt toward her father would not now let her wait till they awoke, and her more than adult thoughtfulness forbade her rousing the mother, whose sleep looked so sweet, and whose last night had been so bitter. Many were the failures in pinning and buttoning and tying made by the little woman's unused fingers, and scarcely, with the most ingenious arrangement of stools and chairs, could she accomplish that feat of looking at herself all round in the glass, which is coeval with the earliest consciousness of her sex; but at length, all difficulties surmounted, she put on her Tuscan flat, fastened a warm shawl about her shoulders, as her mother had so anxiously done the last evening, and set forth for the first time alone to seek her father over an estate which, even under the guidance of Kledda or on the shoulders of Perro, had looked to her as vast as Central Africa appears to Doctor Livingstone—something boundless, scarcely explored, and vaguely known—something to get lost in, and to write geographies about. If it had been the whole world—for aught she knew at an age when distances are all infinite and alike—the expedition could have seemed no greater; yet that, like this, would have seemed a little way to go with her father at the end of it—and having him to seek, she went forth bravely. But he had left no trace to tell her his direction; and after vainly searching for him over the lawn, in the nearest meadows where the cattle were grazing, and on the hill-top where she had released the ungrateful "partridge-papa" among the cedars and chinquapins, she came back to the upper entrance from which she had descended with Perro the beginning of sorrows on the night before. With a great struggle she stood on tip-toe, prized up the massive latch, and passed out, leaning her whole baby weight against the gate to shut it behind her, with adult precaution for the lawn's sake against nomadic cows. She looked up and down the road; the uninterrupted view in both directions amounted to nearly a mile, but no father could be seen. Nothing daunted, she tripped down the road and entered the woods on the opposite side, where a pathway which she had often traveled with Kledda led to the stream and a broad, deep, shady pool whose bank was her favorite play-place.

Meanwhile Cuthbert, driven by the fires of his self-torture, and already scourged for an hour through woods and fields without knowing that he had been out of the house more than ten minutes, had crossed the Run by a rustic bridge, nearly a mile above the estate, and was following the stream down in an ever-deepening horror.

It looked so cool and sweet along its shallower reaches that he repeatedly threw himself down where the bank was low, and plunging his fevered head in to the ears, let the tiny waves, brisk with the earliest touch of frost, tumble over it, drifting out the tangles of his hair, and spreading it on their bosoms like an undulating fringe of silky brown sea-weed. For the time their touch seemed magic; but the fire of his brain, and his blood fevered by long strides, quickly dried his locks again; and as he came to a tract where the banks got higher, the water stiller, deeper, and narrower, a terrible temptation came upon him. He was getting to the deepest part of the Run—the deepest save close by its union with the Cumberland. People had slipped off the bluff of dark nights and been drowned along here, Perro had told him; and one of the Doctor's first cases after he came back from "learnin' to cut up folks among those Frenchmen" Kledda said was the post-mortem of a field hand who had committed suicide by jumping into "the Pool" because her baby died. "The Pool" was properly a straight channel, carrying twenty feet of still, black water through two precipitous rifts, at either end narrow enough to leap across, and fifteen feet in height to the top of their bluffs—an oval surface of five rods longer and two rods shorter diameter—from whose treacherous bosom self-rescue was as impossible as from the bottom of a well.

As Cuthbert's feverish strides brought him nearer this fatal basin this thought began settling its leaden weight on his will like a nightmare, and paralyzing his soul's every self-preservative instinct. "Quick and certain! what place like that for a ruined man?" Yesterday, and by patient struggle any blessing was attainable to him for those he loved; to-day, and he stood forever beyond the possibility of doing them any good, by his own act, in a place where he could only make them reparation by putting eternally out of their sight the husband and father whose presence was but a memorial of their shame. No!

He must not live to be a shadow on their path, a stumbling-block to their fortunes. Dalmager, noble-hearted fellow, was as kind as the day was long. He loved Lily's mother as his own sister; he would not see them suffer when Cuthbert was gone. They could still keep house for him, and so be independent. They would miss him at first, but in the end could not help being glad that he was out of the sunlight which had shone on his disgrace, and in which he could never look them in the face again. With these mad thoughts seething in his brain he turned a short curve around an evergreen thicket and stood upon an odorous, slippery carpet of pine-needles close by the verge of "the Pool."

He was about taking from his pocket a gold watch, once his mother's, and promised to Lily in case he died before her, intending to hang it on a branch where it might be found after he was gone, when a soft murmur like a dove-note caught his ear, and, looking across the stream, he saw his little girl kneeling beside a great moss-grown stump twined with white and crimson morning-glories. Her face was toward him, but partially hidden by the radiant mass of flowers and greenery which decked this forest altar, and, even without this screen, he need scarcely have withdrawn behind the shelter of the evergreens which fringed his side of the bluff, for her lovely eyes were too earnestly fixed on the patch of blue sky disclosed between the tree-tops to be called away by any thing on earth, and her parted lips trembled with the intensity of a pleading which seemed addressed not to an object of faith but to some visible auditor. Her little hat had fallen to the ground, and her curls, streaming unconfined into the sunlight which flitted through the leaves, shone like the halo round the head of a seraph. Indeed, Cuthbert felt as if he had stumbled into some seraphic presence unawares—surprised an angel in some still uncorrupted Eden talking face to face with Him who walked of old through Adam's garden in the cool of the day—beholden plain by her pure eyes, though to his sin-blurred sight invisible. For a moment all foreign things were banished from his mind by reverent awe and a passion of parental tenderness which was almost worship. Uncovering his feverish forehead he also knelt and listened to that innocent heart's outpouring.

"Dear Jesus—dear, dear Jesus!" said the child, "I love you more than tongue can tell, and you love me just as much, don't you? You never were a little girl, but you were a little boy once, and mamma says you know just how every body feels in the world. You had a dear papa and mamma once, and you loved them just as I love my papa and mamma. I read about you the other day to Kledda—how you thought about your mamma, and asked John to take care of her, and be good to her always, almost the last words you spoke when you were dying with those wicked nails through your sweet hands. Dear, dear Jesus, just the way you thought about your mamma I think about my papa. I think about him all the time—I beg you to take care of him, just as John took care of your mamma. I ask you to the last thing before I go to sleep, and the first thing when I wake up, don't I, dear Saviour? And now do, oh Jesus! do hear your little Lily that you love! Papa is so sick and so sorrowful! He's such a dear, good father—and I can't bear to see him never happy any more as he used to be. Don't let him be like poor grandpa—don't take him away from me! Lily's heart will break, dear Jesus, if you do! I've lost him this morning—I've looked for him every where, and I can't find him—I'm afraid he's gone away, and won't come back, because he's afraid that we think he's bad; but he isn't bad! He's as good—oh, as good as any papa you ever gave a little girl, dear Jesus—he's only sick and sad." [Her voice broke into a sob, but she steadied herself, and in a braver tone went on again.] "No, Jesus, I won't cry! I know you'll send him back—won't you please—oh please, dear, dear Jesus!"

The terror of great darkness in Cuthbert's soul became a merciful cloud of rain, pouring in torrents along the parched channels where for many days all springs of human sympathy had been dried up. He stole from his concealment, and leaping the narrow gorge which bounded the lower end of the Pool, fell on his knees beside his good angel, and clasping her heavenly face to his bosom wept as only he can weep who has been brought by one touch of loving fingers out of the prison-house of despair. Lily kissed him all over—on face, and hair, and hands, and clung to him as if she never again would let him go—then, her first ecstasy over, suddenly remembered who had sent him, and lifting her tender mouth toward the heavens wafted kiss after kiss upward from her tiny fingers, as children are taught to bid good-by to a friend. "I knew you'd give him back—and oh, how I thank you for being so quick, dear Jesus! Take all my kisses that I throw you, and some day I'll sit in your lap as other children did once, and feel you kiss me back. Thank you, dear Jesus! Oh, thank you for papa, so much."

BOOKS AND THEIR FATES.

PAINFULLY ingenious persons amuse themselves sometimes by speculating as to what becomes of all the pins which are produced every year by so many millions. Is it not more interesting to inquire what becomes of all the books? Every day a number of books are born, and every day a certain proportion of them must die. Some come into the world still-born. A friend of ours once published a novel of which not a single copy was sold. The book, he maintained, could not be looked upon as a failure, inasmuch as its readableness had not been tested; and he always entertained the belief that if one copy only could have found a purchaser, the fortunate man would have recommended the work to others, who would have recommended it to others again, until in a very short time the whole edition would have been disposed of.

Then there are books which are not absolutely still-born, which are "nés viables," as the French say; but die in early infancy. They are buried in the book-rooms of the museum. Their titles are inscribed, by way of epitaph, in the catalogues, and they are heard of no more.

Others, again, have a short life, and not a particularly merry one. They struggle through a brief season, and perish, leaving a bad reputation behind them.

There are books, too, which, now and then, are cut off in the prime of life by hostile reviewers. The number of killed and wounded is not, perhaps, very great; but from time to time the spiritual existence of a book is really put an end to by criticism. It becomes the mere dead body of a book, a mass of spoiled paper, and nothing more.

The Greek sage who was asked whether the living outnumbered the dead or the dead the living, and who replied that the living were more numerous, inasmuch as the dead did not exist, could not have given precisely the same answer if the same question had been put to him in respect to books. In the case of a man, when the circulation has once fairly stopped, he is dead. But the circulation of a book may have come to an end, and the book, nevertheless, be not utterly, irrecoverably defunct, but susceptible of resuscitation by some accidental occurrence. De Tocqueville's work on "Democracy in America," for instance, had new life given to it by our late civil war.

JUNE BUTTER-CUPS.

WERE you wrought for fairy banquets,
Famous knot of rustic gold,
Brimming with the sunny wassail,
That your polished goblets hold?
Shapely carven as the wondrous
Chalices of old!

When the midnight moon has risen
Will the elfin orgy meet,
And the drowsy foliage tinkle
Faintly with their coming feet,
As they dance and skip and tumble
Through the meadow sweet?

Will they toast the fairest planet
Reigning in Night's diadem,
Pledge a health to pallid Luna
Perched at ease upon your stem?
Prudent butter-cups, you tell not Any tales of them!

Yet you are not only loyal
To the race of gnome and fay,
Nimble Pucks and wee Titanias,
Whom the dawning frights away;
For your blooms remain to mortals
All the happy day.

And I know your kindly natures
Sunshine never warmed in vain!
Could I, like the lucky fairies,
Gladness from your petals drain,
Butter-cups, you'd bid me quaff it
And forget my pain!

NOT QUITE A HEROINE.

I NEVER could tell why I was not a heroine. I am sure Nature intended I should be one, and I agreed with Nature entirely. Even when I was a very little girl it was firmly impressed upon me that my career was to be in some way remarkable. How often I have suggested to grown-up members of the family that perhaps I was not of the same stock as themselves, but a princess in disguise. Did they not remember a ring at the door-bell years ago, when a basket was left at the door containing me, an infant, in delicately embroidered garments and fine lace, betokening my inherited blood—stolen by the gipsies? But, alas! I never could prevail upon one of them to remember any thing of the kind. They were altogether too voracious, and cruelly remembered so many things connected with my very earliest advent into this "Piljian's Projiss of a Mortal Wale," as poor Sairey Gamp used to say, that even I could no longer doubt. Then there was the family nose! They would speak of that in the most tantalizing manner; as though that couldn't have come by chance! And certain other family traits they urged, until at last I was silenced if not convinced.

Therefore, since I could not be a heroine by birth, being possessed of a bona fide father and mother—and of the very best, too—I resolved to make myself one, and from my earliest remembrance I was busy in making the occurrences of everyday life wear the rosy tint of romance. I read magazines and novels without number, until my identity was quite lost in that of some charmingly improbable heroine of whom I had become enamored, when I would walk out in a sort of reverie, swinging my hat by the strings exactly as they do in story-books, my curls floating in careless disorder, which must then have been, in plain prose, a most untidy state, for it was long before these days when the most careless hair is considered the most stylish, and a scarf which I had secretly purloined from an elder sister's treasures, thrown negligently over my light print dress. Then, of course, I would wonder where was my hero, and peer secretly about for him, questioning whether, if he met me, he would be vanquished on the spot, or would it take time for him to fall a victim to my charms.

Had I met a spruce-looking stranger at such an epoch of my existence, who looked by accident at me more than once, it is difficult to say what would have been my next move. I should probably have taken occasion to fall very gracefully and sprain my ankle, like one of my favorites, Marianne Dashwood, for it was a feat I often accomplished on much less tempting occasions. Then, of course, he would be obliged to assist me home, and would call afterward to inquire for my health, as they always do in books, and nowhere else, and—well, every body knows the rest. He would fall in love of course!

But do not suppose that I intended to have it all go on, and in process of time a marriage—in that common, humdrum fashion! No, indeed! I was going to die of a broken heart, or have him meet with that melancholy fate! I was not quite clear which.

You see there are certain advantages on either side. Suppose, for instance, we were engaged. Immediately some captivating lady of impossible beauty must arise from Somewhere, and so bewilder and fascinate my Ferdinand that I can not retain my hold upon him. My flesh wastes away, my eyes grow brilliant, and my cheeks scarlet. I laugh wildly, and am sparkling and bright in society, but agonize in secret. I read poetry. I often quote those words so much admired by all the broken-hearted:

"They tell me I am happy, and I try to think it true,
They say I have no cause to weep, my sorrows are so few," etc.

particularly the line:

"I dash away the falling tear, then turn and smile again."

It must be so beautiful to have a heart withering in secret; to have such delightful thoughts about closing my tearful eyes and reclining my weary, aching head on Somebody's bosom; to be willing to die that he might know that "one had loved him well;" to have crushed hopes and aching wounds of one's very own to talk about and ponder upon; to have a right to be melancholy in secret; to pray to be forgotten by the world—the faithful world, so prone to remember its departed! to be bidden to "forget him," and find it impossible. Who would not have a broken heart?

But, on the other hand, suppose the cruel Fates forbid my marrying him! He begs and implores. I am inexorable. I see him wasting before my eyes, until I am summoned to his bedside, and he dies, content to have me even thus. This is in the style of my favorite, "Malina Gray." I believe I have shed quarts of tears over that story. Indeed I used to worship Mrs. Stephens as a sort of demi-goddess, to know whom must be the summit of earthly ambition.

But oh, foolish girl that I was, to imagine a man could die of love! We read of such things; but who ever saw it? Who ever had a brother, or an uncle, or cousin, or knew any one else who had such a one who died from love of a woman? No, that's not the way of the world! They immediately angle again if they miss their first nibble; and if the second one fails them, there are plenty more. Don't every body know their maxim, "There's as good fish in the sea as ever were caught?"

Well, but to return to the thread of my story—if it has any. I did once meet with a sort of romance. I was going away, to be assistant-teacher in a "select high-school," taught by a sort of cousin of mine, on a new and unfamiliar road, with no one to take care of me, but abundance of precautions taken for me. My trunk was marked "in front and behind, above and below." In my hand was a brand-new umbrella, with my full name and destination in large bold letters, written with the blackest of ink on a card which was tied conspicuously on the handle, and a folded paper tucked in my glove, with all my route carefully marked out in the most distinct penmanship by a loved and revered hand.

Thus armed, I was whirled away on my route, while with book and paper I beguiled the lonely ride. At my last stopping-place, within a few miles of my destination, where we were obliged to wait several hours for the connecting-train, I met him—my hero! I knew him at a glance.

It was at "the hotel." (The name sounds imposing, but the building was perfectly innocent of any such idea.) Some fellow-travelers and myself were on the piazza, watching a small boy's attempts to fly a kite. Poor child! How eagerly he would toss the monstrous banble, and then run for his life, gazing up in the air to see his white bird soar aloft. But it seemed his "eagle was disposed to be a barn-yard fowl," and dropped to the earth as resolutely as he sent it skyward. After watching him a while, I descended the steps, and offered to toss the kite while he ran. How the little face brightened, and how he darted away, while even the huge ball of twine itself capered, and danced, and turned itself over in mad somersaults; while it was hard to tell which felt the most exultant, the little boy or I, as our newspaper comet whisked its tail about so grandly, high in air—high even above the church-steeple.

At this precise epoch my hero steps out on the stage, i. e., piazza. I will not deny that I had caught a glimpse of his profile through the window, for I wish to be perfectly truthful in this matter; but if I had wished to attract his attention, I had certainly succeeded, for he honored me with a long stare, as I came back, flushed and panting, from my little run—a look which ended in a melancholy smile, as I laughingly answered the congratulations of my companions.

And wasn't he fit for any body's hero? His hair parted so exquisitely behind—his glossy beaver tipped to the very perfection of an excruciating angle—faultless suit—black kids and cane! What more could the most exacting novelist ask for his "hero-de-romance?" Presently he was recognized by one of our party, and after a little conversation she introduced him to me, remarking that we were both going to B—, and perhaps it would be mutually agreeable for us to be made acquainted. Afterward she took occasion to whisper to me, "You are going to

B—a perfect stranger, and it is always well to have some one to tell you who are suitable acquaintances."

I assented to this, and she went on: "Now, you know in every place of any pretension there are certain families who consider themselves a little better than the rest of the world, and are looked up to by their neighbors as such."

I nodded knowingly.

"This gentleman," she resumed, "belongs to one of the first families in town, and it will give you a very good start to get acquainted with him; so I advise you to cultivate his acquaintance."

I thanked my kind friend sincerely, and proceeded to the cultivation of the unexplored ground.

By the time we were half a mile on our journey I had learned that my hero had a "very smart" brother in college. A few rods further on he informed me that his father had written a great deal of poetry; and the next announcement, in a modest voice, was that he himself had a "blank-book," and wrote in it sometimes!

I thought he ground his teeth slightly, and muttered something of blasted hopes; but as our locomotive was just then obliged to relieve its feelings by a piercing shriek I could not be certain: but the bare suspicion was enough to make him interesting.

Well, our acquaintance dated from that period. My leisure hours were enlivened by his presence, and sometimes the "blank-book," which, by-the-way, was full of writing, accompanied him, and snatches of poetry, all breathing the same tale of a crushed heart, were read to my sympathizing ears. We rode, walked, and flirted, and, by degrees, his melancholy forsook him. He ventured into blue neck-ties, cream-colored pants, and yellow gloves, also, by degrees.

At length the climax was reached. The momentous question was asked, and, with all proper embarrassment and blushes, I referred him to papa.

At that time school had been keeping three weeks and two days. As I was to be there three months, and knew my careful parent too well to fancy for a moment that he would give his daughter to any man simply on the recommendation of a letter, without having seen and talked with him, we agreed that nothing need be done about it just at present, but that when I went home he might go with me and present his case in person. For the present we would be secretly engaged, which we both solemnly averred to be as sacred as marriage in the sight of Heaven. I wore the ring he gave me, with a ruby-emerald-garnet-amethyst-diamond in it, on a little chain around my neck, tucked out of sight.

Two weeks more passed by. Every afternoon, at three, when I was released from school, there he was, at the corner by the school-house, waiting to walk home with me, when he would go into the parlor and stay till tea-time; go home and swallow his tea, and then back again to stay as long as I would allow him.

It had degenerated into routine in eight days. In two more it became tedious. At the end of a fortnight unendurable.

"I can't stand this," I thought to myself. "This isn't the way they do in any story-books I ever read. No heroine sits crocheting an endless scarf while her lover sits close by her side fingering the worsted, while he discourses, night after night, on 'Father's talents' and 'Jimmy's smartness,' and how many neck-ties he's got at home."

I grew desperate, and resolved to change my tactics.

So the next day I feigned headache, and staid at home in the afternoon—"Cousin Ben," as I had learned to call him, the principal of the school, kindly excusing me. I locked myself up in my room, one window of which looked directly across to the open lot where the school-house stood, and busied myself till three, when I established myself at the window behind the curtain, and took a bird's-eye view.

In a moment I saw him emerging from the corner store and walking slowly toward the school-house. I began to smile inwardly. He walked nearly to the door, and then turned and lounged slowly in an opposite direction. The smile reached my face. Again he turned, and, when the perambulator retraced his steps for the fourth time, I laughed aloud; a noise I immediately checked, however, as I did not wish any one to know I was in the house.

I declare on my veracity, which is unimpeachable, if that fellow didn't walk up and down that road eleven times, besides pausing to lean on the fence at least five times. At last an idea seemed to strike him, and he started on the trot in the direction of the hotel. I knew what was coming, so I took my book and threw myself on the lounge, and when the expected tap sounded at the door all was still as death in the room. A moment passed, and then a louder and more assured knock. Dead silence! Then the door-handle was seized, shaken, and finally relinquished, and with a sigh that nearly sent me off into convulsions the intruder left the premises.

I had a cozy afternoon napping and reading; and when my cousin's solicitous voice inquired at the keyhole how I was, I managed to ask, in a very weak voice, for a dish of tea and some toast to be sent up, adding, feebly, that I thought I might taste a dough-nut—for the smell of dough-nuts frying had reached my olfactorys, and they were a temptation not to be withstood. To Cousin Ben's remonstrance, that he feared they would make my head worse, I replied that they never hurt me under any circumstances; so I had the consolation of admitting in a few moments a well-filled tray, to the tempting contents of which I did ample justice, while the sympathizing "Gusty" who brought it declared that it did her good to see me eat. But I was obliged to make wry faces, and put my hand to my head pretty often, and declare that I wouldn't have believed

I could have tasted a mouthful, while I made fearful havoc among the delicacies which my kind landlady had piled on the tray to tempt an invalid's appetite, so that at last I was forced from mere shame to remark to Gusty that my headaches were very peculiar, and that they always felt better after I had eaten as much as I could possibly worry down. To which she returned the somewhat ambiguous reply, "Some does!"

After dismissing Gusty and the lightened tray I locked up again, and sat down to letter-writing. Half an hour passed; then came the familiar footsteps—hesitatingly, as though not quite assured of their owner's business in that part of the house. A gentle tap. No answer. All was silent, and after a little pause, during which I was busily engaged in stuffing my handkerchief into my mouth, the feet slowly withdrew, and I was left undisturbed that night. But I could not write, for I was trying to plan my course of action. I knew I could not make a martyr of myself by staying shut up in my own room, so after wearying myself into a real headache, I concluded to go to bed, and let events decide for themselves.

The next day, when three o'clock came, I lingered as long as I could find any pretext, and while I was in my recitation-room, searching for nothing particular in my desk (which I was always sure to find there), Cousin Ben came in and gave me a good look out of those clear, brown eyes of his, as he said, "Cousin Belle, he's waiting! Why don't you hurry?" and back he went to his desk, as dignified and impenetrable as ever.

I do believe at that juncture of affairs I was so vexed that I bit my finger-nails. But I started in the worst possible humor, which did not pass off as I saw the waiting face brighten at my approach, and the eager strides toward me.

"He thinks it as flat as I do," I kept saying to myself, for there was that in the expression of Cousin Ben's eye that haunted me, and I thought much more of him and his words than I did of the love-lorn swain by my side who was discoursing volubly, with my hand, of which he had somehow got possession, tucked comfortably under his arm.

Well, that day was the same as the fourteen preceding ones save one, and I was ennuyed.

What should I do? Now was my time to consult history. What did other heroines do? Surely they did not marry, or what a tame world it would be! No; they quarreled. But what should I quarrel about? He gave me not the slightest occasion for jealousy. He was too attentive by far! It was so stupid not to have any pretext for a quarrel, and I must make one.

Then it flashed upon me that the next night I was invited to the "Society" at his aunt's house, and there I should meet with the young people of the village. To my surprise, Cousin Ben had accepted the invitation to go there also; so I told my lover that I should go with my cousin, and bade him good-night in rather an indifferent manner, which seemed to set all his nerves quivering as he bade me a tender, broken adieu, and attempted to kiss my hand, which I petulantly snatched away.

The next day, at dinner, Cousin Ben opened his eyes very wide when I told him I should wait and go with him to the Society; but he said never a word except to politely accept my offer. And when we were ushered into the room full of people, most of them strangers, I kept close to him, and tried my best to keep out of the way of a pair of beseeching eyes, which watched me from above a new and irresistible neck-tie, from the time I entered the room.

Every one knows what important personages the school-teachers are in a country village, and Mr. Benjamin Hardy, late of Yale College, and Miss Gray, his lady assistant, were introduced and lionized to their hearts' content. But it was to the son of our hostess that I confined my attentions particularly, a youth in glasses, who kept the corner store. And when, as we sat cozily talking together on the sofa, the apples, nuts, and raisins (which are generally conspicuous items in an evening entertainment in the country) were passed round, I heard a tremulous voice at my elbow asking, "Miss Gray, will you name my apple?" I could scarcely forbear laughing outright at the comical picture the poor fellow presented—his imploring eyes and solemn face as he presented the apple, stuck on the end of his knife, before my eyes.

"Certainly," I answered, promptly. "I'll do that for any one. You may do the same for me."

"I shall beg the privilege of asking you to exchange the same civilities with me," rather pompously said the young man by my side, who evidently thought his conversation must be on stilts when he was talking with the "school-ma'am."

Some fifteen minutes afterward my forlorn friend again approached with his apple-seeds, of which he had just nine, carefully spread out on his open hand. "Who did you name it, Charlie?" he asked of his cousin first, glancing at me in a sidelong manner, as though he expected to hear my name. On my own part I held my head up as indifferently as possible, and tried to look as though I had no concern at all in the matter.

"Oh, I named it Susie Hall. By-the-way, Ned, where is that old flame of yours? I haven't seen any thing of her lately."

I turned and looked at poor Ned. The color had flushed to his face, and he looked as though he had been caught sheep-stealing as he answered, with a desperate attempt at a laugh, that "he neither knew nor cared where she was."

"Ah, sore there!" was the quietly laconic remark of my companion, which caused poor Ned to grind his teeth in rage, which he strove to repress by turning to me, and repeating the question as to the cognomen I had bestowed on his apple.

"Why, Susie Hall, of course," I answered, coolly, as though I had known her all my life, when, in fact, I never knew of the existence of such a person until a moment previous.

Poor Ned! that extinguished him, and he hastily answered a summons to another part of the room, leaving me secretly enjoying his manifest discomfiture.

"How many seeds have you, Miss Gray?" asked my companion, whose eyes I had seen sparkling roguishly behind his glasses as he watched the retreating figure of our victim. Ah, he hadn't peeped out of the window of the corner store the past fortnight for nothing! I was sure of that. "You have five. That will just do. I named your apple Mr. Hardy."

I started, just a little, in surprise. Such an idea had never occurred to me as that any one could, by any possibility, have associated our names in that way. I had viewed him almost as an own cousin, and he was at least twenty-eight, while I was only eighteen—it seemed so old. And, thinking thus, I forgot to reply, and glanced up to see Cousin Ben himself, standing close by my side, looking down on me with a very peculiar expression in his handsome eyes.

The color flashed deep into my face; and I was glad to hide my embarrassment by replying to the demand of my companion for his name, and Cousin Ben soon moved away again.

Later in the evening poor Ned edged round into my vicinity, and, begging me to look over a photograph album with him, he took occasion to whisper to me, in the most absurd fashion, that he hoped I was not going to believe any of those foolish stories about Sue Hall; that he never liked her half as well as he did me, and that he neither knew nor cared where she was; that he had no idea I would have any feeling about it or he should have told me himself—that is, he added, correcting himself, if his attentions had been particular.

That enraged me. The idea of his suspecting me of jealousy, when I would have considered it a positive relief to see him deep in love with every girl in the room but me, and I believe I "flared up" at that point, and gave him to understand in the most disagreeable manner that his affairs were of no possible interest to me; that whether his attentions had been general or particular wasn't of the slightest consequence, and much still more aggravating. In fact, we were having our "lover's quarrel," and I entered into it with far more zest than I had ever manifested for any flirtation. I am sure of that.

So when ten o'clock came—for in the country they keep good hours, and go home when city people's evenings are just beginning—I was tucked snugly under Cousin Ben's arm, perfectly oblivious to a pair of eyes glaring angrily at me from a dark corner of the entry as we came out. I felt my pulses thrill with excitement. It was so exhilarating to have a downright quarrel; to anticipate cutting him dead, when I met him in the street, having luxurious hours all to myself to read, or indulge in the "sweet do nothing." I could scarcely subdue my steps to my cousin's sober tread, and two or three times he questioned me as to my evident excitement, and its cause, until at last I answered, desperately, "Well, the fact is, Cousin Ben, Ned and I have quarreled, and I like it so much!"

"What!" said Ben, in sheer astonishment at my frankness I suppose, for of course he knew something had happened that I was his companion that night from choice. "Do you say you like it? Oh, that is all fancy; to-morrow—nay, to-night, after you go to bed, you'll cry your eyes out, and be ready to meet him half-way, at least, when he comes to walk home with you to-morrow."

"I sha'n't do any such thing," I answered, stoutly. "Catch me making up in a hurry! I'm too glad to have a quarrel. It's just what I've been longing for."

"Why, Belle, what a strange girl you are! Do you know he will have fifty thousand dollars one of these days?"

"I don't care if he has fifty million, it would make no difference to me. I'm tired to death of him, and I don't want him to speak to me again for a month at least. I've heard every thing he knows over and over, and if I was compelled to listen again I don't know what would become of me. Cousin, let's jump over that fence! I want to do something out of the common course."

He turned me square round, Cousin Ben did; we had got to the hotel now, where the lights from the windows shone bright. I could see his face distinctly, and wondered I had never before noticed the contrast between his intellectual beauty and poor Ned's foppish gentility.

"Belle, Belle, are you in earnest?" he asked, in a low whisper that thrilled me, I scarcely knew why. "Do you really mean what you say, that you are tired of that fellow, or are you only playing with him and with me, and do you intend to go back to the old intimacy again? Tell me the truth, Belle, frankly, as I know you will if you speak at all."

"Certainly," I answered, half-indignantly, yet wondering as I returned his earnest gaze. "I am in sober earnest that I never wish to have anything more to say to him. He is like a poor story, which one would never care to read a second time, but when compelled to read it over and over, how flat, and tiresome, and insipid it becomes! But why you should ask me if I am playing with you I can't imagine, as it is certainly nothing to you how I treat him!"

"It is of more consequence to me than you imagine," replied Ben, smiling on me. "I will tell you why some time. But come, you cruel little girl, come into the house, or you'll be dashing the hopes of some other aspiring swain!" and he swung the hall-door open for me to pass in; then hastily bidding him good-night I sped away to my room with my head crowded with thoughts that had never been there before.

I can not give the whole story of the remainder of that pleasant term. It is enshrined in my memory as one of the happiest periods of my life. Youth, health, and gay spirits color the picture; new scenes, a pleasant home, and kind friends lend their attractions, and all is enshrined like a picture in an archway of gorgeous trees—maples flinging out their scarlet drapery, oaks and elms turning to mottled crimson and brown, for we used often to ride through those glowing, unsurpassed forests of Maine, and come home laden with brilliant clusters; of cheerful, open fires, and pleasant evenings of study or reading, or of merry chat with Cousin Ben, who was one of the most entertaining companions in the world.

And when, at the close of the term, we wound up with a grand exhibition, with all the flourish of a brass band, and our names had got into the county papers with such high encomiums as to make me feel myself on the topmost round of the "ladder of fame"—when all this was past, and the next day I was whizzing on my way home, I was not alone! Some one sat beside me who was going to ask papa! It was not my hero! It was only Cousin Ben.

THE WORLD AND THE SONG.

What reck's the lark in the morning sky
Of the plowman in the furrow,
Whether he listen to the song,
Or drive his patient team along
With not a thought but—thorough?

What reck's the nightingale in the wood,
Lamenting or adoring,
Whether the lovers in the lane
Bestow a thought on the bliss or pain
Of his passionate outpouring?

And what care I, oh busy world,
Singing at night or morning,
Whether the music of my line,
Made for my pleasure, not for thine,
Receive thy praise or scorning?

I sing with the fresh green leaves around,
And the clear blue sky above me,
Not for the traders of the mart,
But for the soothing of my heart,
And the joy of those who love me.

So grind thy wheel, thou weary world,
Thou'rt not my soul's enslaver;
The free bird up in the morning air
Is as independent of thy care
As I of thy lightest favor!

EXTINGUISHING BURNING CLOTHES.

THERE are few accidents more terrible than the setting fire to the loose vestments worn by women. Instantly the lower part of the dress is ignited the flames rush upward with great velocity, and the whole of the garments are involved in the conflagration. Even if almost immediately extinguished, so large a portion of the skin is scorched that death often ensues from the shock to the system, though perhaps the actual injury does not appear to be severe.

The first impulse of the victim is to rush about shrieking for help; the second to open the door, if possible, and run along the passages out into the open air, thus fanning the flame to the utmost. No line of action could be more fatal in its consequences. It can not be too constantly borne in mind that the only safety is to fall down quickly on the floor; if a small portion of the dress only is ignited, it may be put out by thrusting it under the body and by rolling upon it. By rolling over and over the person on fire is comparatively safe, as the flames ascend away from the body, and thus do comparatively little damage.

The course of action for by-standers is evident; it is to seize any woolen covering near at hand, as a blanket, shawl, hearth-rug, coat, or curtain, throw it instantly around the sufferer, and roll her on the floor in its folds. Scores of lives have been saved by by-standers taking off their coats, and instantly extinguishing the flames in this manner. As soon as the victim is on the ground the greatest danger is over; the flames no longer rise to the face, and the breathing of the overheated air, which is always fatal, is prevented.

It may be asked, what is the best treatment to be adopted for the sufferer before the arrival of medical aid. If the burn is severe, the patient should be laid in a bed and the clothes removed with as little disturbance as possible; they should, if requisite, be cut off, so as to avoid the slightest additional injury to the burned surface. Then, to exclude the air, some application is requisite; cotton wool does very well, but the simplest, the nearest to hand, the most easily applied, and certainly one of the most efficacious, is flour, profusely dredged on out of a common flour-dredger.

It can not be too strongly borne in mind that cold water or other cold applications to an extensive burn are fatal. Persons suffering from burns rarely die from the immediate injury; the cause of death is either the shock to the system or congestion of the lungs, both of which would be greatly intensified by cold applied to the outer surface of the body. The danger of a burn or scald is not in proportion to its intensity or severity so much as to extent of surface injured; thus a severe burn confined to a small portion of the body is seldom fatal. A comparatively slight scald extending over a large surface is rarely recovered from. Thus, lamentable accidents often occur from children pulling a cup of hot tea from the edge of a table; the liquid runs down inside the clothes, spreads over the chest, and, from the extent rather than the severity of the injury, it is often fatal.

Trimmings for Dresses, Jackets, Cloaks, etc.

THE materials requisite for making these trimmings are silk or satin, silk braid of different kinds, cord, silk twist, and beads, which are partly arranged on pasteboard, and partly on wooden moulds.

Fig. 1.—This trimming is of fine silk braid. In making the upper part the braid is sewed on a pasteboard foundation previously covered with silk. The open-work parts are trimmed with beads. In the centre of the upper part is set a small rosette of ribbon and beads.

Fig. 2.—The foundation of this rosette, which forms part of an edge, is also composed of pasteboard covered with silk. In the centre is set a jet button, and around this is wound the silk braid, which is sewed fast to the foundation. A few cords of silk and beads serve to join this rosette to the border. This is a beautiful trimming for stylish talmas and cloaks.

Fig. 3.—The upper part of this fringe trimming is of satin, bordered with fine braid and ornamented with braid and beads. The braid is then arranged in long ends, which are finished by tassels of silk twist and beads.

Fig. 4.—Grelot tassel. The wooden moulds for this tassel are covered either by stretching threads of silk lengthwise and afterward weaving through them, or with crochet work. The stitch used for this is peculiar; it consists of slip stitches, which are worked from left to right, always putting the needle through the upper vein of a stitch of the last round. The under side of the work is the right side of the finished work.

Fig. 5.—The upper part of this trimming consists of a pasteboard foundation, which is covered with silk, embroidered with cord, and bordered with beads, and is finished in the centre with a jet button in the form of a star. The trellised portion is made of silk twist and beads, and the fringe on the end of bugles and beads strung on silk twist, as shown by the illustration. This trimming is designed for the side and back seams of cloaks.

Fig. 6.—This figure is composed of a pasteboard foundation, covered with satin, bordered with cord and beads, and embroidered with bugles and beads. This trimming may be used as a heading for a tassel, or a clasp, or several of them may be arranged to form a border.

Fig. 7.—The upper part of this trimming consists of two circular wooden moulds, one within the other, covered with satin, embroidered with cord and braid, and bordered with the same cord arranged in loops. Two ends of braid or crochet work proceed from the centre of the button, and terminate in silk tassels, which are surmounted with braid.

Fig. 8.—Tassel. The head of this tassel is composed of two flat and one round wooden mould, covered with woven silk twist. Braid may also be used for this covering. Bead cord and silk cord, with the ends raveled out, as shown in the illustration, form the tassel.

Fig. 9.—The centre of this rosette is a star, formed of a pasteboard foundation, covered with satin, and embroidered with beads. The remainder is of silk cord and beads.

Fig. 10.—Clasp, in the form of an escutcheon, of silk and pasteboard. The application figure is worked in ribbed crochet stitch. The clasp is bordered with fine silk cord and beads. The fringe is formed of bugles and beads, strung on silk twist, as shown in the illustration.

AN ARABIAN DINNER.

A TOURIST, who has lately visited Arabia, gives an interesting description of an Arabian meal which was prepared for himself and traveling companion by a wealthy and tolerably civilized Arabian named Arakel-Effendi.

"About a quarter of an hour before we sat down to table," says he, "a gorgeously dressed negro served us with mézé in a large shallow dish; this mézé is a collation intended to prepare and stimulate the stomach for the coming repast, and is made of caviar, olives, shavings of cheese, and raki, the favorite beverage of the country, an acrid liquor or a kind of palm wine.

"When we had partaken of this, the negro returned with a dish of water, into which we all dipped the ends of our fingers and washed; after which we entered the dining-room. The table consisted of an enormous round copper dish resting on a small table. This device had been contrived through deference to us, as the Arabians, like all other Orientals, never sit at a table, but à la Turc, on the floor, around a mat on which the food is arranged. Knives and forks and spoons had also been provided on our account, for even the most wealthy Arabians are accustomed to eat with their fingers and to dip their bread into the dishes. If they are thirsty, they clap their hands, and a servant brings a glass of water; but for us the table was supplied with glasses and very superior Bordeaux wine, while napkins hung on the backs of our chairs. Around the table stood a rich mess of different salads, cheese, and curdled milk in tureens. These side-dishes are eaten with the others, according to the taste.

"At first, the entire want of plates placed us under some embarrassment. We were compelled to eat from the dishes in common with the whole company, and I had never been accustomed to such a patriarchal manner of eating, which with us can be learned only by a soldier in active service. I did not, however, wish to show my embarrassment to our friendly host, who had certainly made all possible concessions to our European customs, and so dipped bravely into the kebab, or mutton-ragout, which was set before us first, for soups are here unknown. My friend C— looked at me in astonishment, and only ventured bashfully to follow my example. He took the first piece that his fork came to, while I had composedly sought out the very best piece.

"Now followed four most excellent dishes, with which even a pampered European taste could find no fault. First, a delicate rice pillau with fowls; then a dish called farfa roumi mahchi, a real delicacy, consisting of a tender turkey roasted in a most delicious paste and filled with a costly dressing of grapes, almonds, and pistachio nuts. Even my friend C— was so delighted that in his enthusiasm he broke off a large piece with his fingers, and ate it with great satisfaction.

"After dinner came the coffee and tchibuks, during which four Syrian maidens sang their native songs. One was a lovely little creature, with a charming face, ruby lips, snow-white teeth, large almond-shaped black eyes, and a little fez which was jauntily set on the side of her head over the rich black hair, and became her marvelously. We took great pains to learn and sing one of her songs, but the girls laughed at us as they left the room, chattering with each other, and marveling at the strange customs of the foreigners."

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

THE weather here just now is most bright and beautiful; every body is either coming to London, or in London; every body, that is, who makes any pretense of belonging to fashionable life.
